It had been the romance of his life. They had grown up together as playmates in Cumberland. He had fought scores of battles on her behalf with those who had denied that she was the Lady Anna—even though he had then hated the title. Boys had jeered him because of his noble little sweetheart, and he had exulted at hearing her so called. His only sister and his mother had died when he was young, and there had been none in the house but his father and himself. As a boy he had ever been at the cottage of the Countess, and had sworn to Lady Anna a thousand times that he would do and die in her service. Now he was a strong man, and was more devoted to her than ever. It was the great romance of his life. How could it be brought to pass that the acknowledged daughter of an earl, dowered with enormous wealth, should become the wife of a tailor? And yet such was his ambition and such his purpose. It was not that he cared for her dower. It was not, at any rate, the hope of her dower that had induced him to love her. His passion had grown and his purpose had been formed before the old Earl had returned for the last time to Lovel Grange—when nothing was known of the manner in which his wealth might be distributed. That her prospect of riches now joined itself to his aspirations it would be an affectation to deny. The man who is insensible to the power which money brings with it must be a dolt, and Daniel Thwaite was not a dolt, and was fond of power. But he was proud of heart, and he said to himself over and over again that should it ever come to pass that the possession of the girl was to depend on the abandonment of the wealth, the wealth should be abandoned without a further thought.

It may be imagined that with such a man the words which his father would speak to him about the Lady Anna, suggesting the respectful distance with which she should be approached by a tailor's foreman, would be very bitter. They were bitter to the speaker, and very bitter to him who heard them. "Daniel," said the father, "this is a queer life you are leading, with the Countess and Lady Anna just beneath you, in the same house."

"It was a quiet house for them to come to—and cheap."

"Quiet enough, and as cheap as any, I dare say; but I don't know whether it is well that you should be thrown so much with them. They are different from us." The son looked at his father, but made no immediate reply. "Our lot has been cast with theirs because of their difficulties," continued the old man, "but the time is coming when we had better stand aloof."

"What do you mean, father?"

"I mean that you and I are tailors, and these people are born nobles."

"They have taken our help, father."

"Well, yes, they have. But it is not for us to say any thing of that. It has been given with a heart."

"Certainly with a heart."

"And shall be given to the end—as long as it is wanted. But the end of it will come soon now. One will be a countess, and the other will be the Lady Anna. Are they fit associates for such as you and me?"

"If you ask me, father, I think they are."

"They don't think so. You may be sure of that."

"Have they said so, father?"

"The Countess has said so. She has complained that you call her daughter simply Anna. In future you must give her a handle to her name." Daniel Thwaite was a dark brown man, with no tinge of ruddiness about him, a thin, spare man, almost swarthy, whose hands were as brown as a nut, and whose cheeks and forehead were brown. But now he blushed up to his eyes. The hue of the blood as it rushed to his face forced itself through the darkness of his visage, and he blushed, as such men always blush, with a look of indignation on his face. "Just call her Lady Anna," said the father.

"The Countess has been complaining of me, then?"

"She has hinted that her daughter will be injured by your familiarity, and I have been unable to say that she was wrong. I suppose that the Lady Anna Lovel ought to be treated with deference by a tailor—even though the tailor may have spent his last farthing in her service."

"Do not let us talk about the money, father."

"Well, no. I'd as lief not think about the money either. The world is not ripe yet, Daniel."

"No—the world is not ripe."

"There must be earls and countesses."

"I see no must in it. There are earls and countesses, as there used to be mastodons and other senseless, overgrown brutes roaming miserable and hungry through the undrained woods—cold, comfortless, unwieldly things, which have perished in the general progress. The big things have all to give way to the intellect of those which are more finely made."

"I hope men and women will not give way to bugs and fleas," said the tailor, who was wont to ridicule his son's philosophy.

The son was about to explain his theory of the perfected mean size of intellectual created beings, when he remembered that his heart was at the present moment full of Anna Lovel. "Father," he said, "I think that the Countess might have spared her observations."

"I thought so too; but as she said it, it was best that I should tell you. You'll have to marry some day, and it wouldn't do that you should look there for your sweetheart." When the matter was thus brought home to him Daniel Thwaite would argue it no further. He remained silent, and would give no assurance to his father as to his future mode of address to the girl he loved. "It will all come to an end soon," continued the old man, "and it may be that they had better not move till it is settled. They'll divide the money, and there will be enough for both, in all conscience. The Countess will be the Countess, and the Lady Anna will be the Lady Anna; and then there will be no more need of the old tailor from Keswick. They will go into another world, and we shall hear from them perhaps about Christmas-time with a hamper of game, and maybe a little wine, as a gift."

"You do not think that of them, father."

"What else can they do? The lawyers will pay the money, and they will be carried away. They can not come to our house, nor can we go to theirs. I shall leave to-morrow, my boy, at six o'clock; and my advice to you is to trouble them with your presence as little as possible. You may be sure that they do not want it."

Daniel Thwaite was certainly not disposed to take his father's advice, but then he knew much more than did his father. The above scene took place in the evening, when the son's work was done, and he did not see his father again before he started. Time is too precious to workmen to admit of the grace and prettiness of prolonged farewells. When old Thwaite walked with his box on his own shoulder to the coach-office from whence he was to travel to Lancester on his way to Keswick, Daniel was already on his route to Wigmore Street. As he crept down by the door in which the two ladies slept he could not but think of his father's words, "It wouldn't do that you should look there for your sweetheart." Why should it not do? But any such advice as that was now too late. He had looked there for his sweetheart. He had spoken, and the girl had answered him. He had held her close to his heart, and had pressed her lips to his own, and had called her his Anna, his well-beloved, his pearl, his treasure; and she—she had only sighed in his arms, and yielded to his embrace. She had wept alone when she thought of it, with a conscious feeling that as she was the Lady Anna, there could be no happy love between herself and the only youth whom she had known. But when he had spoken, and had clasped her to his heart, she had never dreamed of rebuking him. She had known nothing better than he, and desired nothing better than to live with him and to be loved by him. She did not think that it could be possible to know any one better: this weary, weary title filled her with dismay. Daniel, as he walked along thinking of her embrace, thinking of those burning kisses, and thinking also of his father's caution, swore to himself that the difficulties in his way should never stop him in his course.

THE POETIC FOLK-LORE OF IRELAND.

IN Ireland, as in most other countries where folk-lore is or has been abundant and popular, the nature and habits of the goblins will be observed to suit more than one mood and disposition of those who put faith in supernatural manifestations. Of course the peasantry are unable to dress or equip their fairies as completely as the poet could, but they can give the note or suggestion which ends in the bee being robbed for the taper which is to be lit at the eyes of the glow-worm, and in the painted wings of the butterfly being converted into a fan to keep off the moon-rays. In its way what can be prettier than the common folk-lore belief that the top of the mushroom serves for a fairy banquet-table, and that you can tell in the morning where the elves have been overnight by looking at the heads of the daisies? The flowers round which the good people have assembled are observed to be asleep and shut up in the noontide, having been obliged, contrary to their sober custom, to keep their golden eyes open into the small hours of the morning.

The circumstance of the elves abducting the children of mortals—especially infants who have not been subjected to the rite of baptism—is an ordinary incident of Irish fairy lore. Sometimes the little boy or little girl is kidnaped bodily into elf-land; sometimes the child, while apparently dead in the cradle, is believed to be in spirit the prisoner, thrall, or toy of a goblin community. Not only children, but grown people, have been often carried or inveigled into fairy-land. The story of Thomas the Rhymer, Thomas of Ercildoune, has its Irish prototype with almost identical features. One version of this legend tells how a hunter followed a milk-white doe until both his comrades and his dogs had deserted him. After a weary chase the knight—for of course the adventurer was a knight—pursues the doe single-handed, until the creature vanishes as soon as it reaches a haunted spring. Round this spot the poet informs us purple heath-bells are blooming, and as their fragrance and a feeling of fatigue tempted our knight to repose, he saw a fair lady in white approach him with a jeweled cup in her hand, in which she gayly pledged him by name. The hunter could do nothing less than propose for this lovely apparition on the spot, whereupon the damsel stoops over the fountain, from which she draws a ring, and she and the knight then go hand in hand over the hills and far away, or into the hills, to follow the text here paraphrased:

"And legends tell he now doth dwell
Within the hills so green.
But still the milk-white doe appears
And wakes the peasant's evening fears,
While distant bugles faintly ring
Around the lonely haunted spring."

It will be remembered that Thomas the Rhymer was accosted by the queen of fair elf-land, who, after being kissed on the lips, raised Thomas to a seat on her steed, telling him to keep a guard upon his tongue in the place he was going to, otherwise he would never be able to return to the common world. The condition imposed on mortals who were abducted into fairy-land in Ireland, in order that they might have a chance of ultimately escaping from bondage, was that they should touch no food, observe a rigid fast, while they were with the good people. The most exquisite meats and dishes of all sorts were laid out to tempt them from this resolve; but the consequence of the slightest indulgence of appetite was understood to be imprisonment forever with the fairies.

The favorite time for seeing the elves is in midsummer, between lights, or later, or when the harvest-moon is at its full. In haunted spots the hour of gloaming comes over meadows of gray mist threaded with rivers of fading saffron, a lingering flush in the sky, and a star shining over the plumes of a grove of fir-trees. Here is the path or the old castle of which the good people have taken possession. The ground is carefully shunned by the belated or wandering rustic. It may happen, however, that the area of enchantment is limited to a well or a thorn-tree.

All the accounts that come to us testify to the wonderful effects of fairy music. In the vulgar legends, indeed, the cluricauns are represented as playing upon the bagpipes such planxties and jigs as might be heard at the cross-roads at a wedding or a christening, but we have also stories of harp tunes and melodies so solemn and absorbing that the soul has been made to lose the measure of time by them, and, when the awakening comes, years of the world have passed over the head of the listener unfelt and unobserved. It was a belief also that some of the ancient minstrels were in possession of fairy instruments, that they had been presented by elfin potentates with the harps which so ravished the senses of the knights and dames for whom they performed. A harper was at any time liable to be carried off in a friendly way to a fairy revel, and pipers and fiddlers have been constantly secured in order to assist in the jovialities of the good people. The elves, however, have also their own musicians and orchestra. When the key-bugle at the Gap of Dunlow challenges the little folk, you shall hear their brave, fluttering response from the very centre of the grim mountains, the sharp, single reply, the pause of an instant followed by chord swelling after chord, rising and sinking, and then flickering like a dying flame, to faint away finally in the hills, as if the musicians of Queen Meav had slowly closed the doors of the palace at which they were posted.

May mornings, before the dew is off the grass, and when the lark is in full song, are supposed to be likely occasions for meeting with certain of the good people. Some of them are early risers, and evidently not subject to the law by which uncanny things are supposed to disappear as soon as the cock begins to crow. Shepherds and herdsmen have at times been startled when counting the kine or sheep to discover that additions have been made to their stock during the night. The illusion only lasts a few minutes, for the fairy cows or fairy sheep, as the case may be, soon seem to separate from the others and melt gradually into thin air, or slide off into meres or lakes which open to receive the phantom cattle.

With reference to the absolute dimensions of fairies it is difficult to get a standard of measurement. They have no souls to live forever, but they seem to know nothing of death or decay. When the world comes to an end, they will come to an end with it, like the flowers, the birds, and the trees.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

POSTAL cards will soon be for sale at every post-office in the United States. They have been manufactured according to government orders by the Morgan Envelope Company, of Springfield, Massachusetts; and by the terms of the contract, at least 500,000 must be ready for delivery on the 1st of May. Before the middle of April orders had been received at the Post-office Department for over 30,000,000 cards, and the Postmaster-General estimates that at least 130,000,000 will be called for the first year. As, however, the press of the manufacturers is capable of striking off 350,000 cards a day, the demand will be easily supplied in good time. The cards will be printed on what is called "bond paper," of cream-color, with velvet brown lettering, and are five and one-eighth inches long by three inches wide. On one side are the words "United States Postal Card," and a stamp with the "Liberty" head, surrounded by the words "U. S. Postage—One Cent." On this side the address only is to be written—the message on the other. A water-mark with the letters "U. S. P. O. D." crosses the body of the card. Each card is complete in itself, and will answer all the purposes of paper, envelope, and stamp, provided the message contains nothing of a private nature. Of course lengthy or confidential communications will not be put upon postal cards; but for many business purposes they will doubtless be very popular, and become a prominent feature in our post-office arrangements.

A curious incident is reported concerning the lost Atlantic, though the truth of its occurrence is not confirmed. When the steamer was in mid-ocean two or three of the steerage passengers declared that the ship and all on board would be lost. They packed their carpet-bags, went on deck, and watched for passing vessels, saying they were going to leave her. They were regarded as insane, and placed in confinement.

King Oscar and Queen Sophia of Sweden and Norway are to be crowned in Sweden on the 4th of May, the fifty-fifth anniversary of the coronation of Bernadotte as Charles XIV. The Norwegian coronation will take place at Trondhjem on the 18th of July.

The English are getting excited over the expected visit of the Shah of Persia. They declare the pearls are to be packed in bushel baskets, that whole casks of ottar of roses will form part of the royal luggage, and as to diamonds and emeralds, it is quite impossible to realize how gorgeous will be the sight to those who are favored.

The so-called "lava beds"—that remarkable volcanic formation where the treacherous Captain Jack and his Modoc followers have been lurking—are situated in Siskiyou, the northwestern county of California, extending probably over the line into Oregon. The precise limits of these "beds" are not very well defined, but they are supposed to cover about one hundred square miles. The rough, irregularly formed masses of basalt afford peculiar facilities for concealment, and are well adapted to the Indian style of warfare. An Oregon paper, in describing the position occupied by the Modoc Indians, says:

"From the top of one of these stone pyramids an Indian can shoot a man without even exposing a square inch of himself. He can with due haste load and shoot a common muzzle-loading rifle ten times before a man can scramble over the rocks and chasms between the slain and the slayer. If at this terrible expense of life a force dislodges him from his cove, he has only to drop into and follow some subterranean passage with which he is familiar to gain another ambush, from whence it will cost ten more lives to dislodge him, and so on."

Within the shelter of such natural fortifications as these, the Modoc Indians must prove a difficult and dangerous foe to conquer.

English ladies traveling without protectors have adopted a novel method of self-defense. A short time ago a country clergyman of middle age, unquestionable antecedents, and professional appearance found himself in a railway carriage with two maiden ladies of uncertain age. There were no lamps in the carriage, and the ladies appeared very apprehensive in the matter of tunnels. At length the train plunged into darkness, when the clerical passenger was horrified to find that one of his fellow-travelers suddenly turned a bull's-eye lantern upon him. "You will excuse us," said the female with the bull's-eye, "but although you appear to be very respectable, still there are so many wolves in sheep's clothing going about that, whenever we get into tunnels, we prepare for the worst." The terrified parson left the carriage at the first opportunity.

Stories of the big trees of California do not diminish. The Calaveras Big Tree Grove covers 160 acres, and has 98 trees. Five miles distant from this is the South Calaveras Grove, which covers 800 acres, and includes 1380 trees. Many trees are over thirty feet in diameter. One fallen tree is hollow, and the cavity is so large that six horses can walk abreast for more than a hundred feet.

Many familiar psalm tunes were composed by Professor Albert I. Sumner, one of the victims of the Atlantic disaster, among which may be mentioned Ahwaga, Maestoso, Isbell, Jubilate Deo, and Come, ye Disconsolate. Professor Sumner had been sojourning in Germany for a few years past for the purpose of completing his musical studies. While in Dresden he was appointed organist to one of the first churches in the city. In writing to his friends two days before he took passage on the doomed steamer, he said:

"I left Dresden last Thursday. I need not tell you I was sorry to do so. You know already how I have enjoyed my stay. My German friends were very sad at my departure. A crowd of them accompanied me to the station.... Well, good-by to my halcyon days in Europe. I hope you will find they have not been misspent. I dread the long voyage across the Atlantic, but look forward to seeing you all in health and safety."

The nitro-glycerine designed for use in the submarine excavations at Hell Gate is stored in quantities in a small building erected on a reef known as Flood Rock, situated in the middle of the river. When cartridges are to be filled it is carried to the nitro-glycerine laboratory. The floor of this room is covered with a thick layer of dry plaster of Paris, which serves to absorb and render harmless any drops that may fall upon it. Within the apartment an equable temperature of from 65° to 70° is maintained, steam-pipes, carefully guarded, affording the necessary heat in winter, and ice serving to lessen the warmth in summer. The thermometer is the principal safeguard, for if in cold weather the nitro-glycerine is allowed to fall below the abovementioned temperature, it is liable not to explode when fired, while if it should become heated to excess, spontaneous combustion may ensue. The number of cartridges made depends upon the requirements of the work, varying from 100 to 250 a day. Of course the greatest care is needful in handling this powerful and dangerous compound, which is about thirteen times more powerful than gunpowder.

During the official investigation of the Atlantic disaster the following statement was made by Captain Williams: "We consider ourselves lucky if we get ten good seamen among forty taken on board; this is so with all the lines. Since the abolition of apprenticing, seamen have deteriorated." If such is the case, there is some reason for this lack of worthy seamen, which should be carefully considered, and remedies be applied, if possible.

Brigham Young has made his will, dividing his immense property equally among his sixteen wives and sixty children, and carefully stipulating the method of division.

One of the Bidwells, recently arrested for forgeries on the Bank of England, has often appeared in the rôle of a Baptist minister. When swindling operations failed, from time to time, in this country, he resorted to preaching, which was a never-failing resource under his peculiar management.

A gentleman of Newport, Rhode Island, recently died at the age of eighty-one, leaving by will $75,000 to those poor people of the city of Newport "who are too honest to steal and too proud to beg." The executors may have some difficulty in distributing this singular bequest.

Facts seem to indicate that vessels sheathed with American iron possess a toughness and power of resistance greater than English-built vessels. Perhaps further experiments may be necessary to prove this conclusively, but some incidents have already occurred to test the strength of American iron. Not long ago the steamer Wilmington, built at Wilmington, Delaware, and heavily laden, ran with great force upon a Florida reef. Instead, however, of having her bottom stove in, admitting a rush of water and sinking the ship, like the unfortunate steamer Atlantic, the vessel "pounded" about upon the rocks for twelve hours, and when she was finally released by throwing a portion of the cargo overboard, it was found, on arriving at Havana, that although dented and bulged some, not an iron plate was broken, or even cracked. Last January the English ship Potomac, in ascending the river to Philadelphia, came in contact with ice, which cut through the iron plates of her bow, and wedged itself in the open fracture. The steamer Gulf Stream, built on the Delaware River, and a smaller vessel than the Potomac, plunged through the same ice-fields uninjured, and hauled the Potomac out.

Borax is an extensive article of commerce, and the recent discovery of large borax deposits in California and Nevada will prove an important source of wealth.

Census statistics indicate that there are no less than 97,000 women whose employment is sewing, 90,000 who are milliners and dressmakers, and 84,000 teachers. There are only 10,170 who are nurses. Women properly trained as nurses would find call for their services, and receive far better compensation than in many other overcrowded occupations.

PARIS FASHIONS.

[From our Own Correspondent.]

NEVER has Fashion been so independent as this year; and as people wear precisely what they like, they are not even forbidden to wear garments which they have had in their possession for many years, and which have been laid by hitherto as having gone out of fashion. But at present there is nothing out of fashion, and to prove this I will point out to my readers how to adapt these cast-off articles to the requirements of modern style.

Over polonaises and waists of all kinds may be worn, in the guise of wrappings, even for the street, old-fashioned high-necked fichus (that is, those adjusted in the neck), both of embroidered white muslin and of black lace. The first are worn with light and the second with dark dresses. The fichu is tied in front, half-way up the waist. If it is large, the ends are crossed in front, and if they are long enough, are tied behind, or are left hanging on each side.

Fig. 2.—Black Crape Hat.—[See Fig. 11, Page 309.]

If a person has a dress without an over-skirt, and a black lace scarf, the scarf is made to complete the toilette, and to take the place of the over-skirt by associating it with the fichu. The scarf is fastened in the middle to the belt of the dress in front, and is tied behind in a large bow. This forms a sort of small over-skirt, which is very graceful if the wearer knows how to drape it properly. In the absence of a scarf a point of black lace may form the over-skirt. This is put on with the point in front to form the tablier, and the ends are tied behind as near as possible to the belt, or are caught together and left hanging their full length.

Black lace that has grown rusty or gray from wear may be restored by folding it carefully in one direction, then tacking the packet together with white thread, and plunging it into a bath of beer, where it is left for twenty-four hours. It is then stretched on pins and left to dry, without ironing, if the article is small. If it is too large for this, it must be ironed lightly, while still damp, with a moderately warm iron.

A real improvement has been made in gloves. The buttons are riveted instead of sewed on, and, consequently, are no longer in danger of ripping off. The most common way of cleaning them is to wash them in benzine, and to hang them in the air for the odor to evaporate. This year gloves are worn very long, and are consequently excessively dear. Those with three buttons are considered indispensable even for the street, and fashionable ladies wear them with five, six, and even eight buttons, so as to cover the arm. This prolongation is the result of the enlargement of the sleeves. A new glove, which is very convenient for summer wear, is known at Paris by the name of the regeneration glove, for the reason that it can be washed again and again in a basin with soap and water like a pocket-handkerchief. These gloves are made of buckskin, and resemble undressed kid.

Fig. 1.—Black Lace Bonnet.

For elegant négligé toilettes the fancy of the season will be dark blue percale, almost black—in a word, of the same color as our peasants' blouses. These costumes will be variations of the following general style: Skirt of plain blue percale, trimmed with one deep or several pleated flounces, the pleats being fastened two-thirds of the way from the top, and left loose the rest of the way. Open polonaise or closed tunic of percale of the same color, but with large white polka dots or lozenges. This dress, despite, or perhaps because of, its apparent simplicity, will be adopted by the leaders of fashion as a morning toilette. The same combination is made in prune percale, but very dark blue is the favorite color. It will be understood that the pleated flounces which trim the skirt and polonaise are flat, since they are sewed almost their whole length, and consequently are not easily rumpled, and can be ironed quickly. The stores this year are filled with unique and beautiful fabrics of new and peculiar tints—canvas guipures, damask foulards, grenadines with lace figures, failles with broad lace and watered stripes, etc. As to the shades, they baffle all description. I will only say that whether one gives a name to a color or not, it remains undecided, for so many colors melt into one that it is difficult to know which is the prevailing tint. Decided colors of a single shade are considered frightful. We no longer know blue, green, gray, and pink; green is Undine, argentine, and brouillard; blue is ocean or Indian sky; pink is ashes-of-rose; lilac is Ophelia or peach blossom; yellow has paled into Nilsson, or else has turned of a greenish hue, and is called reptile, perroquet, Egyptian, or Arabian. But of all these colors the preference is given to réséda green and vert-de-gris in their various shades. Besides the elegant toilettes composed of these various exquisite summer fabrics, there are many simple dresses designed for young girls, who will largely wear muslin de laine, an inexpensive, light, and graceful stuff. I will describe a dress of this kind lately ordered by one of my friends, a rich and elegant lady, for her daughter, a young girl of fifteen: Skirt of fine dark blue percale with white stripes, trimmed round the bottom, the tablier excepted, by two pleated flounces. The tablier was formed of perpendicular pleats. Above each flounce was a band of plain blue percale, piped on each side with white, and headed with a narrow upright pleating of the same percale. To wear with this skirt the young girl had two polonaises, one of dark blue muslin de laine of the same color as the percale skirt, and the other of white muslin de laine—the first for cloudy and threatening weather, and the second for bright warm days. With the first polonaise there was a small mantelet, also of dark blue muslin de laine. The second had no mantelet, but was trimmed with a band of white nansook, scalloped and embroidered. The blue polonaise was trimmed with a pleated flounce and wide worsted braid. Dark blue is often trimmed with écru, and écru itself is trimmed with brown or white worsted braid. May sashes of écru linen, fringed with silk, and trimmed on the ends with application of white guipure, are also in preparation; these will be worn with white or écru dresses. Sashes, broader and more ornamented than ever, seem inseparable from all dresses, whatever may be their degree of elegance or simplicity. They are artistically embroidered by hand with flowers in silk of the natural colors. Many sashes are also seen of two shades, with alternate thin and thick stripes; others have large squares of écru, shading to white; in short, they are made of every imaginable fabric and color, with all kinds of trimming, guipure application, silk embroidery, cord, soutache, and even bead embroidery, etc. Color is used on color, or else a different color harmonizing with that of the sash.

Fig. 3.—Gray Crape Hat.—[See Fig. 8, Page 309.]

One of the most elegant trimmings of the season consists of the use of bands of feathers as headings for flounces. There is nothing new, indeed, in these bands, except that they are of the natural colors of the bird without being dyed, and are consequently of a grayish écru. These bands are used on linen batiste suits of the same shade.

For very warm weather polonaises will be worn loose in front and adjusted in the back, either with a skirt of the same material, or with a silk skirt, if the polonaise is one of the new fabrics too flimsy for a skirt. For simple dresses of this kind the polonaise will be trimmed only with a bias fold of the same material but a darker shade; this fold, which is wide at the bottom, grows narrower till it reaches the belt, when it widens again from the belt to the neck, where it simulates revers or a sailor collar. For a more dressy polonaise the fronts are embroidered with silk or cord of a darker shade. Plain white muslin dresses will be made in this manner. Printed muslin suits will consist of an elaborately trimmed skirt and a short, loose casaque, confined at the waist by a sash to match.

PARTY GIVING.

PARTY givers have many difficulties with which to contend. The first difficulty is fixing a day. Society in a large city comprises a great number of people, and two or even three parties take place on the same night without materially interfering with each other. But, nevertheless, no hostess likes, when her day is fixed and her friends asked, to hear that a bigger than she has suddenly selected her day, and will take away many if not all of those whose presence she hoped would increase the pleasure or the reputation of her party. There are some houses which have tacitly conceded to them the privilege of throwing themselves open (with degrees of wideness) with the shortest possible warning. When it is announced on Monday that the owner of one of these is going to "have a small dance" on Wednesday, there is weeping and gnashing of teeth in the house of the hostess of Wednesday, who knows quite well that many of her "nice people" will be attracted away.

A far greater difficulty, and one for which there is no such inevitable reason, lies in the arrangement and grouping of invitations. These are always best managed when the mistress of the house does them herself, or there are "young ladies" who will take them in hand. Sometimes, however, when this is not possible, the invitations are well managed from a formal list. This system, however, leads to curious results. From one house, where an old list was used, cards were sent to people who had done with parties forever, and others were asked under names which had long ago ceased to be theirs. And from another cards were sent to some persons who were decidedly not intended to be present, but who happened to have similar names to those who were. This system, moreover, has all the disadvantages of formality, and prevents the feeling that the hospitality springs directly from the friendship of the hostess and the host.

Mistakes, however, will happen even when the invitations are entirely managed by "mamma and the girls." "We did not see you at our dance the other night, my dear Mrs. Smith—oh no, I forgot. Rudolphina left all the S's under the sofa, and they were found there next morning."

Then there is the difficulty of adapting numbers to the size of the rooms. A party which is too empty is called a failure. A party which is too full can never be very nice. One way out of this dilemma which is often attempted is to have two instead of one. But people are often discontented at this plan, and think that they are asked to the wrong one, or else that they ought to be among the select few who are asked to both. Nothing is more unpleasant than a party which is too crowded. A "crush" without dancing is tolerable; but to attempt to dance in a place five feet by three is as inconvenient for the dancers as a perpetual squeeze is to chaperons. It may safely be calculated that twenty per cent. more people than are asked in the first instance will eventually appear, and the original list ought to be calculated accordingly.

It sometimes happens that a popular hostess determines to have "just a few people," the "smallest thing in the world," and is rash enough to tell this interesting fact to one or two friends. The secret oozes out, and the unfortunate lady has to choose between mortally offending several of her dearest acquaintances, who would resent being left out from any thing especially select, and seeing her little party swell to abnormal dimensions.

One of the most important changes which society—in the restricted sense of the word—has undergone of late years is its enlargement. The barriers which were formerly only opened to or by a few are now rarely prohibitive. And the power of wealth to pass where it will is far greater than it was a few generations ago. One result of this is that every year there take place one or two parties given by persons whose wealth is as yet their sole claim to notoriety, but who seek a reputation in society, and friends or acquaintances among those whose position is not due solely to money. These persons have at first a hard task. The most lavish expenditure and the greatest possible taste will be all in vain if "people don't go." The fatal criticism, "No one was there," is enough to nullify every effort, and make every expenditure resultless. It is, however, in modern times rarely the case that no good friend, herself of established position, can be found able and willing to canvass for guests of the required calibre. The would-be hosts, therefore, are sure to find some means of making the excellence of their hospitality known, and, have they only perseverance and lavishness, are sure ere long to find their rooms thronged with persons who but a short time previous to their appearance would not have dreamed of being present. The process is of course gradual, and can not be carried out in one year or two, but it is almost sure to succeed in the end.

THE FORGET-ME-NOT.

FLOR MODESTA Y DELICADA.

SWEET flower, whose azure eyes are seen
Soft peering through those lids of green
So modestly!
Thou heedest not the revelries
Of glancing birds and singing bees.
'Tis thine to be
The comfort of the absent—thine
Not to adorn the warrior's shrine,
But, happier lot!
Upon the snowy, heaving breast
Of gentle maid to smile and rest—
Forget-me-not!

Oft wand'ring on a foreign shore,
The exile's eye-balls, brimming o'er
With sudden tears,
Look upon thee, and thoughts of home
In melancholy visions come
In doubts and fears.
Thou gatherest up thine own perfumes,
Shrinking from sunlight that illumes
The neighboring spot.
Sweet flower of memory, whisper now
Thy gentle name in accents low—
Forget-me-not!

Thou art a mystical record
Of promised faith and plighted word,
Pleasure and pain;
And sometimes, musing over thee,
A half-effaced felicity
Revives again;
And early dreams and smiles of youth,
And sunny rays of light and truth,
That were forgot,
Like ashes kindled into flame,
Brighten—so tell me thy sweet name—
Forget-me-not!

ADELAIDE.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

PERHAPS Adelaide Fordyce's step-mother did not know how to pardon her the fact of existence, and wreaked revenge upon the child for the circumstance of her father's ever having loved her mother. The thing was something too hateful for her to be willing to do any thing but forgive it when she could forget it; and here was this child alive to keep it in perpetual remembrance.

It may be she meant to do right, but selfishness with her was like those strange unguents which enlarge the retina of the eye to blindness; for by long indulgence Mrs. Fordyce's selfishness had so grown upon her that she realized the situation and the needs of no one but Mrs. Fordyce.

When Mr. Fordyce died, and left no will, I am almost ashamed to tell you that his widow produced one which gave her the child and the property, and that she must have been an adept in all such arts; for the forgery was so exact and the arrangements so complete, both of the witnesses being dead, that it was many years before any one ever thought of questioning the will.

Part of Mr. Fordyce's property was derived from his first wife; the whole of it had come from that seedling; and Adelaide, in all equity its only heir, could not have so much as a shoe-lace without obsequious obligation to a person who conducted herself like a natural enemy; for now that Adelaide had passed her twentieth year, and her beauty had become something so exactly like that wonderfully sweet and high-bred beauty in her mother's portrait—a portrait ignominiously transferred to the garret on the day of Mr. Fordyce's funeral—her existence was something harder than ever to pardon.

However, whether she meant to do right or not, Mrs. Fordyce knew that she was in the public eye to a certain extent, and Adelaide had, therefore, been well educated; more than that, she had been tutored within an inch of her life, so to speak, and she was so well up in all the proprieties that if her grace of nature had not been something impossible to quench she would have been a starched and stiff nonentity. But as it was, I think she was simply perfection, with enough spirit to keep all trace of insipidity out of her sweetness, and with enough sweetness left to temper her propriety into a stately elegance.

It is true that Adelaide had no great accessories to this elegance of hers, for her toilette was usually of the simplest, and of jewels she had none at all; but once in a while she spent a season at her uncle Maunder's—Mrs. Fordyce equally divided between dislike of her going to see her mother's sister and dislike of her staying at home—and there she was clad and prepared for conquest by an aunt who, having lost her own daughters, was quite ready to idolize Adelaide.

It was at Mr. Maunder's that Adelaide first met young Dracut, long years before he had been sent home on a furlough with some wounds received in such gallant action that he had been personally complimented by the Secretary, and at the same time promoted to his lieutenancy in the navy. The Dracuts had the next place to Mr. Maunder's, and the boys were such boon companions that Mr. Maunder's house was almost as much Dick Dracut's home as his own father's was. Here, summer after summer, he had seen Adelaide. They had picked the wild roses together as children, swung in the same swing, waded in the same stream; later they had read the same book, floated in the same boat, sung the same songs, and they could hardly recall the time when they were not promised to each other for husband and wife. There had been none of the attracting airs and graces of most maidens in her behavior, none of the approaching arts and disguises of most youths in his, no delicious twilight tremors of doubt and fear in their courtship—it was all clear shining sunrise, a sort of absolute certainty, where each was too thoroughly a part of the other ever to be of divided heart or life.

Of course Mrs. Fordyce was aware of something of this, though, having always repelled confidence, possibly nothing very definite had been said to her on the subject. If she had suffered it to go on, it was because of the popular notion that to oppose a fancy of the kind makes it a fixed fact, and because she could not very well help herself. But she had no idea of allowing the thing to be permanently as the lovers had arranged. Lieutenant Dracut by no means suited her as a husband for Adelaide. In the first place, to speak of no other objections, he had nothing, and would have nothing for a long while, but his profession, and the exigencies of want or of spendthrift habits might eventually lead him to question the will she had produced. She preferred a rich husband, to whom the property that she unrighteously held would be so small a matter that it would escape his attention, and such a husband she had in her mind—a man, too, whom she could manipulate in some degree. And partly, then, to secure her own safety, and partly to have her own way, and because she was happier in thwarting Adelaide than in any thing else, she had settled the matter with Mr. Thurstane, and only awaited a favorable opportunity to have her will with Adelaide. Just now Mr. Thurstane was within the cordon of the Southern Confederacy, whither he had gone to save certain large possessions in cotton that might be lost without his personal supervision, and where he found reason for remaining; but Mrs. Fordyce and he had long since understood each other in relation to a marriage with Adelaide, and their plans were all arranged, to be pursued if need be. That Mr. Thurstane was twice her step-daughter's age, was little and lean, and blear-eyed and broken-nosed, had been profligate and was disgusting, mattered not a whit to Mrs. Fordyce. "She may think herself lucky with any thing," said that model woman, having come to believe that Adelaide had no more right to be in the world than any unnamed foundling.

Not so Adelaide. She felt her life and her identity, her right to them and her joy in them, through every pore. She was young and happy, and she threw the rose-color of her own atmosphere even over such things as Mrs. Fordyce, and failed to see any thing very bad or cruel in the world. She was at her uncle Maunder's, as I have said, when the young lieutenant came home from hospital nearly cured, and needing only a little care and sunshine—care that he received on every hand, and sunshine such as he knew how to find in Adelaide's smile. He had a long furlough, it seemed to him; and now with the fortunes of war to come again at the end of it, he believed it the best thing for them to complete their happiness and to make their lives one, as their hearts were.

As he looked at her while he thus urged their speedy marriage, he half wondered which were the greater bliss—to be the artist who should paint her, or the lover who should marry her; but he knew very well which. Yet the artist would have been an enviable person, for a lovelier creature never stepped the earth than this young woman was, than she was even when I first saw her years after the day she stood hesitating and listening to her lover. Tall, but of such proportion, so round and flexible, that you did not think how tall; with a throat whose curve had the hint of a swan's throat and a swan's song in it; with a stately head that was rippled over with brown gold, in whose waves a ruddy splendor was lit; with a high and shining forehead such as angels are painted with, but with most human dimples in the cheeks, where a constant color came and went in all the shifting blushes of some roseate aurora; with long-lashed eyes jewel-clear and night-dark; with a mouth like a velvet and crimson flower, and a profile at once so arch and so innocent that one was never tired of making out its charm; with a smile whose brilliance made all this beauty radiant, and a voice whose music made it all alive—young Dracut, or old Thurstane either, would have been of the clods to be insensible to her when such a creature breathed the same air; and certainly young Dracut was nothing of the kind.

"It is April now," said he. "If we can have our wedding very soon indeed, there is such a summer before us here in these woods, on this river! And we can take the bridal trip to the nearest coaling station when I go back to the Schoodiac, and there from time to time I shall see my darling's face."

"No, no; you mustn't be thinking of such a thing," said Adelaide.

"You mean I should be throwing my coal into the sea so as to be coming for more? No, that would be too rough life for my girl, after all. But, seriously, there is nothing to hinder, now I have my promotion."

"Only that you know I am no more of age and free now than ever—"

"A great deal more," said Dick, putting a period to her sentence, after a way he had—a way to which Adelaide did not seem to object. "Days, weeks, months, more. But I can't imagine why that need part us: you are your own mistress, or would be, if you didn't belong to me, and all the Mrs. Fordyces in creation shall not say me nay!"

"But, I suppose, out of respect to her as my father's wife, it ought to be at home."

"Any where, any where, so long as it is to be at all."

And then the happy creatures went singing about the house from room to room all day, and when they looked in each other's face they found themselves smiling with such sheer happiness that they laughed outright. And in the evening train Adelaide went home to make ready, and to inform her step-mother, carrying the proper applications from the lieutenant, and vouchers from Mr. Maunder.

But Mrs. Fordyce was not the person to inform of a determination; it was she who made determinations; and if Adelaide expected to have her way without a contest, she was quite mistaken. To do her justice, she had not expected it.

"I never heard of any thing so preposterous!" exclaimed the worthy woman, as Adelaide, with some faltering and many blushes, explained her errand home, standing by the window, and pulling down the marandias from the basket overhead. "Married to a man on a furlough given for wounds?" said Mrs. Fordyce. "It is indecent! He wants you for a nurse, does he? I will write Lieutenant Dracut to get his nurses from the hospitals; the Fordyces have other things to attend to—"

"Mamma!"

"Who is he, anyway?" cried Mrs. Fordyce, fanning herself with her handkerchief in her wrath. "Let the marandias alone, Adelaide. Who are the Dracuts? Commonplace name—people, I dare say, whose 'blood has crept through scoundrels ever since the flood!'"

"Not if their descendants are witnesses for them, mamma," said Adelaide, calmly. "The Dracuts, Uncle Maunder says, are one of those famous families from the islands of the Mediterranean who furnished captains to all the old sea-rangers of the Middle Ages."

"Just so. Pirates!"

"No more than Sir Francis Drake or Sir Richard Saltonstall, or any of Queen Elizabeth's knights, mamma. For any thing we know to the contrary, they were men in command, and living like princes, when the Fordyces were digging dykes."

"You shameless girl! Whatever the Fordyces were, I know what they are; and they are going to have no marriages with Dracuts, that I can assure them!"

"Mamma, I came here in order to treat you kindly and—"

"You treat me!"

"And respectfully. But certainly you must excuse me," said Adelaide, her eyes overflowing, "if I say you may go too far. I believe I am able to do as I please now; but, without any doubt, in three months I am, for then I shall be twenty-one years old."

Mrs. Fordyce grew a little yellower at such unheard-of rebellion. She thought she had Adelaide in better training. But she was usually a more prudent woman than this, only anger and surprise had gotten the better of her for a moment now.

"Adelaide," she said, after a short silence, "I want you to be reasonable. Look at the thing. Is it wiser for you to marry a penniless and extravagant lieutenant, who may be shot in his next engagement, and leave you with no portion but beggary—for I should wash my hands of you—or a gentleman like Mr. Thurstane" (Adelaide shuddered; Mrs. Fordyce took no notice of the shudder, but went on) "—a gentleman who could and would settle half a million on you, give you rivers of diamonds, give you cashmeres, velvets, a magnificent house, equipages, all the luxuries you value—"

"Can you imagine," said Adelaide, "that I should hesitate one moment?"

"A man, too," said Mrs. Fordyce, "whom your father wished you should at some time marry."

"That is impossible. He never wished it."

"Stop a minute, Adelaide. It is you who are going too far when you doubt my word."

"It is idle talking, mamma. I shall never marry such a despicable person, and you know it."

"Adelaide," said Mrs. Fordyce then, in a final argument, "just now you are in love, and think you could give the world for love, and count it well lost. Now love is all very well while it lasts—and it lasts a year or two. Then there come children, bills, deprivations, ill temper, little neglects, criminations and recriminations, and it doesn't last any longer. The most you can expect at the close of four or five years is a quiet friendship with your husband, fortunate, indeed, if you have so much as that, after a great deal of suffering and wrenching and heart-breaking over the destruction of love. Now," said this able advocate of Mr. Thurstane's cause, "why is it not as well to discount those four or five years, their pleasure and their pain, and begin with the friendship and the half million?"

"Mamma, I can not believe that it is my father's wife who speaks."

"Very well, then," said Mrs. Fordyce, her patience quite exhausted, as who should say, "Your blood be on your own head," and with such an angry snarl in her voice and on her face as belongs to hyenas, and not to men and women—"very well, then; if gentle means will not do, there are others to pursue. You may go to your room, and out of it you shall not come again except to marry Mr. Thurstane!"

Adelaide gathered up her wraps from the table, where she had dropped them, and swept away, with flashing eyes and scarlet cheeks. War was declared, and as to yielding—she would be torn piecemeal first. In the morning she would return to her uncle's, and her marriage could as well take place there as elsewhere, though she would have liked to have it where the grave, kind eyes in her father's portrait could look down on her. She had done, she felt, the whole of her duty to Mrs. Fordyce.

But that night as Adelaide slept she dreamed that she was in the dentist's chair, bound down helplessly, and all at once the house seemed to be burning, and the smoke drifting in about her, and choking her, and stifling her, and destroying her—and then all dreaming ceased in stupor, and Mrs. Fordyce took the chloroform sponge away, dressed the girl as she could by her own maid's help, and then, with the maid and coachman, carried her down and deposited her in the coach, on which the trunks, already packed, were strapped. It was afterward learned that a passing night train received a lady and her sick daughter and two servants, and it was believed that an invalid who, on the next day, her face well covered by veils, was borne on a mattress down the wharves to a great ship, with her mother and maid and man servant, as the three purported to be, was doubtless of the same party. But there all pursuit ended, for no such name as Fordyce was on any list of passengers, and no such people were any where seen. It was only known that after Adelaide went to her room on the night of her return from her uncle's, Mrs. Fordyce had paid and dismissed the house servants, and had dispatched a note to the rector of the parish saying that the receipt of important news from Germany, where a large portion of the late Mr. Fordyce's railroad bonds were held, obliged them to cross the sea without delay. The fact that she had thus so particularly stated her destination, under the circumstances, caused every one interested to doubt that she had gone over-seas at all, as perhaps she had intended it should, for Mrs. Fordyce had what the country people call a long head, and knew that very frequently the open course is the most hidden, and, counting on the ways of detectives, after their hearing all that her servants could detail of her stormy conversation with Adelaide, had calculated that if she had said she was going to stay at home they would certainly have sought her at the ends of the earth. Meanwhile there was room and time for any doubts of Adelaide's love and truth that young Dracut chose to entertain.

He chose to entertain none. He never questioned for an instant that she had been made the victim of foul play, though loath at first to believe that it could be her father's widow who made her so. Together with Mr. Maunder, he scoured town and country for her. All the detectives of any real worth were on the scent. He forgot his wounds and his health, and gained health in forgetting them. He spent every thing that he had in the search, and at last regained the Schoodiac in a state of mind that bordered on despair—that would have been despair if he had not had such faith in Adelaide that he was sure neither height, nor depth, nor principalities, nor powers could keep her away from him forever. But it was long and lonesome waiting in those summer months when he had promised himself such happiness. Now when he could not even cheat trouble by the fancy that he was doing something to recover her, life was insupportable, and the only way in which he knew how to escape himself was in some downright and tremendous work. But as if he were the very sport of chance, the Schoodiac, instead of being ordered into any hot and dangerous duty, was sent in aid of the blockading squadron, and he had a loitering, lingering service, where he could pace the deck and do little but dream dreams—dreams of holding her once more in his arms, of feeling her soft breath on his cheek, her sweet warm mouth on his—from all of which he woke to bitter reality. If he could only have known where Adelaide was; if she was well; if she was alive; if their separation was inevitable; if there was nothing he could do to regain her—it would have been better with him. He would even have been glad to learn that she did not suffer—for not to suffer meant not to love—but he knew that her sufferings must be even worse than his own to bear; and he cursed Mrs. Fordyce, and he almost prayed to Adelaide; and in the lonely night-watches under the stars and the clouds he found himself oppressed with a longing and melancholy that bade fair to drive him mad.

By day the fleet rolled out at sea, remote from the enemy's guns; by night its vessels stretched their sails and made silently in till they swung in a long line along the harbor's mouth. Sometimes they sighted or chased a prize; sometimes they overhauled one; sometimes they sounded suspicious shallows, skirted a reef, eluded the moon; and the rest was tireless monotony. It would not do for Dracut. He declared to himself—for he was not the sort of man who takes confidants into his love affairs—that his fancies and fears concerning Adelaide, the terrible anxieties preying on him, the helpless longing and suspense, would soon send him down in a shotted shroud unless he could find some serious work to do. It was in accordance with this idea that he planned, and obtained consent to carry his plan into execution, a trip up the rebel river whose two mouths they guarded, to the environs of the fortified town, where they might capture a mail on its way, and possibly learn something of the hostile intentions and of the whereabouts of the richly laden ships that were perpetually going in and out under their very eyes, and were yet hardly ever to be seen, since their color so mingled with the grays and violets of seas and skies, and they were handled moreover with such consummate skill by men who knew every sand-bar along the coast so well that they could have told you whether the particles of sand were cubes or octahedrons; and so, taking a boat's crew with him, having previously sounded and explored nearly the whole distance alone, he crept in under cover of the dark night, whose waning moon had not yet risen, passed the forts, and reached the neighborhood of the town, whose great fortifications swarmed with soldiery.

Concealing his boat beneath the bank, Lieutenant Dracut stationed his men in the woods adjoining the highway, and without the least shadow of difficulty made captive the first mail-carrier and his mail-bag. The enterprise was beginning to have a zest for the lieutenant then. He had copies of defenses, plans of movements, and general information of the most valuable character. He had gotten them at hazard of life; he kept them at still greater hazard; and he had learned, moreover, that Mr. James Thurstane, the great cotton-buyer, was expecting every day his blockade-runner, the Fox-hound, Captain Ross in command, which was to bring him from England, in exchange for his last cotton, a cargo of arms valued at nearly a million dollars. Lieutenant Dracut's heart was in his throat; his pulses beat as if they were filled with liquid fire; he felt confident that this Thurstane had something, had every thing, to do with his wrongs. To avenge himself by even so much as the destruction of one of the ships of the scoundrel seemed worth hope and heaven itself. He could not wait in any patience for the day to be done. He felt exactly as if Adelaide were within reach of his hand, and he must be putting it forth to grasp her. He knew, at any rate, that every blow dealt Thurstane must help to knock away her fetters, if it were, as he could not doubt, that man who was implicated in her disappearance.

The enterprise was beginning to have a zest with a vengeance. Leaving the mail-carrier bound to a tree where the first passers of the morning must see him—and sure that the passers were not few, since he and his men had had reason to quake at voices many a time during the day as they lay perdu—giving the man some water, and removing his gag, the young lieutenant regained his boat in safety with the nightfall, and proceeded to drop quietly down the river.

"In daily expectation," he repeated to himself; "in daily expectation. Aha, Mr. Thurstane! If I can but capture the pilots who raise and lower the signal-lights on the outer bluff, you may remain in daily expectation a little longer yet!" And as they rowed softly down in the shadow of the bank he tasked his brain to devise a scheme by which his wishes might be accomplished.

All at once, as if fortune would really help those that help themselves, a boat shot out into the middle of the stream from the opposite side. Dracut bade his men hang on their oars while he watched the boat, and presently made out its occupants to be the very men he wanted, the pilots, who, having raised the customary signal-lights to tell any incoming vessel that all was safe for their approach, had come out now to replace a buoy which a passing tug had apparently uptorn—the very men, he could have sworn, for he had seen their faces a score of times when out upon his lonely adventures, either with his glass at a distance, or when lying hidden in the long grass and reeds of the shores. A moment's brief consultation now, and then moving forward with great sweeping strokes, the ship's boat was laid alongside the other; there was a sharp tussle, and the pilots were his prisoners.

Of course this had not taken place, short and sharp as the little action was, without attracting observation from the shore, for they had just passed Fort Kneutzen, and were at that point of the river where an island—whether formed of the wash of the sea or the débris brought down by the current—divided the channel into two streams, one of which opened on the main sea through half a mile of dangerous breakers, while the other ran more quietly down some six or seven well-sheltered miles of smooth water before it found a bar. Knowing their boat and their skill, it was the channel through the short stretch of breakers they had been about to attempt, rather than try half a dozen miles more of tedious rowing under the guns of countless batteries, and of the two great forts at the lower extremities of the main-land and the island, when suddenly they saw another boat pushing out from the shore a little ahead, followed by another and another, till a string of them lay across the upper channel and interrupted the way like a wall. Instead of dealing destruction upon others, the lieutenant had nothing but destruction before himself. He saw it all, and perhaps his hand shook at the helm a little, but his heart never trembled.

The moon was just rising over the dark low banks. He surveyed the scene a moment, loath to be taken, loath to surrender his purposes, thinking how he might escape here and succeed hereafter; then, in a breath, he darted out boldly into the light, made a broad, swift detour, and put the boat's head down the other and longer channel-way, in a moment more had run her into the shadow of the dense thicket along the bank, had turned her about, was pulling softly back again to his starting-place, and while the other boats, one and all, were following their supposed prey down the long main channel, he was dashing out between the breakers. When the enemy discovered their error, it was too late to repair it; for, manned by soldiers from Fort Kneutzen, their boats had no ability to follow the dangerous path where the lieutenant led, and, after a little swearing and disputing, they returned to their quarters discomfited.

But in the moment when the lieutenant had given the word and dashed away, chancing to look up, he had seen, far and faint in the distance across the island's length, the great signal-lights swinging from their height upon the outer bluff, signaling to some hovering blockade-runner that the coast was clear. He divined that they had been there already some hours, since the pilots who raised them, and then left them in order to come up and replace the buoy, could hardly be other than those now in the bottom of his boat. Signaling what blockade-runner? Could it be any but the Fox-hound? Indeed, it might be another; but that one he knew was due, and it was worth risking life and all for. It was, indeed, something more than life he risked every moment that he delayed on this adventure, for death might come at any time—dishonorable death he hoped never; yet had he been taken with those plans and specifications torn from the mail-bag, he was well aware that a long rope and a short shrift would have been his portion.

But whether or no, with the sight of those signal-lamps Lieutenant Dracut had resolved that when he went through those breakers it would be in the blockade-runner, and not in his boat; and he turned about to take counsel at last with his men—all volunteers and hearts of oak. "You see the signal-lights?" he said. "That means the Fox-hound. Or, if it is not she, another has come up, and is waiting for these pilots now. The Fox-hound's cargo is worth a million dollars in any port, with the vessel thrown into the bargain. Shall we have her?" And an eager "Ay, ay, Sir!" assured him that he could trust them all as himself.

Waiting, then, till the last boat of the enemy had been beached beneath the fort, the lieutenant again turned his own boat about, and crossed the moon-lit space once more in all possible speed, and, as he hoped, unperceived, and was presently safe in the shadow, and creeping under the lee of the other side of the island. Here he paused and addressed the two pilots; and having informed them that he would hang them on the nearest branch of cotton-wood if they refused to comply with his demands, he put the boat's head to shore and flung out a coil of rope upon their hestitation; and whether it was his prompt conduct and blazing eyes, or their own abject fear, that overcame them, they promised obedience on the spot, and one of the crew was detailed as their overseer, to make an end of them on the first symptom of revolt. Then the boat was put down stream again. Once or twice they were hailed from a masked battery, but the pilots, after looking up the muzzle of a six-shooter, gave the necessary pass-word, and finally, on rounding a curve of the reedy shore where cypresses veiled in moss hung over the brink and intercepted all view, there lay the long, low blockade-runner, her sails backed, as she now and then impatiently sent up a rocket, and waited for her pilot up the stream, whose snags and shallows in smooth water were as dangerous to her as a lee shore in a storm. Half an hour afterward the pilots and their overseer were on the deck of the Fox-hound; and if they had meant to do any treacherous mischief, they were not quick enough, for the lieutenant and his men had clambered up close upon their heels, had overpowered the officer of the watch and the handful of sailors idling on the deck—for a night attack has always imagined hosts at command, since darkness and boldness are an army in themselves—and had the ship in their own hands. Then the sails slowly filled again; the Fox-hound was beating up the river against the wind; had reached the head of the island that divided the channel; her next watch had come on deck at the stroke of the bell, and had been seized and ironed in their turn, with swiftness and almost with silence. It was a quick and desperate hour; every man was posted where he could do the best service. There had been little scuffling, little talking—for people do not talk much up the mouth of a pistol. The Fox-hound came up to the head of the island, rounded the upper point; then her course was laid for the short channel, down which she flew, the wind behind her, with all sail filled and every rope stretched, her new commander knowing that channel thoroughly, and knowing that if the wind held for fifteen minutes more there was room and water enough to take them out, though presently the waves would be churning white on either side of them. Then, before the roar of the breakers should strike the ears of those banqueting below, Lieutenant Dracut, with his boatswain at his elbow, went down where the captain and his friends were feasting themselves on the best the ship's stores could give, and toasting the safe conclusion of their dangerous voyage, in great contentment, with the delusion that their pilot had come on board while they were supping, and was taking them safely to their wharf. "Captain Ross and gentlemen," said the lieutenant, as he laid his hand on the back of the captain's chair, while the man looked up bewildered, "I hope your Champagne will be no less sparkling when I tell you that you are overpowered by superior force, and the Fox-hound is my prize, and you are my prisoners."

The captain sprang to his feet and snatched out his Derringer. "It is of no use, Sir," said the lieutenant, quickly possessing himself of the little weapon. "The ship is in my hands, and has been for an hour, and we are flying before the wind down the straight channel and out to sea. Hark! Perhaps you hear the breakers now."

"Then, Sir," said the captain, recovering his good humor in the face of fate, "since it is inevitable, you must allow us to change our toast and pledge the gallantry that has made us captives. To whom am I indebted?"

But before the lieutenant could reply, or lift the glass to his lips, a shriek from one of the ladies at table, and the fall of the other to the floor, called his eye away; and at the same moment a state-room door opened and revealed a vision—a heavenly vision to him, for, shining white as she was with the pallor that had blotted out the radiant smiles and blushes, it was Adelaide that he clasped in his arms—Adelaide, as lovely, as beloved as ever.

Sunrise was bathing all the quiet seas with bloom when the Fox-hound was brought to, not far away from the Schoodiac, the bearer herself of news of her own capture. But there are some sorts of news that fly on the wings of the wind; for when Lieutenant Dracut went on board the flagship to make his report to the admiral, he was sternly ordered to take his prize into a Northern port himself, and not to reappear in those waters for sixty days. And as obedient to discipline himself as he always required others to be, you may be sure he did not lose an hour in obeying his superior orders—he lost, perhaps, half an hour, that brief period in which the chaplain paid the Fox-hound a visit, and in the presence of the admiral and the commanders of the fleet read the marriage-service in her cabin.

As for the cruel step-mother, perhaps the lieutenant allowed her to enter the Southern Confederacy, as she had taken such pains to get there. He certainly did not throw her overboard; but up to the time when, last winter, in one of the dark parlors of the Arlington, Mrs. Dracut told me her little romance, she had never seen or heard a word of Mrs. Fordyce.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

The P. of W.'s "Little Bill."—Scotch Anecdotes.—Authors unveiled.

IT is currently reported by the gossips that the exalted personage whom Messrs. Pike & Pluck in Nicholas Nickleby would have called the P. of W. is about to apply to Parliament for two millions of pounds to pay his debts. If that be so, you may depend upon it (as your Artemus Ward observed on the suggestion of his meeting with the thieving Indian in the Happy Hunting-Grounds), "thar will be a fight." It is supposed that these "indirect claims" arise from unfortunate transactions upon "the turf"—the profession, as you are aware, which persons who labor under the hereditary principle are in this country most prone to follow, but success in which unhappily requires great astuteness. Gallantry is expensive, for, as Ingoldsby says, "Ladies like little cadeaux from a suitor;" but if the horse one fancies and backs is "a miss," the disaster is often more expensive than a hundred flirtations. A great political philosopher, who was also a man of the world, once informed me that nothing in the way of extravagance was equal in cost to maintaining a periodical (he referred to the Westminster Review) for the enunciation of unpopular theories; but hobby-horses are nothing to race-horses, and this gentleman had never kept them. What is very curious in this pursuit is that every body expects to win at it. Admiral Rous, the greatest authority we ever had on such matters, asserts that he never knew a single nobleman who kept a stud "with any other intention than that of making a profit out of it;" so that all the excuses about "a passion for horseflesh," not to mention the tall talk of a desire to "improve the breed of horses," will be untenable. After Mr. Lowe's recent refusal to spend the public money—"taxes wrung from our toil-worn thousands," he called it—in classical explorations in the plains of Troy, there will, I think, be some difficulty in getting this money voted for the heaths of Newmarket and Epsom. It is even rumored that the House of Commons will tell the P. of W. to "ask mamma"—who is known to have considerable savings—for the payment of this little account. A nobleman who goes on the turf is almost certain (before he goes under it) to suffer for it in fortune very heavily; nor is there, I believe, a single instance of a person of this class not having been, on the whole, a loser, except the late Lord George Bentinck, who was, so far as wits went, a statesman spoiled, and looked after every horse he owned with his own eyes. The men who win are those who are born to the work, like Mr. Padwick, to whom have reverted all the acres of the house of Hastings and half the lands of that of Hamilton; and if this be so in the case of marquises and dukes, who will not trouble themselves with details, how much more is it likely to happen with heirs-apparent, whose very purse is held by another man—the office of disbursing money being considered derogatory—to whom he says, "Pay him!"

George Bidwell, the last of the ring concerned in the great bank robbery, has been apprehended in Edinburgh by a private detective after an exciting chase over various walls and back gardens. When come up with, he turned to bay with his walking-stick, but was apparently disarmed by his pursuer calling him "brother," and making him the Freemason's sign.

"He put his thumb unto his nose
And spread his fingers out," and Mr. George Bidwell "caved in" at once, and gave himself up, with "ten large diamonds."

It was very clever of him to go to Edinburgh in February, since nobody could have suspected that a man of means would have selected such a place of residence at that season. "The thermal line," as its scientific inhabitants are careful to tell you, "is preceesely the same" there as in London, but the east wind blows over your cab. I was present the other night in a certain club smoking-room, where "the best things" are said to be said that are said, and was regaled with some charming anecdotes of the Northern metropolis. The chief speaker had resided there for some years, and was detailing his experiences, which were combated—not to say denied—by some of the company who happened to be North British. While admitting that Sydney Smith's statement of a surgical operation being absolutely necessary in order to make Scotchmen understand a joke was an exaggeration, he contended that they really had no sense of humor, else how should a beggar have been permitted to stand unreproved for years on the South Bridge at Edinburgh with this contradictory placard round his neck, "Blind from my birth: I have seen better days?"

Again, he had taken up with him from England an epigram upon Twining (who, except Dakin, is the most advertised of our tea merchants) to this effect,

"Twining would be whining
If deprived of his tea."

Having narrated this to one or two friends, he found it retailed about Edinburgh in the following perverted form,

"Dakin would be aching
If deprived of his tea."

Also, perceiving golf to be played every where, he wished to acquire some knowledge of that game, and sent to a bookseller for a hand-book upon it. The messenger returned with a tee-total tract. The serious-minded bookseller had supplied him with The Hand of Providence exemplified in the Life of John B. Gough.

The cause of the wit's final departure from this uncongenial sphere was, according to his own account, a remark he made upon a public drinking-fountain which had been erected for cattle, with the inscription, "Water was not sent for Man alone." The population saw him smiling at it, and asked him why he did so. "Not alone, it says," replied he: "I suppose that is why you are always drinking whisky with it"—an observation which was naturally—and nationally—resented.

At this point in the narration one of the tenants of the smoking-room, who had been puffing at a Burns's cutty-pipe in moody silence, suddenly expressed his opinion that all these tales were libels—or, as he termed them, "lees."

"My dear fellow, don't be angry," rejoined the other; "there are many things more worth having than a sense of humor, and which your excellent fellow-countrymen do possess; besides, I was only speaking generally: you're full of fun yourself, for instance, I am well aware."

"Sir, I have no wish to be praised," returned the unconciliated Scot, "at the expense of my country."

"You are right," responded the wit, with gravity; "for it would be the first thing that ever was done at the expense of your country, and might establish a precedent."

It is fair to add, however, in defense of the North British, that later in the evening this sarcastic individual expressed an equal skepticism as to Irish humor, of which he defied us to point out a single instance which had not for its subject "either a pig or a priest."

The mention of Ireland reminds me that the best English joke that has come to my ears this week is in the French language. A foreigner, reading in the window of an obscure shop near Leicester Square the notice, Ici on parle Français, stepped in and inquired of the proprietor which was the individual referred to in his establishment as speaking the French tongue. The proprietor touched his own brow with pride, and murmured, Je.

Is it scandal, or only information (or have you heard it before?), to state that the author of The true History of Joshua Davidson—a recent volume whose unorthodoxy, or cleverness, or both, has attained for it a great popularity—is Mrs. Lynn Linton, who wrote "The Girl of the Period" articles in the Saturday Review some years ago? and that the author of that very bright story, The Member for Paris, is no other than Mr. Grenville Murray, who wrote The Roving Englishman, and has since, in consequence of his connection with the Queen's Messenger, been himself compelled to rove?

R. KEMBLE, of London.

GEORGE ELIOT'S SAYINGS.

SELECTED FROM "THE MILL ON THE FLOSS."

WHAT quarrel, what harshness, what unbelief in each other, can subsist in the presence of a great calamity, when all the artificial vesture of our life is gone, and we are all one with each other in primitive mortal needs?

We are not apt to fear for the fearless when we are companions in their danger.

We judge others according to results—how else?—not knowing the process by which results are arrived at.

Mankind is not disposed to look narrowly into the conduct of great victors when their victory is on the right side.

In a mind charged with an eager purpose and an unsatisfied vindictiveness there is no room for new feelings.

"Ah, my child, you will have real troubles to fret about by-and-by," is the consolation we have almost all of us had administered to us in our childhood, and have repeated to other children since we have been grown up. We have all of us sobbed so piteously, standing with tiny bare legs above our little socks, when we lost sight of our mother or nurse in some strange place; but we can no longer recall the poignancy of that moment and weep over it, as we do over the remembered sufferings of five or ten years ago. Every one of those keen moments has left its trace, and lives in us still, but such traces have blended themselves irrecoverably with the firmer texture of our youth and manhood; and so it comes that we can look on at the troubles of our children with a smiling disbelief in the reality of their pain. Is there any one who can recover the experience of his childhood, not merely with a memory of what he did and what happened to him, of what he liked and disliked when he was in frock and trowsers, but with an intimate penetration, a revived consciousness of what he felt then—when it was so long from one midsummer to another? what he felt when his school-fellows shut him out of their game because he would pitch the ball wrong out of mere willfulness; or on a rainy day in the holidays, when he didn't know how to amuse himself, and fell from idleness into mischief, from mischief into defiance, and from defiance into sulkiness; or when his mother absolutely refused to let him have a tailed coat that "half," although every other boy of his age had gone into tails already? Surely if we could recall that early bitterness, and the dim guesses, the strangely perspectiveless conception of life, that gave the bitterness its intensity, we should not pooh-pooh the griefs of our children.

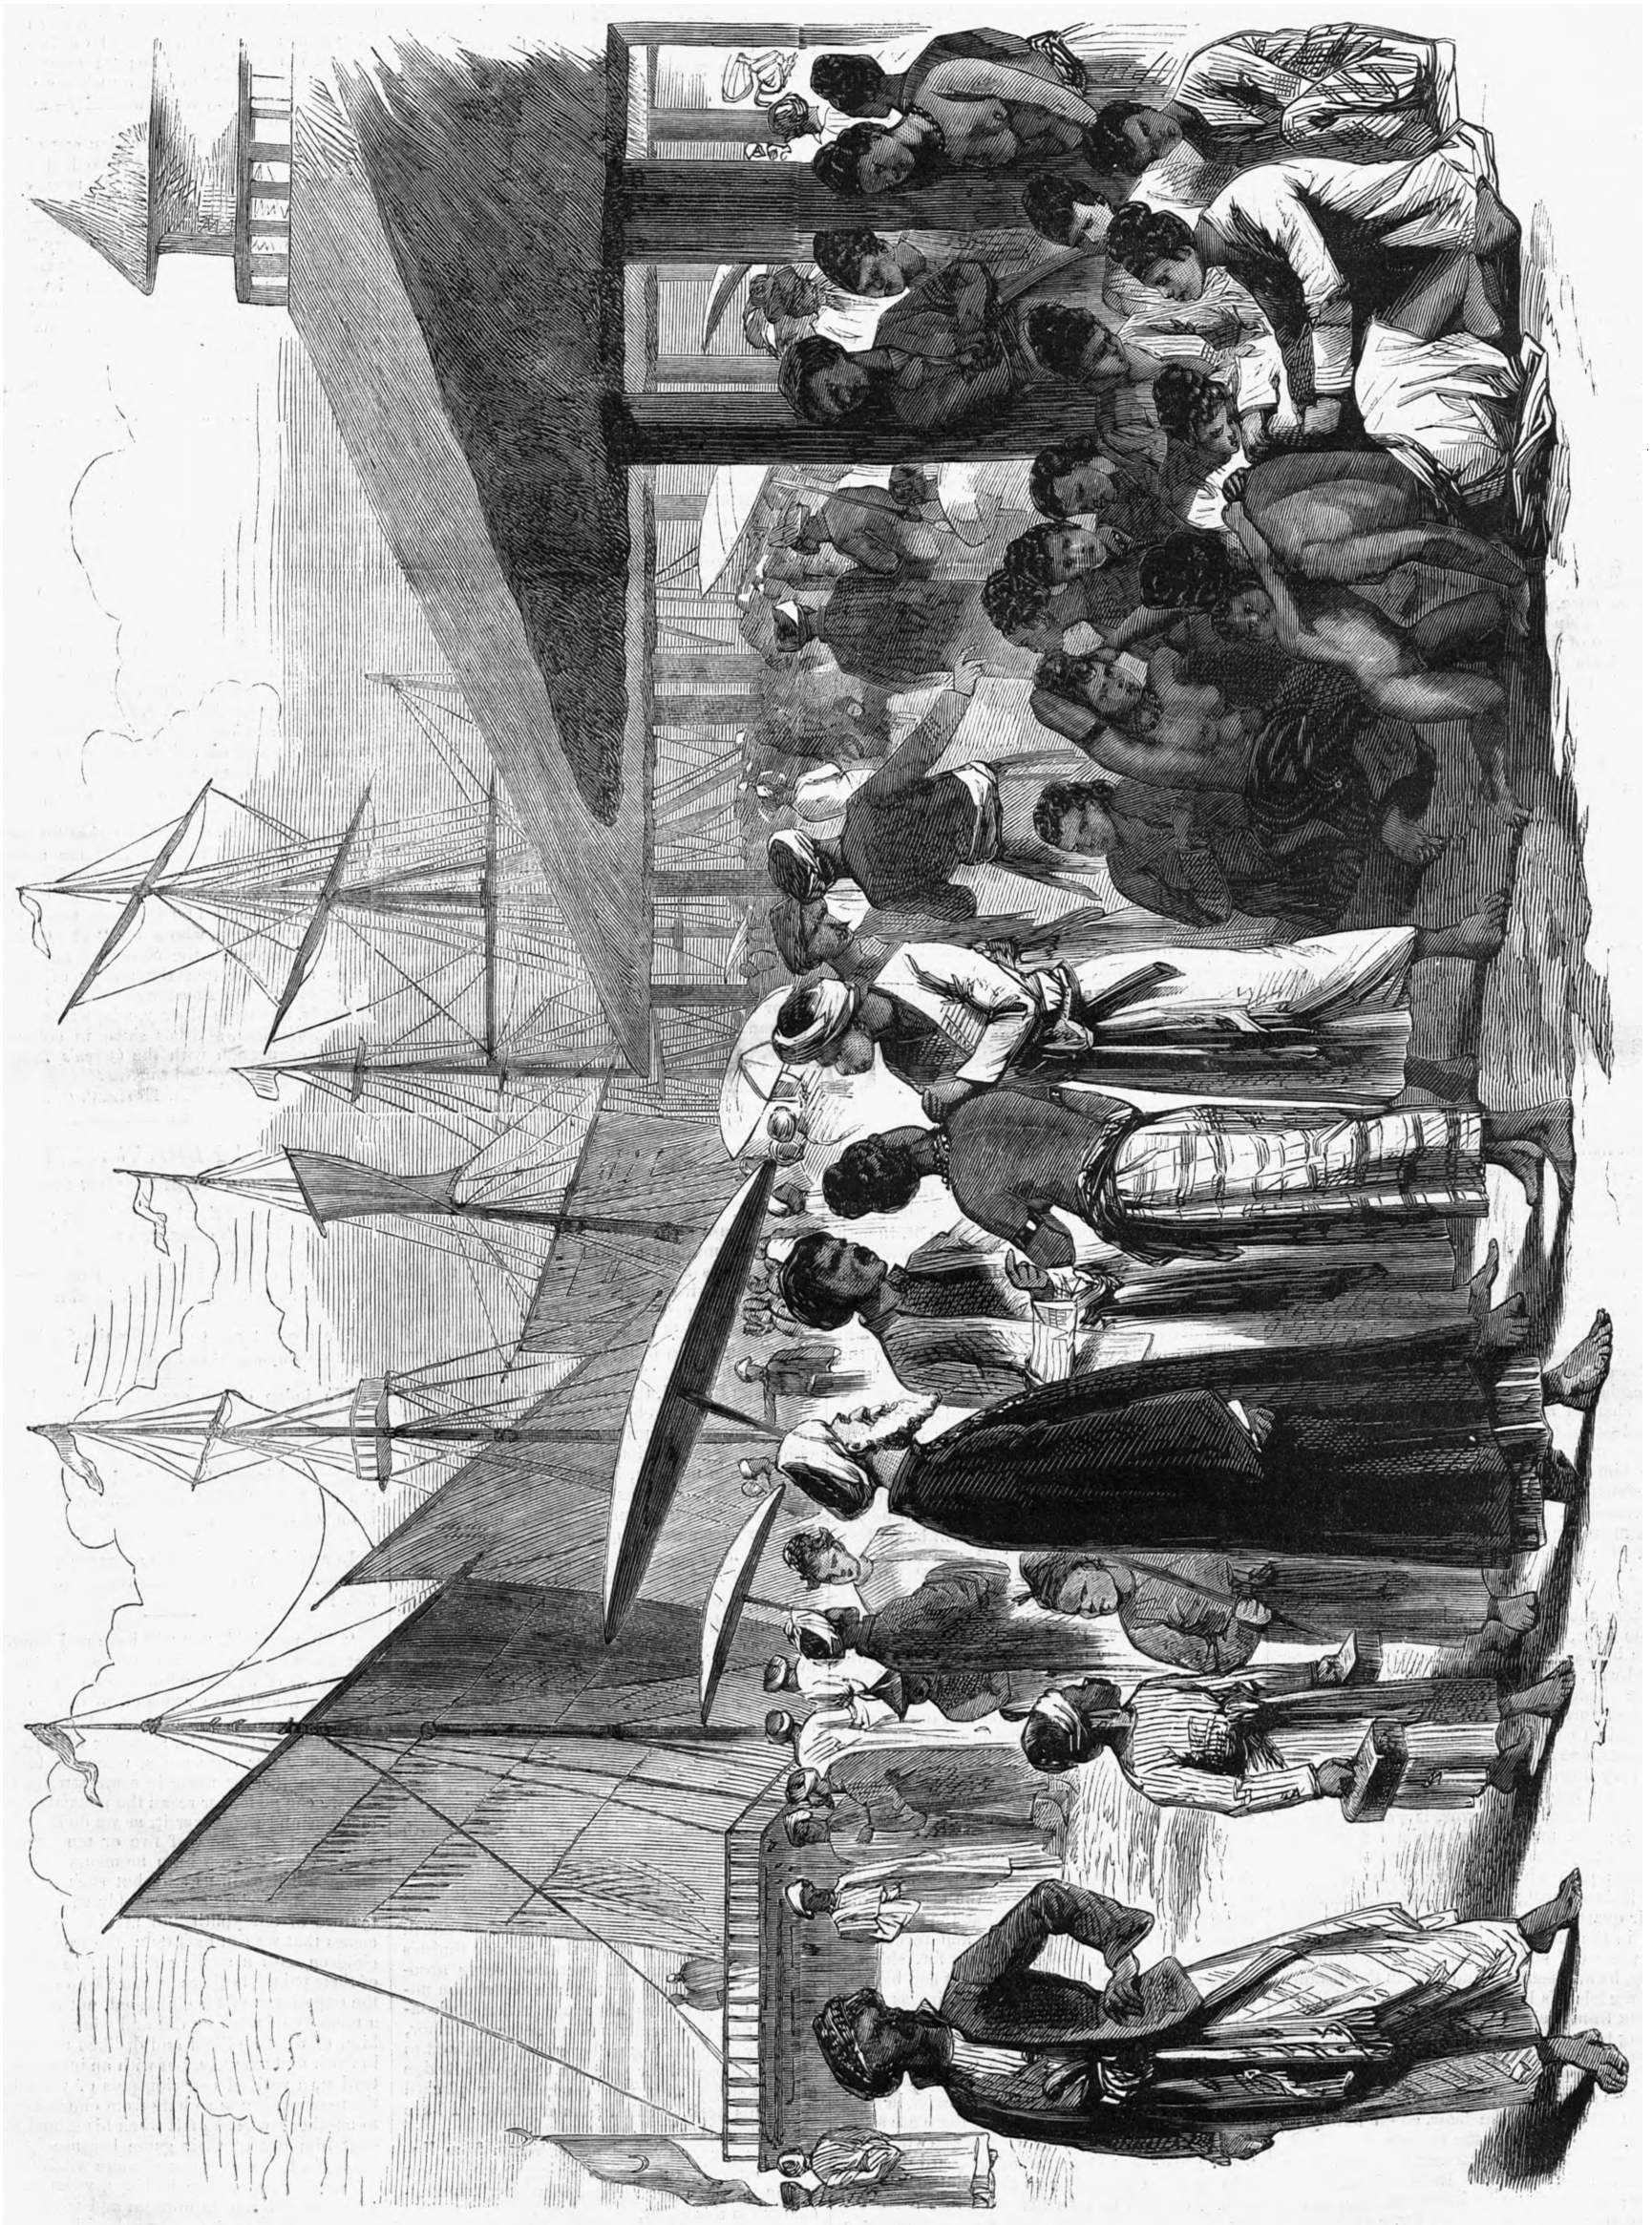
SALE OF SLAVE WOMEN AT ATCHEEN, SUMATRA.

IT is a curious fact that in the little independent kingdom of Atcheen, in the northwest part of the island of Sumatra, the sale of women for exportation is a recognized branch of commerce. The accompanying illustration was sketched on the spot by a traveler who was forced by accident to spend some days in this once powerful kingdom, which is now nearly extinct. The Malays seldom visit it, and the Europeans never; and the only strangers seen there are a few Arabs, who come thither to buy pepper, rice, coffee, gold-dust, and, above all, women, whom they carry to different parts of Asia and Africa. It must not be supposed that these women, like the Circassians and Georgians, are prized for their beauty: on the contrary, they are as ugly as scarecrows, being of the Malay type, or a cross between Chinese and negroes, with gingerbread complexions, thick lips, and flat noses. Nevertheless, they bring good prices; and in years when the harvest is scarce, as sometimes happens, the Atcheenese make raids into the territories of their neighbors, and carry off their wives and daughters to meet the demand.

Just at present Atcheen is attracting some exceptional interest from its hostilities with the Dutch East Indian government, which has made war on the Sultan of Atcheen for depredations on their territory.



SALE OF SLAVE WOMEN AT ATCHEEN, SUMATRA.

APPETITE.

OF appetites the sorts are three—that which is felt after a fast, an imperious sensation which never squabbles over a bill of fare, and which would be satisfied, in case of need, with a bit of raw meat as well as with a roast and truffled pheasant; that felt when, seated at table without being hungry, some savory dish is approvingly tasted, which sort of appetite gave rise to the proverb, "L'appétit vient en mangeant;" the third is the appetite excited (after the savory dish arriving in the middle of a dinner) by some delicious dainty brought in at the close.

Man ought to eat in a sitting posture. Homer—and his heroes have excellent appetites—makes the Greeks and the Trojans eat seated on separate seats, and not crowded on benches. When Ulysses arrives at Alcinoüs's palace the prince orders a magnificent chair to be brought him. The Egyptians, we learn from Athenæus, took their meals seated at table. The Romans did the same up to the close of the second Punic war, when they followed the lazy and inconvenient Greek custom of reclining, at dinner, on luxurious couches, each guest having a couch to himself. Persons invited brought their napkins, some of which were of cloth of gold. Alexander Severus was content with striped linen napkins woven for his sole and special use. Instead of ladies leaving the table in the middle of dessert, at Athens and Corinth it was the moment when they entered.

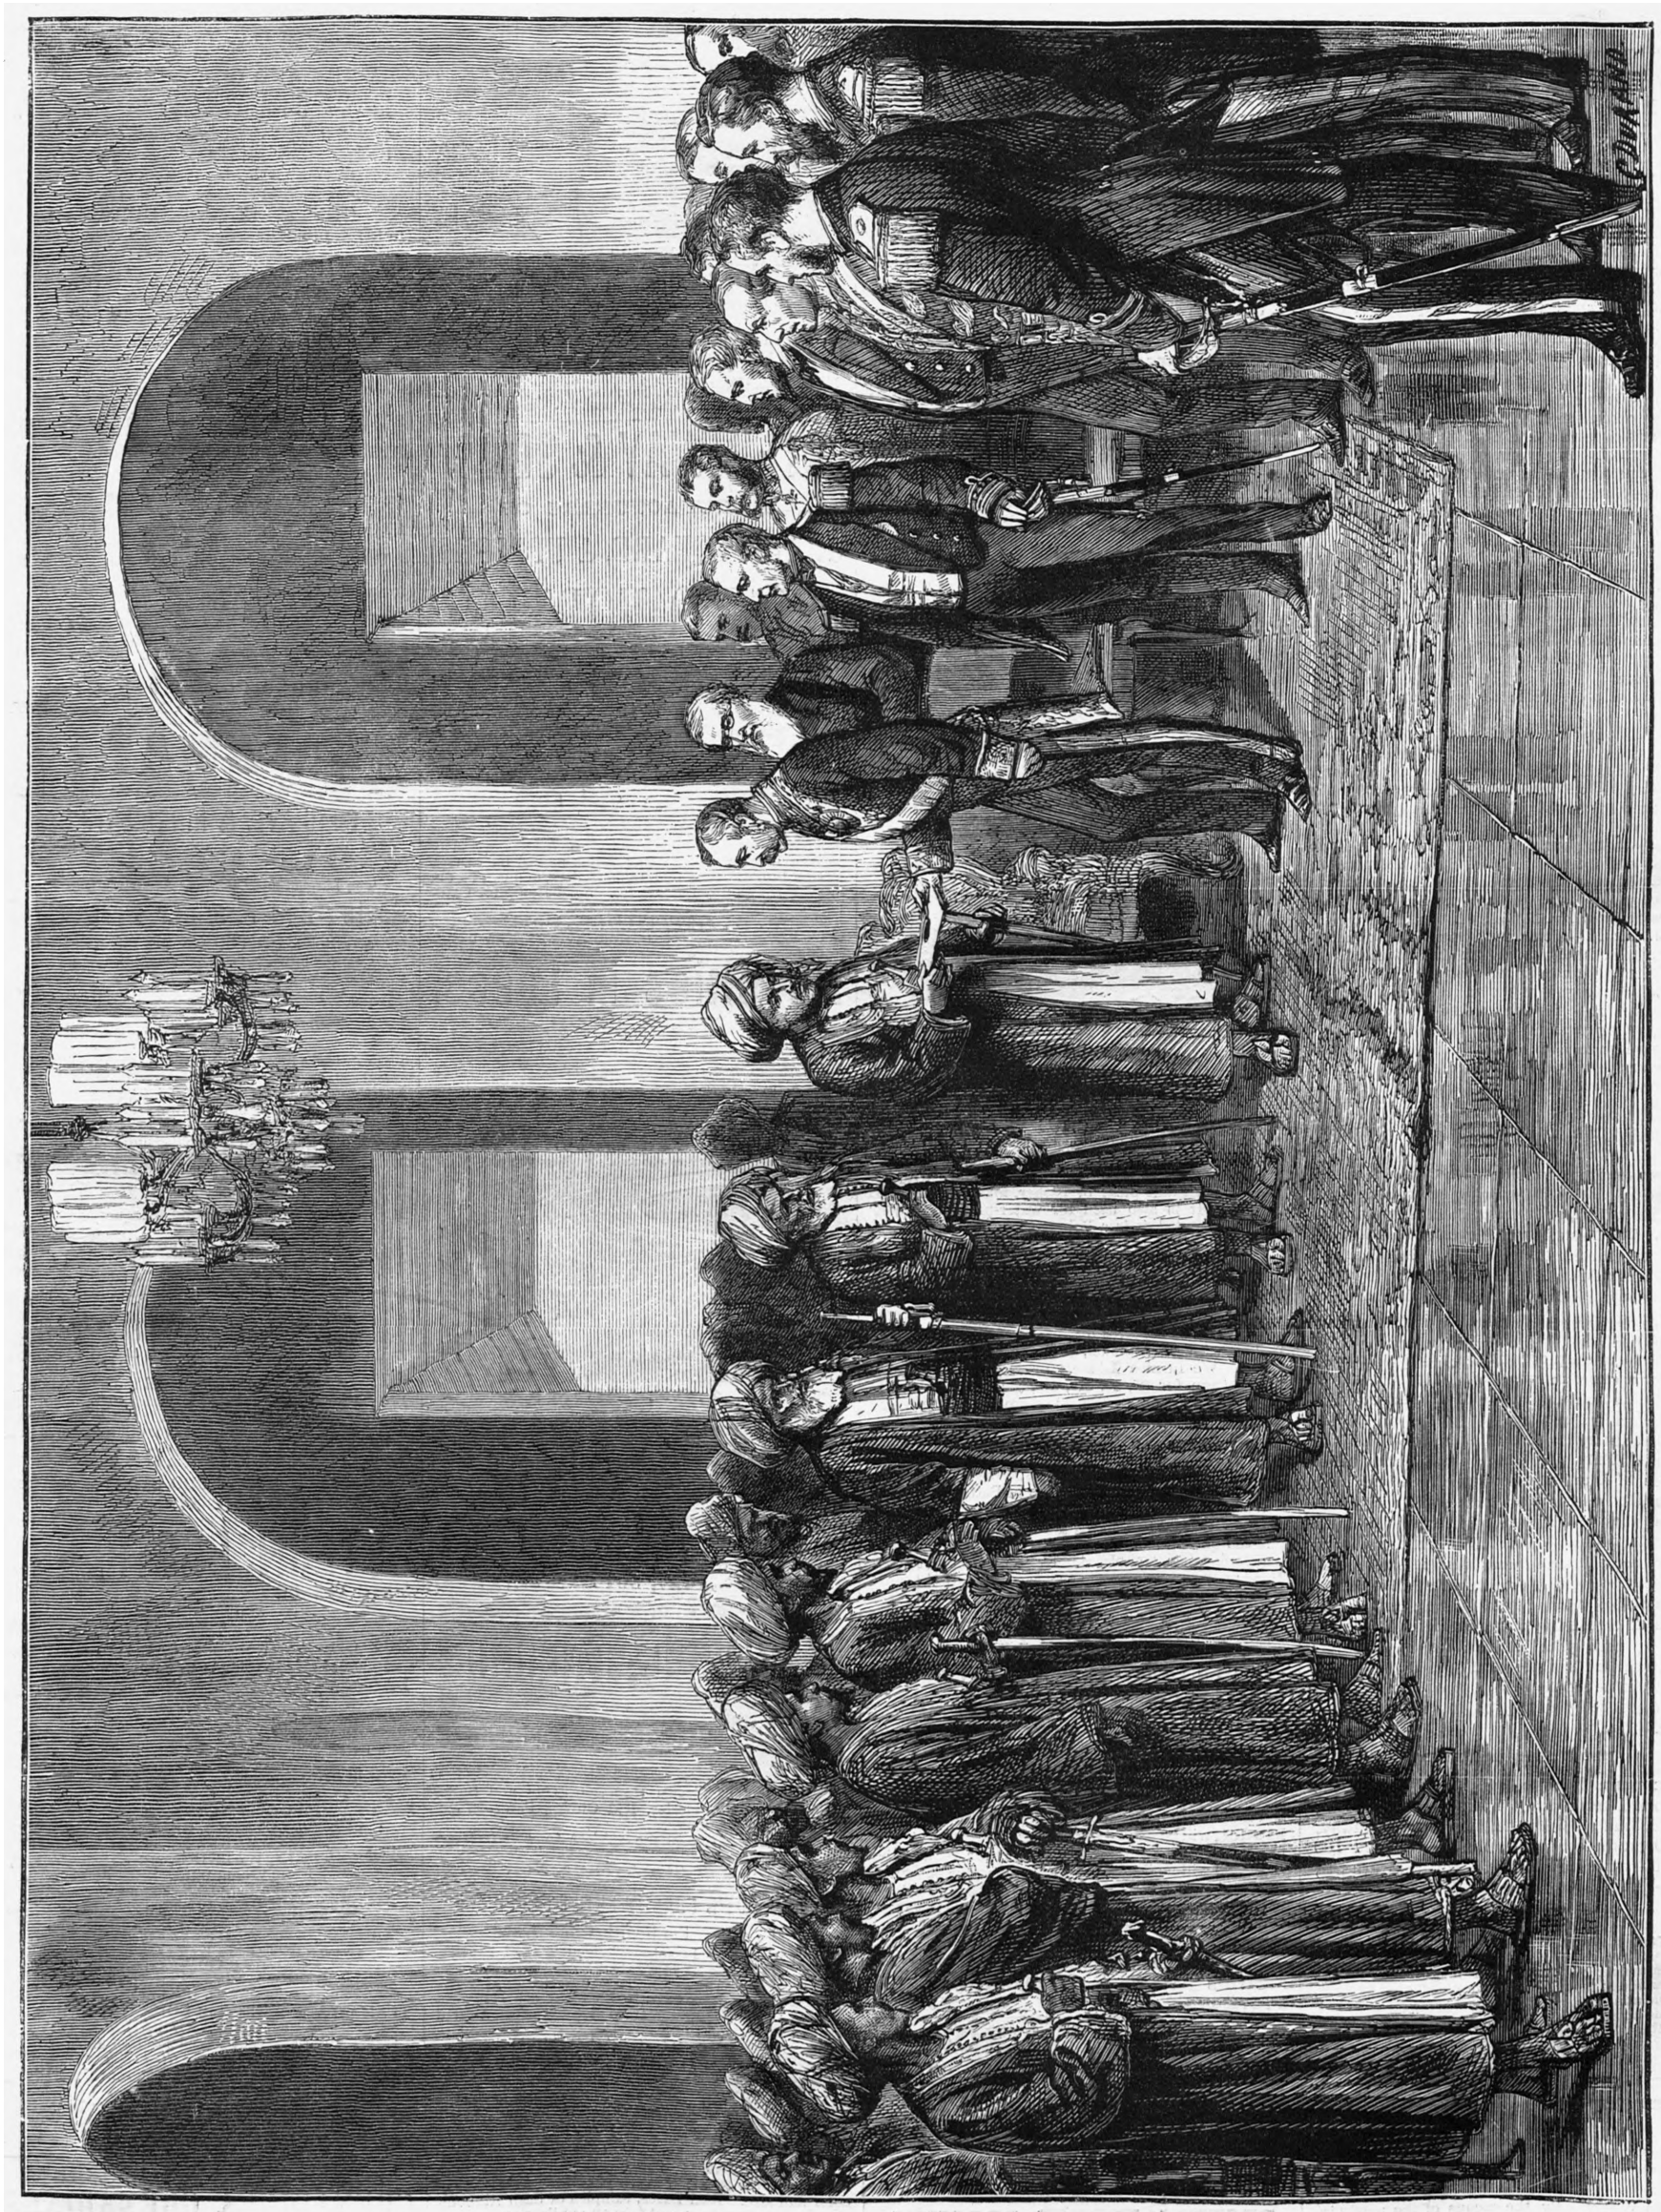
THE SLAVERY QUESTION IN EAST AFRICA.

THE accompanying illustration represents the visit lately paid by the English envoy, Sir Bartle Frere, to the Sultan of Zanzibar, the object being to present Queen Victoria's and other letters to the Sultan. Sir Bartle Frere was accompanied by the members of the mission, by all the officers of the British fleet, and by several American officers. Every one wore full uniform or court dress. The procession started on foot, and was met by the Sultan outside his palace, a salvo of artillery having been previously fired. He shook hands with every body, and invited them into the audience hall, a plain chamber, entirely without ornament. The Sultan received the letters with respect, but did not open them at the time, handing them over to his minister. Some conversation followed, accompanied by drinking of coffee and sherbet, pocket-handkerchiefs were sprinkled with otto of roses, and then, after more hand-shaking, the envoy took his departure.

It is greatly to be desired, for the sake of humanity, that he may accomplish the special object of his mission—namely, the extinction of the slave-trade in East Africa. Hitherto the Sultan has refused to suppress this vile traffic; and during the eight months of the year wherein it is permitted by the British government, Zanzibar has been the chief slave mart of the East.



THE SLAVERY QUESTION IN EAST AFRICA—RECEPTION OF SIR BARTLE FRERE IN DURBAR BY THE SULTAN OF ZANZIBAR.

OLDEN MEAL-TIMES.

AT the beginning of the sixteenth century, under Louis the Twelfth and Francis the First, people dined at ten in the morning and supped at four; the rest of the day was occupied by parties, walks, or rides. In the seventeenth century they dined at noon and supped at seven. The curious will find a number of forgotten and lost dishes mentioned in the mémoires of Louis the Thirteenth's doctor, Hérouard, who recorded the breakfasts and dinners set before the king. At that time, in great families, dinner was announced by blowing a horn.

The first restaurant in Paris was established by one Boulanger, in the Rue des Poulies, in the middle of the last century. His door was surmounted by the device, "Venite omnes, qui stomacho laboratis, et ego restorabo vos," "Come, all ye who are faint at stomach, and I will restore you." The invention of restaurants was a grand step in advance. The few hotels that had tables d'hôte gave no more food than was absolutely necessary to keep body and soul together. The traiteurs, or cook shops, sold nothing less than whole joints. To give a dinner to a friend you were obliged to buy an entire leg of mutton, or a turkey, or a fillet of beef. There was genius in the bold conception of a completely new branch of trade—that if one customer came to eat the wing of a fowl, another would be glad to pick the leg.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A NEW SUBSCRIBER.—One ounce of rose-water, half an ounce of glycerine, twenty drops of carbolic acid, mixed. This is ready for use at once.

PERPLEXITY.—Try black "cosmetique" on your eyebrows. It is sold by all druggists.

A SUBSCRIBER.—There is nothing known that will permanently remove hair.

MRS. R. A.—It takes about four yards of cashmere to make a vest-polonaise.

M. A. R.—We can send you a cut paper pattern for a cambric wrapper. Any of the dye stores here will color your shawl. We do not give addresses.

LINCOLN.—Keep your kid gloves wrapped in white tissue-paper in a thoroughly close dry box, and they will not spot.

INQUIRER.—Pale Nile green is worn with garnet.

E. J. A.—Make your blue and white striped muslin with a belted polonaise and a single skirt with Spanish flounce. Make black grenadine by descriptions in late numbers of New York Fashions. Get a yard and a quarter of cashmere for your basque.

T. C. M.—Make your lace-striped batiste polonaise by Double-breasted Redingote pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V., and trim with bias ruffles of the same, or fringe, or else yak lace.

S. M. P.—Braid your hair in two long plaits stuffed with "topsies," and coil around the top of your head, then put a short frizzed fringe above the forehead. Sailor suits will be worn again by both boys and girls.

MRS. K. T.—We can not take the responsibility of commending one brand of silk above another.

NOVICE.—Get a striped silk, or else a réséda tamise cloth, for your sister's spring suit. Make with plain basque and over-skirt like that illustrated in Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI. For yourself get the Châtelaine Redingote pattern in Bazar No. 17, Vol. VI.

A. L. H.—The most serviceable design for black silk suits is a plain basque, over-skirt, and flounced skirt.

INDOG.—Your sample is réséda mohair. Make with a châtelaine redingote and flounced skirt by pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. VI.

MRS. A. M. B.—Your pretty brown armure needs something better than a wool shawl with it. You should get a black or brown cashmere Dolman mantle that will do with any dress. Trim with bias silk bands. As you are successful in your purchases, we do not advise a change.

LILL.—Make a simple loose polonaise and single skirt.

EVA.—A blue silk vest, cuffs, and sash, with tiny blue pipings on the flounces, would brighten up your pretty striped silk. The brown mottled goods will make up stylishly if trimmed with revers and bands of solid dark brown. A polonaise and single skirt is a good design for it.

ALISON.—Make your pretty organdy with a loose belted polonaise, and put a deep Spanish flounce on the skirt. Most of the French grenadine suits have striped or polka-dotted polonaises. See New York Fashions of Bazar No. 18, Vol. VI.

MRS. J. LEE, M.—We are not responsible for the advertisements in the Bazar, and for obvious reasons decline to give preference to one above another.

D. A. S.—A vigogne or tamise cloth polonaise and skirt (a silk skirt if preferred) would be suitable for a bride's traveling dress in June. Get light blue for a silk, as sage green will not remain long in fashion. Get gray or the new deep blue linen for a suit, and needle-work in scallops with white instead of braiding it.

CAMEOS.

IT is not enough to possess a fine Cameo, if one be not, that is, a mere collector, virtuoso, and, so to speak, Cameo-taph, or burier of Cameos in cases and cabinets. There can be nothing more beautiful put upon a beautiful arm than a bracelet of Cameos properly set and adjusted. The rich, soft, mellow tints of the Sardonyx shed a gentle lustre on the carnations of beauty; and we believe that instances have been known in which the artistic interest and merit of the carved heads and figures of the Cameos afforded an excuse for a closer and more admiring inspection of the fair arm which they enclasped than might otherwise have seemed becoming or permissible. To all this it is necessary, however, that the fine Cameos be finely and skillfully set. Of this truth, Messrs. STARR & MARCUS, 22 John Street (up stairs), are obviously as well persuaded as they are of the equally important truth that they have educated their customers to be content with nothing poor or trivial in the subjects or execution of the Cameos themselves. It is the special merit of this house, that even in their less expensive and remarkable Cameo work, in their buttons and brooches of carved Onyx and Sardonyx, which are brought by their price within the reach of buyers whose means are less liberal than their tastes, they secure a genuine artistic quality, to which they themselves do justice by settings as refined as they are effective.—[Com.]

Fashions for Summer.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1873, by A. BURDETTE SMITH, in the Office of the Librarian, at Washington, D. C.

As a Polonaise—As a Wrapper.

The above represents the MAGIC COSTUME in TWO entirely different toilets. It can be changed from one to the other in less than ONE minute, by simply adjusting ONE button. One view is a full-dress Polonaise in Batiste, trimmed with lace and insertion, though it is equally adapted to any kind of material, but especially favored for wash goods, because when unbuttoned it falls into a beautifully-shaped wrapper (see Cut) without pleat or gather, making it easy to laundry. It is also used for water-proof or ladies' cloth. Elevated, it is a Polonaise or Redingote; or, when let down, a water-proof cloak. The traveler and voyager will find it a necessary convenience. It is very simple to make. Complete instructions are printed upon each pattern, besides a Cloth Model. (See below). For linen, it requires 6¼ yards of 36-inch. For water-proof, it requires 5 yards. All sizes. Price of pattern with cloth model, One Dollar. (See Premium below. We furnish Linen or Batiste made by this pattern for $5, $8, $10, $15, $20, $30. In Water-proof, $10, $12, $15, $20, $25. We are putting in better materials and charging less price by the single suit than manufacturers are charging by the dozen for last summer styles. A sample card of goods will be mailed upon receipt of ten cents.

Send two stamps for Catalogue of Patterns.

We give a CLOTH MODEL with each pattern, which SHOWS every seam, pleat, gather, loop, &c., how to put the garment together by the pattern, and how it will look when completed. By the use of our Cloth Models any person who can sew can FINISH the most difficult garment as easy as the plainest. They are PERFECT GUIDES.

10,000 GIFTS, $500,000

On TUESDAY, JULY 8th, 1873, the THIRD GRAND GIFT CONCERT, under the management of Ex-Governor Thos. E. Bramlette, and authorized by special act of the Legislature, for the benefit of the Public Library of Kentucky, positively and unequivocally comes off in Public Library Hall, at Louisville, Ky., when 10,000 Gifts, all cash, amounting to $500,000, will be distributed by lot among the ticket-holders. The money to pay all these gifts in full is already in bank, and set aside for that purpose, as the following certificate shows:

OFFICE OF FARMERS' AND DROVERS' BANK, Louisville, Ky., April 7, 1873.

This is to certify that there is in the Farmers' and Drovers' Bank, to the credit of the Third Grand Gift Concert for the benefit of the Public Library of Ky., Five Hundred Thousand Dollars, which has been set apart by the Managers to pay the gifts in full, and will be held by the Bank and paid out for this purpose, and this purpose only.

(Signed), R. S. VEECH, Cashier.

Only a few tickets remain unsold, and they will be furnished to the first applicants at the following prices: Whole tickets, $10; halves, $5; quarters, $2.50; 11 wholes for $100; 56 for $500; 113 for $1000, and 575 for $5,000. For tickets and full information, apply to

PARALLEL CORSET-SPRINGS.

Ten Reasons why they are the Very Best:

I. They are made of English Clock-spring Steel.
II. They can be attached to any corset, new or old.
III. The hooks are so constructed they can not unfasten during wear.
IV. There is no disagreeable space between the steels.
V. They never turn edgwise; one turning in and the other out is impossible.
VI. The greater the strain the closer they fit.
VII. They are wider in steel and narrower in wear than any other.
VIII. They can be washed without rusting.
IX. When fastened they make a perfect corset-board.
X. Though more elastic, they are stronger and outlast all others.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

BAZAR Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Why has a barber a more extensive business than any other man?—Because it extends from poll to poll.

The latest story of a brave though child-like form, faithful at the post of duty, comes from Ohio. He was the son of a village reporter, and having discovered a broken rail on the road just out of town, sat for five hours on a fence near by waiting for the train, so that he might carry the particulars of the accident to his father. Such devotion to the paternal interest is very affecting.

THE TARTAR WAR—Brushing one's teeth.

As some lady visitors were recently going through a penitentiary, under the escort of the superintendent, they came to a room in which three women were sewing.

"Dear me!" one of the visitors whispered, "what vicious-looking creatures! Pray, what are they here for?"

"Because they have no other home. This is our sitting-room, and they are my wife and two daughters," blandly answered the superintendent.

OUR DOOR-YARD.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

No garden, dear—you understand? We could not spare the room
On that close-planted hill-side farm for what would only bloom;
But mother pleaded, with a look of longing in her face,
For just a little spot that flowers might brighten with their grace;
So tasseled corn and bending oats and emerald spears of wheat
Waved o'er the wind-swept fields, and by the door were roses sweet.

Old-fashioned roses, red and white, and pinks with spicy breath,
And flaunting peonies, and vines that surely grew by faith,
So fast and far their fingers green wove garlands fair and fine,
Until the house beneath their touch was radiant as a shrine:
And shrine it was, where loyal hearts in pure devotion met,
And kindled incense fires that burn in hallowed fragrance yet.

Within the little door-yard's space, from early spring to fall,
We almost had a floral clock the passing hours to call.
From snow-drops and from lilac plumes to asters
braving frost,
No inch of ground, no single day, we flower lovers lost.

Ah, I've my window garden now, my ferns, my ivies green,
My birds, who flash like balls of light the netted wires between,
And sing, as all caged creatures do, the sweeter for the cage—
But in that tiny door-yard dear I lived my golden age.

How fair it was—at sunset's hour, the western sky aflame!
How calm, when o'er the glowing fields the meek-eyed cattle came!
And Ben let down the bars—"Mamma!" There's Daisy calling me;
I'm coming. Is it possible—is that the bell for tea?

THE WRINKLED ROSE LEAF.

IT is not so much the great sorrows and disappointments in life of which we complain, of which we are impatient, over which we lose temper, as the pin-pricks of every day, the little frets and worries, the small collisions of facts and temperaments—in brief, the wrinkle in the rose leaf.

In a great grief we are sometimes sublimed to a heroic endurance; we confront the immutable Will, and pause before it too much in awe and awful wonder for murmuring. But there is no background of necessity against which the lesser ills may loom up imposingly. A great trouble does not so much shut us in upon ourselves as it reveals to us the power of suffering in the human heart, and puts us in sympathy with all mankind, and causes us to realize that the whole creation travaileth and groaneth in pain; but against the minor trials that flesh and spirit are heir to there exists no strong sense of an inevitable fiat to uphold the weak will and failing nerves. To the broken or breaking heart it signifies little that the weather is dull, that the piano is out of tune, that the train is delayed; the paralysis of sorrow has rendered him, in a more or less degree, insensible to the rude friction of ordinary affairs. Who cares that the bed is hard when aching thoughts prick the brain into intense action through the long night hours? Who, shipwrecked on a desert island, grumbles at the fare of shell-fish, or disdains the brackish water at hand, or is vexed by the sand in his shoes? It is always the great grief that medicines the lesser; it is when life goes smoothly with us that the wrinkle in the rose leaf irritates, and seems a burden too grievous to be borne. And there is no denying that it does irritate and imbitter many lives which outwardly look prosperous and happy enough, and no doubt it is as much an affair of individual temperament as of unlucky circumstances. If we could only resolve not to heed the wrinkle in our rose leaf, not to fret and scold when the fire goes out, when the keys are mislaid, when the bread is heavy; if we might be mistress of ourselves though china fall; if one could learn to accept all the little unhappy accidents and incidents of the day in a spirit of cheerfulness, as necessary to the scenic effect, supplying the amber tints in the tapestry of life in order that the livelier hues may weave into the design more harmoniously without any glare of coloring; if one, in short, could just put the wrinkle out of mind in thinking of the rose leaf itself—what a gain were this! Have we so little of delight in this fair world that a trifling annoyance is sufficient to cloud our sky and steal sleep from beneath our eyelids? Is our happiness so insecure that a moth in the carpet, a rent in a gown, a broken trinket, or an unruly servant is able to obscure it? Perhaps the wrinkle in Madame Turbot's rose leaf is the long lineage of Neighbor Blood, whose own leaf is wrinkled in revenge by madame's fine equipage and apparent prosperity. Madame, surrounded by her finery, her LOUIS Quatorze furniturings, her old and new masters, her frescoes and folderols, has never been able to banish from her mind the picture of her grandfather crying fish in the market-place. She sees it reflected in the eyes of her high-bred guests; she believes it to be photographed in every lack of attention from her world. She looks across her sycamore hedge at the low ceilings and general dilapidations of the Bloods, and sighs for a pedigree; while they, sitting sadly in the shadow of the family tree, which for so many years has kept the sun from their vines, waft back a regret that its fruit does not compare with that across the hedge. In the mean time how much Miss Jennie would enjoy her broad aisle seat in church were she not conscious that her chignon was at the mercy of the congregation! How much keener were Trillette's pleasure in the thunders of applause and the showers of bouquets if Aria were not to make her début in the next scene! Even Bridget in the scullery was happy till Nora boasted of her higher wages. No: the wrinkled rose leaf is not confined to age, or sex, or condition. It happens to few, if any, to possess the rose leaf without the wrinkle, only in a wise oblivion of which can content be found. The old would be so happy among their memories and friends but for this failing strength, this lost bloom, this something that has robbed life of its pith—in short, they would have the experience of fifty and the beauty and innocence of twenty. Then life would be so sweet to the young if they had surmounted their trials, subdued their awkwardnesses, written their books, painted their pictures, turned their dreams into realities, and achieved success; if they might have the self-poise and ease of middle age, and still retain the infinite charm of youth.

When Rosalind married Collyn, she fancied that at last events had ironed out her rose leaf, that she had taken out a policy against trouble; but when Collyn took to late hours, she discovered that there was no spell could keep the wrinkles from growing. So, when young Invoice fell heir to a fortune, he devoutly believed there was no more up-hill work to be done; but, bless us! if he didn't find it quite as hard to keep his money as to earn it! What with investments, insurances, speculations, disasters by fire and water, and land-sharks, his poor rose leaf became so crumpled that you would never know it for the same whose deepest wrinkles were occasioned by flirtation's fickle fancies or the splitting of a new glove. To be sure, there is a great difference in the way in which various people accept their wrinkle, and the use they make of it. With many it is a constant matter of complaint, as if nothing of the kind ever soured another's experience: it's always just their luck. They have such an itching for sympathy, such a knack at self-pity, that they are forever parading their little trials before their friends, never guessing that because these show only the fresh and dewy side of the rose leaf, which the sun touches, that its wrinkle is kept well in the shade. Again, there is another class who rather plume themselves upon the variety of their aggravations and miseries: nobody ever has such servants as they have; nobody's children ever required so much attention; nobody's appetite was ever so poor; the canker-worm never attacks other orchards with such malice prepense; nobody else's preserves ferment so easily. "Cousin Kate may think that she has seen trouble, but it's a flea-bite compared to mine," cries one of this class; and so she goes on deepening the wrinkle in face and temper as well as in the rose leaf; while here is Silencia, whose trials, like the thorns, are kept under the rose. Her lovers may slight her, her own familiar friend play double, society snub her; the railroad company may cut up her hereditary acres, the schoolboys steal her peaches; her grandfather may have died of cancer or insanity; she may be plain, with an inordinate love of beauty, poor, with a hankering for luxury, eager for travel, and bound to the hearth-stone, or fond of home, and condemned to boarding-houses; she may have a bonnet that doesn't become her, a silk gown too scant or ill fitting, a boot that pinches, a chignon a shade too light—but you will never hear of any of these things from her lips. Though the wrinkle in her rose leaf keeps her awake nights, swells her heart in her bosom, yet she smoothes it out with a smile as best she may: in thinking of and being grateful for the blessings she has, she strives to be indifferent to those she has not.

SUTTEE.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

THE English nation has seen fit to suppress, or to endeavor to suppress, wife-burning among its Indian dependencies. It may be questioned whether England is wise in thus interfering with the domestic institutions of its colonies. India is remote and alien, and what seems horrible to us may be to our Hindoo friends a solemn and sacred joy. If the Indian widows are forced to this self-sacrifice by male and main force, or by the brutal tyranny of an unregenerate public opinion, it is well for the strong hand of England to be raised in their defense; but if it be done from pure love and loathing—love for the dead and loathing for all the bereft life that remains: despair and loneliness and mourning without hope—why should we close the heavens to their chariot of fire?

I rise to move, however, that if suttee is to be abolished in India, the balance of power shall be retained by establishing it in this country—with one amendment: that, if the expression may be pardoned, the boot should be on the other leg. When a woman loses her husband, I would have her make herself as comfortable as possible. When a man loses his wife, let him throw himself on her funeral pile and burn up. This is not only for abstract justice's sake, to atone for the poor women who have embraced the flames in the Old World, but for the sake of concrete justice and the best interests of all concerned. If the husband dies with his wife, the grandfathers and grandmothers, the uncles and aunts, immediately step in, adopt the children, care for the property, and, so far as possible, make good to the orphans the places of the lost. Blood is so strong that one or two removes do not perceptibly weaken it. Indeed, the danger is that the grandmother will dote too much on her grandchild. Indulgence and fondness will not be so well tempered by wisdom as they were with her own child. The sister will watch over her sister's orphans with more than a mother's vigilance, and the brother will rear his brother's boy with the care and cost of his own.

If the husband does not die, he immediately becomes a dog in the manger. He neither takes care of the children himself, nor can any one else take care of them. In course of time he goes straightway and marries a strange woman, who may or may not be in love with him, but who certainly is not in love with his children, and who is yet put in a position which only love can render tolerable. Who is so weak as to maintain that a man would not better have been burned? He may not like it at first—doubtless he will not; but he will soon become used to it; and indeed I see no reason why he should not presently regard it with as much enthusiasm and cling to it with as much tenacity as do the widows of India.

Once a little boy lost his young mother, and a short time afterward his young father. A considerable property was left to him, which was carefully invested by one relative, and in the house of another he found a home. He grew up surrounded by love and care. He received the finest Christian culture, and a liberal and professional education. A charming wife, bright and beautiful children, adorn and enrich his life, and give purpose and scope to his future. But as I saw him pass my window this morning, erect and strong, with the firm step and the clear brow of a prosperous and happy man, I thought of a playmate of his, his little next-door neighbor, a pretty, piquant, tiny girl, born under a sky as bright as his, and setting out in life with as fair a prospect. She, too, in her tender childhood encountered the same calamity that beset him—the loss of a youthful mother; but unhappily she did not also lose her father. He lived and married again—married a woman who made the tales and traditions of heartless step-mothers a dreary reality. Through her dead mother the little girl inherited an ample fortune, but the law gave the whole income and control of it to the father as long as he lived, and his own weakness gave it to the step-mother, from whose hands not a farthing trickled down upon the poor girl. By coldness and rudeness her mother's family were alienated and repelled from her father's house, and she, delicately born and reared, grew up to drudgery and mean living, and all the infernal degradations devised by a miserly nature. She was shabbily and scantily clad, debarred the social pleasures belonging to her age and position, and at seventeen sent out into the world to earn her own living—she who, had she been able to come by her own, would no more have needed to toil, and who, indeed, was scarcely more fit to toil, than the lilies of the field. But she was a lady born and bred, and she scorned to complain of a fate which she could not escape; and her pretty face and dainty figure lent a silken grace to the commonest gown, while her high spirits and the archness and vivacity of youth forbade all thought of pity, or even any suspicion of the truth. She married, and though an only daughter and the heir of a large property, she received no outfit but such as her own brave fingers could supply. Children came to her love and delight, but the privations, the struggles, and the suppressions of her young years had probably weakened the prop of life. Her father died, leaving a will which bequeathed his whole property to his wife. He was a warm-hearted, affectionate man, and unquestionably fond of his daughter, who had ever been true and dutiful to him; yet he had left her, his only child, without a penny, and his grand-children were unnamed in his last will and testament. The blow was too much for her. Without any visible disease, she faded and faltered. She had battled bravely and silently, but her small store of strength was spent, and one night she lay down, too tired to claim the good-night kiss. "But you want to kiss Sweetins, mamma?" and "Sweetins" was lifted to mamma's side, and felt the last kiss of loving lips, and then the tired mother, the wronged and outraged daughter—poor fragile creature—closed her weary eyes and woke no more.

Is it strange that when I see the man go by with his buoyant stride and swing to meet his merry children awaiting him at the garden gate, I think of his little playfellow lying under the winter snow, and the children that go unmothered through the world?

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

MOURNING.

BLACK toilettes are so generally worn by ladies who dress in colors that those who wear mourning for deceased relatives are compelled to adopt still deeper black in order to distinguish their memorial dress from the fashionable uniform of the day. Heavy plain English fashions in mourning are followed here in preference to the showy lustrous dresses glistening with jet that French women call mourning. Mourning black is made in the plainest, simplest manner, is confined to a few fabrics, and is also worn longer than formerly. A welcome relief, however, is given to this sombre and unwholesome dress by wearing white around the neck and wrists and inside bonnets; also by the thin veil of net or grenadine worn over the face, while crape veils hang behind like streamers. English crape trimmings on bombazine are considered the deepest mourning, and are retained longer than formerly, but wearing crape does not now include seclusion from society, as it once did. Dresses made entirely of crape mounted on a silk foundation are worn on full-dress occasions—for instance, ladies in the second year of mourning for a parent have dinner dresses of English crape laid in kilt pleats that cover the silk underneath, an apron of crape with sash behind, and a simple basque smoothly covered with crape. Many families wear plain crape folds the first year, add crape pleatings mixed with trimmings of the dress material for the second year, then leave off crape altogether, wearing fanciful trimmings of the dress goods, that finally make the dress look like the ordinary black toilettes worn out of mourning. "Second mourning," in the old fashion of purple and gray, has gone out of use, and light mourning now consists of lustrous black dresses trimmed with jet and lace, relieved by a great deal of white. These gradations are not very marked, as each household has its own customs, some old families wearing mourning half their lives, while others adopt it for a very brief season; hence it is difficult to speak definitely of costumes about which there is so little uniformity.

Among materials for mourning dresses the handsomest is English bombazine. It is heavier and less lustrous than French bombazine, and is worn for first deep mourning during all seasons of the year. It costs from $1 50 to $4 a yard. For spring and summer suits the soft hanging tamise cloth is probably next in favor. This fabric is all wool, with plain surface, from thirty-four to forty-five inches wide, and costs from 85 cents to $2 75 a yard. The quality sold for $1 75 a yard is exceedingly fine and soft, and is most used. French challi is also commended for summer wear, as it is light and cool: price from 80 cents to $1 a yard. In thinner goods plain grenadines, either all silk or else silk and wool mixed, are the leading fabrics for deep mourning dresses; they are trimmed with folds of grenadine piped with crape. Striped, spotted, and damask grenadines are only worn in light mourning. For summer dresses Byzantine is a regular mourning goods without lustre. It is half transparent, and is made of pure silk and wool very closely twisted. Florentine is the name of another mourning material made a little heavier than grenadine.

Widows' mourning is distinct from all others in its plainness. It consists of bombazine and tamise dresses made with a polonaise or a basque and single skirt almost covered with crape. The English crape used is a yard and a half wide, without a fold in the middle, and comes in a roll instead of in boxes. For the dress skirt this crape is not put on in folds or pleatings, but is doubled and shaped to the skirt, covering it from the hips down, and having but one seam. The basque has perfectly tight sleeves, is very high and close in the neck, is covered plainly with crape, and has no over-skirt to accompany it. Small button-moulds covered with crape fasten the front; around the neck is a small collar of doubled crape, and the crape cuffs are entirely without ornament. The bonnet is of doubled crape also, with a small puff of white crêpe lisse across the forehead for a widow's cap, and black strings. The crape veil is a yard and a half long, with a hem a quarter of a yard deep. It may be worn with a string in one end tied around the bonnet, with the sides fastened behind below the high braids of hair; or else, in nun-like fashion, the middle of the veil is fastened by jet pins on each side of the bonnet, and the ends cover the face and drape the back. For wraps, sacques and mantillas are cut of the dress goods, covered with crape, and finished on the edge by a milliner's fold. Square shawls of Thibet cloth with a deep border of crape are worn by old ladies in their widowhood.

Mourning for other near relatives—parents, children, a sister, or brother—is made of the materials already mentioned, but copies more closely the fashions used in colors; for instance, there are sleeveless basques of crape, crape sashes and fraises, crape aprons, and over-skirts trimmed with crape, while lower skirts have kilt pleatings of crape, bias folds, and flounces trimmed with crape. A high standing fraise of pleated English crape is sewed permanently to the neck of tamise basques and polonaises, and an inner pleating of white crêpe lisse is worn with them. This lisse pleating costs from 80 cents to $1 a yard. Black may be worn around the neck for the first three months of mourning, but it is disagreeable and unhealthy, and many families wear white from the first. Large button-moulds two inches in diameter, covered with the dress material and with doubled crape, are used on polonaises. A succession of lapping bias folds around the entire skirt trims tamise tastefully; the over dress is then an ample châtelaine polonaise, with cuffs, pockets, and sash of crape. Other dresses have lengthwise bands or folds of crape on the front breadths, with crape kilting behind. Few gathered ruffles are used in mourning. The smallest piping of crape heads grenadine folds, bands, and pleatings. Bombazine basques are simply edged with two tiny folds of crape, and the postilion or fan pleatings behind show a crape lining. A model basque of this kind has crape straps à la militaire across the front, with a button in each strap, and tight sleeves with deep crape cuffs on which are three straps and buttons. The Worth over-skirt hangs straight open and long in front, and is caught up behind under a crape sash; great square pockets of crape are on its sides, and it is bordered with a three-inch bias band of bombazine piped with crape. The lower skirt has six large crape buttons straight down the front breadth, with crape straps beside them, and a kilt flounce around the skirt. A tamise suit has a long polonaise with revers in front, is shortly draped behind, and is edged with a bias band of tamise piped with crape. Square crape pockets, square cuffs on very close sleeves, and large crape buttons. The new wide Josephine belt is three inches broad, made of crape folds, and has a sash of crape loops two-eighths wide when doubled; tablier trimming of buttons and folds up the front of the skirt, and three straight kilt pleatings behind. A mourning silk has a basque piped with crape and a high fraise around the neck. The apron is of crape edged with crimped fringe, and is finished behind by sashes. Lengthwise bias crape bands trim the three front breadths; the back widths have silk flounces deeply bound with crape. Sleeveless basques of crape are lined with silk, merely piped on the edges, have a high fraise, and are fastened by buttons of crape held in bound button-holes. With such dresses crape bonnets are worn alike in summer and winter. Soft white tulle ruches above the forehead are used for face trimming when white is preferred, as it usually is, but the lisse puff is for widows only. The long crape veil is stitched in a cluster of pleats near the left and front of the bonnet, is drawn back down on the crown so that it almost conceals the bonnet, and is fastened low down on the back and left to droop straight and long behind; plain jet pins in oblong blocks conceal where it is stitched. A plain Brussels net, or else a gray grenadine, veil is then worn over the face.

The jewelry admissible at this stage of mourning is black onyx or jet, without a particle of gold visible. Ear-rings are black onyx balls, perfectly smooth and plain, costing $4 and upward for those from the size of a pea to that of a bullet. Spiral ear-rings that screw into the lobe of the ear are merely black buttons of onyx, thick and flat, or else a tiny diamond is in their centre. Châtelaines of very dark tortoise-shell are also worn in mourning. For the second year of mourning and for morning wear are sets of old silver, darker than the oxidized metal, made into quaint brooches, long ear-rings or else balls, large square sleeve-buttons with the wearer's initials, or else with carvings of flowers, or birds, or Egyptian heads, and above all the châtelaines of silver for holding watch, vinaigrette, and umbrella.

The complimentary mourning worn for distant relatives, relatives by marriage, and friends is very little more than the black dresses in general use, without being brightened by colors in ribbons, flowers, and jewelry. Black silk and lustrous cashmere are admitted here, and the black camel's-hair polonaises that are limp and lustreless enough to be appropriate for deepest mourning, though they have not been adopted for it. The bonnet is of black chip with dull silk trimmings, or else of Brussels net with jet ornaments.

VARIETIES.

The loose-fronted polonaise, or redingote, with adjusted back, described in Madame Raymond's last letter, has come into sudden popularity here. The Bazar introduced this garment a year ago last December by an engraving and Supplement pattern given in Vol. IV., No. 49.

De baize is a favorite fabric for inexpensive traveling suits for spring, summer, and fall. It is all wool, light and sleazy, yet strong, and is shown in the natural gray and brown colors of the wool. It is 50 cents a yard; from twenty to twenty-five yards are required for a costume with long polonaise and flounced skirt, trimmed with bias silk of the same shade.

Polonaises with basque fronts are most seen on French dresses of silk and grenadine. The back is a regular Marguerite shape. Other stylish polonaises are perfectly plain in the front, with trimming up the sides, or else buttons down the side seams; the back is slightly bouffant, long, and is held back by tapes tied over the tournure. Linen and batiste polonaises, already braided, are shown in boxes. They are long enough to serve as a morning wrapper when not draped. Price from $10 upward, not made. Blue camel's-hair polonaises are in great favor with blondes. One seen on Fifth Avenue had a blue silk sash, belt, pockets, ruff, and silver buttons. The dress skirt was black taffeta silk, with clustered kilt pleating for trimming. A black Rubens hat, gray undressed kid gloves, and dainty lingerie of white percale with pale blue cross-bars completed the toilette.

Percale cuffs and collars with colored spots, lines, and cross-bars promise at length to find favor for morning suits. They cost from 50 cents to $1 a set. Pleated ruffs for neck and under-sleeves are made of percale, as well as the square cuffs and standing English collar. Dark cambric in gray, blue, or black and white squares is made into collars and cuffs for traveling, and is worn in the morning with black dresses.

The novelty of novelties is French dresses made with silk ruffs held out by wires. These ruffs are of the dress silk made double, and consist of two plain folds beginning at the belt, extending up the front, and standing curved out behind like the ruffs of Queen Elizabeth's time.

Little girls from ten years of age downward are wearing high-crowned Normandy caps of Swiss muslin made over blue or pink silk. The crown is pointed on top, shaped over a foundation of stiff net, and gathered into a band that borders the face. A ribbon band passes around the face, and is edged with Valenciennes lace. A bow of many loops and ends is high in front, and long streamers hang behind. Black velvet ribbon trimming is used for large girls.

PERSONAL.

PROFESSOR TYNDALL is growing more and more complimentary of the U. S. In a recent lecture in London, in alluding to the high scientific standard maintained in the United States, he read some extracts from a lecture delivered by President WHITE, of Cornell University, which he "had never seen surpassed in the writings of European thinkers."

—It has not been the felicity of the Bazar to have alluded in its "personals" to the Begum of Bhopal. We now introduce her. She is the ruler of a province in India, which she administers with so much skill and energy that, on Lord NORTHBROOK'S recent tour of inspection through India, he convened a special chapter of the order for the purpose of investing her Highness with the dignity of Knight Grand Commander of the most noble order of the Star of India.

—The marble statue of MAZZINI, life size, has been set up in the great court of the city palace of Genoa. It is the gift of a citizen named RUGGERO.

—Miss EMILY FAITHFULL is soon to receive a noteworthy testimonial from certain ingenious work-women of the West. When Miss FAITHFULL was at Elgin, Illinois, she inspected the watch manufactory at that place, and said pleasant and encouraging words to the fair and busy workers. So much pleased were they by her visit that they have resolved upon and are now making for her a beautiful watch, the interest in which may be inferred from the fact that every little wheel and cog and spring, etc., etc., that enters into the manufacture of that watch will be the product of the women employed in the manufactory. Could mortal woman desire a more exquisite testimonial than such a "ticker?"

—Queen VICTORIA has recently presented to the Historical Museum in Derby an original letter from Prince CHARLES STUART, dated in 1745.

—Sad romance: beautiful Princess THERESA of Oldenburg broke an engagement with the hereditary Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar out of a desire to wed a young and handsome music-teacher. The Emperor of Russia, in whose army the father of the princess serves as a general, was, in consequence, asked to elevate the music-teacher to the dignity of baron. Done. After having been supplied with the necessary means to live according to his dignity, he has been ordered to leave St. Petersburg. Such is the cruelty of the principal Russian!

—The CUNARD line of steamers has certain "personal" regulations which a captain can only break in emergencies of the most serious kind, and the result of their well-defined instructions has been that they have never lost a passenger. Some of their regulations, indeed, are so strict as to be somewhat amusing. For instance, not very long ago the master of one of their Liverpool and New York fleet having a short time previously taken to himself a wife, applied for permission to take his helpmate with him for just one voyage. The request was granted more readily than he had anticipated, but, as it turned out, the company took one view of the transaction and the captain another. Proceeding as usual to superintend the removal of the steamer from the dock to the river, he was astounded to find a brother captain in the act of giving orders. Explanations were given, and it transpired that though the company were not unwilling that Captain —— should take his wife to America, they were not disposed to intrust him with the ship also. One charge was sufficient where the lives of nearly a thousand passengers and the safety of a very large amount of property were concerned. The story illustrates very forcibly the manner in which the CUNARD proprietors have obtained a reputation both for speed and safety.

—This is told of a guest at the mansion of the late SAMUEL COLT. He noticed that gas was burning all over the house. Great chambers unoccupied, large halls, parlors, corridors, were all ablaze. "You are extravagant with your gas," said the stranger to the butler, who was showing the house. "Perhaps so," was the reply; "but, you see, the Colonel owns the gas-works, and we like to patronize him."

—Professor PALMIERI, of Naples, states that the sismograph, a sort of earthquakeometer, which had indicated the different shocks of earthquake a month ago, is still very unquiet. This, he says, clearly demonstrates that we have entered on a fresh period of eruption, which may commence any day. Nice to think of! He has officially announced another eruption of Vesuvius.

—Miss ROTHSCHILD, who was recently married to the Hon. Mr. YORKE, completed about two years ago, with her sister, a translation of the Old Testament Scriptures, but which was printed only for private circulation. It was the work of several years, during which time the translators almost altogether eschewed fashionable life.

—M. THIERS is a bit extravagant in some things. He possesses in his collection of pictures a small canvas some few inches square, which may with the frame be worth twenty francs, for which he gave 8000, having bought it in 1864 as a Ruysdael. It has paid expenses over and over, for whenever THIERS feels tempted to buy a picture he looks at it, and—overcomes the temptation.

—Senator SUMNER recently remarked to a lady: "I have known beauty to go with years, but this, I fear, is the exception, not the rule. One of the handsomest women I ever knew was the mother of Lord BROUGHAM. At the time I met her she must have been over eighty years of age. I was then quite a boy, and abroad for the first time, and met with the kindness to be invited to the castle of this nobleman. The manners and figure of Mrs. BROUGHAM betrayed none of the decrepitude of age. I shall never forget her extreme kindness and efforts to entertain a young American."

—Father HYACINTHE is making preparations to revisit the United States, accompanied, of course, by his American wife.

—KRUPP, the great German manufacturer, selects for overseers practical mechanics and graduates of the polytechnic schools. At his laboratory are several chemists, one of whom is one of the most celebrated analytical chemists on the Continent. Mr. KRUPP also retains a doctor of laws, who is constantly engaged with the settlement of contracts and disputed questions of law. There are several interpreters to converse with the many foreigners who call at the office.

—Mr. SPURGEON has in very direct terms declined the proposition to come to the U. S. to lecture. He says: "I am not open to an offer for lecturing; neither is it my profession. I appreciate the liberal nature of the offer, and it is not declined with any reference to amount. One hundred times the sum would not tempt me to lecture for money, as I do not feel it to be my calling."

—MARK TWAIN says in a recent letter: "During the last two months my next-door neighbor, CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER, has dropped his Back-Log Studies, and he and I have written a bulky novel in partnership. He has worked up the fiction, and I have hurled in the facts. I consider it one of the most astonishing novels that ever was written. Night after night I sit up reading it over and over again and crying."

—The Miss ABBY HUTCHINSON, of the HUTCHINSON family, tribe of ASA, who was married recently to Mr. ANDERSON, of Minnesota, is a niece of that ABBY HUTCHINSON who was of the original tribe of JESSE, or words to that effect, and whose married name is PATTON.

—Senator SUMNER has been pleasantly interviewed by "Olivia," of the Philadelphia Press, about celebrities whom he met abroad in years gone by. The interviewress asked him, "Will a woman of good judgment marry a man fifteen years younger than herself?" To which Mr. SUMNER replied: "I shall have to refer you to Mr. DISRAELI. I know that to have been a very happy marriage. I met Mr. DISRAELI and his wife at Munich when they were on their wedding tour. At the principal hotel we met at the breakfast-table. Mr. DISRAELI sat by the side of his newly made wife. He might have been, or at least looked, about thirty years old. His intensely black hair was smoothed to perfection. At that time he had become famous as an author. Every thing seemed noticeably new about him. Mrs. DISRAELI appeared like a kind-hearted, middle-aged Englishwoman, and DISRAELI seemed the one to carry the idea that he had drawn the prize. Time has shown how devoted they were to each other. In the last few months we hear of his walking by her side and supporting her tenderly. She must have been nearly if not quite eighty. In my opinion DISRAELI is one of the most remarkable men of this age, when we remember the obstacles he had to overcome to reach the position he occupies in England. The prejudice which exists there against his Jewish faith alone is enough to chill the most ambitious."

—CLARA ZIEGLER, the celebrated German tragedienne, has been offered an engagement in this country of $1000 a night for one hundred performances, beginning next September. Miss ZIEGLER has a life engagement with the Royal Theatre, Munich, but is trying to obtain the royal permit of leave of absence to accept this engagement.

—Possibly it may interest some of the lady readers of the Bazar to know what was worn by royalty at the recent Drawing-room held by the Queen at Buckingham Palace. Her Majesty wore a black silk dress with a train trimmed with crape and feathers, and diamond and pearl coronet over a long white tulle veil with black tulle trimmings. Her Majesty also wore a necklace composed of two rows of large pearls, and pearl and diamond brooches. Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales wore a dress of black tulle over a black silk petticoat, handsomely trimmed with white lace, looped with bunches of cherries, and a train of rich black silk covered with white lace; head-dress, a tiara of diamonds, feathers, and veil. Her Royal Highness Princess CHRISTIAN, of Schleswig-Holstein, wore a black train and petticoat, trimmed with Brussels lace; head-dress, a tiara of turquoise and diamonds; ornaments, turquoise and diamonds. Her Royal Highness Princess LOUISE (Marchioness of Lorne) wore a violet petticoat with Honiton lace, and a white poult de soie train, with ruching and feather trimming; ornaments, opals and diamonds.

—When Professor TYNDALL got back to London he met the uniform question, "How did you like the Americans?" with the answer that he was not in a position to form an opinion of the American people. From first to last, he says, he was among cultivated gentlemen and ladies, among thinkers and men of science; he was addressing the most pleasant and, apparently, intelligent audiences; and though there may have been numbers of people he might have disliked, he did not see them. To base an estimate of the whole country upon what he saw of it would be unfair; it would make America a realized Utopia. "There was," as he expressed it, "no break in the continuity of my existence. I parted from friends here, and found myself among just such friends there."

—Miss BRADDON has reason to respect the proprietors of the London Home Journal, who pay her ten thousand dollars for her current novel in that publication.

—A Philadelphia lady, the Countess DIESBACH, is now one of the leaders of society and fashion in Berlin.

—Queen VICTORIA is said to be growing very gray and feeble, and shuns society more than ever.

—Mr. STANLEY has again receded from the U. S., and gone as representative of the Herald to Khiva to see what is to be done there.

—The ladies of Philadelphia are taking an important part in the work of making the coming Centennial in that city a great success. A committee of thirty-six women in each ward has been organized to procure subscriptions for the general fund. A grand meeting arranged by them was held at the Academy of Music on the 19th of April, the anniversary of the battle of Lexington. The beauty and brains of the city were present. Among the orators who were especially brilliant on the occasion was DANIEL DOUGHERTY, who, in Philadelphia, is what JAMES T. BRADY was in New York. In the audience sat two great-granddaughters of BENJAMIN FRANKLIN—Mrs. GILLESPIE, chairman of the Ladies' Centennial Committee of Thirteen, and Mrs. EMORY, wife of Major-General WILLIAM H. EMORY, in command of the Department of New Orleans—both in their healthy prime, and eager for the success of the Centennial. Certainly it is a pleasant spectacle that the great-granddaughter of FRANKLIN (a daughter of the honored WILLIAM DUANE), should be president of the Committee of Thirteen (the number of the original colonies), to invoke the ladies of America to join in the celebration of the Declaration of Independence, in which FRANKLIN figured a plain, simple, yet immortal character!

—JENNY LIND charms the private circles of Berlin with her still delightful voice. Her daughter also gives promise of great musical power.

—Two of New York's best singers, Madame DE RYTHER and Madame VAN ZANDT, are to take prominent parts in a grand musical festival to be held this month in Rutland, Vermont.

—The following jeu d'esprit of the late N. P. WILLIS has just come to light for the first time in the Wilmington Journal. Mr. W. was at a soirée given in Washington by Mr. and Mrs. GALES to the Hon. JOHN A. CAMPBELL, then just returned as the minister to Mexico (now a prominent citizen of New Orleans). Mr. CAMPBELL was, of course, the distinguished guest of the evening, and received from Mrs. GALES very great attention. But that lady observed that her niece, Miss SEATON, was even more attentive to WILLIS than she herself was to Mr. CAMPBELL, and feared it might be thought imprudent in one so young, and wrote on a slip of paper her fears, requesting her niece not to be so particular in her attentions to the poet. This slip of paper was seen by Mr. WILLIS, who asked leave to reply to it, which he did as follows:

"Why, my dear aunt, would you me trammel?
You strain at a Nat, and swallow a Campbell."

—MICHAEL REESE, of San Francisco, has given two thousand dollars for the library of the late Dr. FRANCIS LIEBER, and presented it to the University of California.

—Hon. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, though elected to Congress from Georgia, announces that he has no intention of resigning the editorship of the Atlanta Sun, and declares that "peace throughout the State, quiet, and harmony prevail, including all classes, white and black," and that every body is now perfectly protected in Georgia.

—The late Colonel ELLSWORTH is finally to have a monument, $3000 having been subscribed for that purpose by Governor DIX, Judge PORTER, and other eminent citizens. Those who remember Colonel ELLSWORTH'S first visit to Washington will also remember that after the war broke out certain of the Washington firemen refused to extinguish a fire at Willard's Hotel, whereupon ELLSWORTH and his men broke open the engine-house, and put out the fire, for which Mr. WILLARD gave the regiment $500 in gold. A part of this goes toward the monument.

—The Miss WADSWORTH who hast just been appointed physician to the Sultan is a daughter of TITUS V. WADSWORTH, of Franklin, New Hampshire. She is a graduate from Mount Holyoke Seminary, studied medicine in Philadelphia, practiced her profession four years in Springfield, Massachusetts, then evaded the country and caused herself to be conveyed to Constantinople, where she has diagnosed all sorts of Turks, and is now, by special call, to feel the pulse, examine the tongue, and look over the great Sultan himself and his somewhat numerous family.

side of the foundation st.; the p. should come exactly above each other. 3d round.—1 sc. on the next p. of the 2d round, ∗ 1 leaflet; for this work 6 ch., 1 stc. (short treble crochet) on the second and 1 tc. (treble crochet) on the first of these 6 ch., work off both st. with the loop on the needle, throwing the thread over once; then work 6 ch., 1 sc. on the second following p., and repeat from ∗. After finishing these 3 rounds, make another ch. foundation, and on this crochet the two picot rounds as before. The following, 3d round, also consists of leaflets and ch. bars, but they are worked in reversed order; thus, after every sc. crochet 12 ch., and with the last 6 ch. work the leaflet in a downward direction. Join these two halves of the insertion with a leaflet round, laying them together so that the leaflets and ch. bars of both halves come on each other, then work the upper st. of two leaflets together with 1 sc., work one leaflet, and so on.

The edging Fig. 2 consists of five rounds. On a foundation of the requisite length crochet the 1st round like that of the edging shown by Fig. 1. 2d round.—∗ 1 sc. on the next p. of the preceding round, 1 ch., 1 p. (for the p. of this and the following round crochet 2 ch., drop the loop from the needle, insert the needle in the ch. before the last, and draw the thread through), 3 ch., 5 p., 3 ch., 1 p., 1 ch., pass over 5 p. of the preceding round, and repeat from ∗. Work the 3d round like the 2d round, but always crochet the sc. on the middle of the 5 p. of the 1st round which were passed over, and in working the picot scallops always fasten to the middle of the 3 ch. after the first and before the last p. of each scallop in the preceding round with 1 sl., as shown by the illustration. 4th round.—This round is worked on the other side of the foundation on the wrong side of the work. ∗ 1 sl. on the next foundation st., 1 p. (for this p. crochet 1 ch., drop the loop from the needle, insert the needle in the last sl., and draw through the thread), 1 sl. on the following foundation st., and repeat from ∗. 5th round.—On the right side of the work always alternately 1 sl. on the next p. in the preceding round, 1 ch.

For the insertion Fig. 3 make a ch. foundation of the requisite length, and on it crochet the 1st round.—Always alternately 3 sl. and 1 p. (picot, consisting of 4 ch. and 1 sl. on the last of the 3 sl.). Work the 2d round just like the 1st round on the other

STAND WITH MUSIC PORTFOLIO.

The insertion Fig. 4 is worked from the middle. Make a ch. foundation measuring one and one-half the length of the insertion. This foundation is crossed over by the st. of the 1st round, working always alternately 1 sl. on 1 foundation st., 7 ch., with these pass over 7 foundation st.; these 7 ch. should alternately come once on one side and once on the other side of the foundation st. The 2d round is worked on one side of the scallops formed by the foundation st. and the st. of the 1st round. Crochet ∗ 7 sl. on the 7 ch. of the next scallop, then 3 sl. on the first 3 ch. of the next scallop, 1 p. on the last sl.; then 2 sl. with 2 p. and 2 sl. on the 4 st. of the same ch. scallop, and repeat from ∗. 3d round.—Three leaflets separated each by 7 ch. on the middle st. of each scallop consisting of sl., thus always passing over the picot scallops. For each leaflet crochet on the corresponding sl. 1 tc., then 1 stc. at the foot of the latter, and 1 tc. again on the sl., always working off these 3 st. together, throwing the thread over once. The 4th round consists of sl. and p., which are worked as shown by the illustration. Then work the last three rounds on the other side of the work similar to the 2d–4th rounds.

EMBROIDERED BORDER FOR FURNITURE, HANGINGS, ETC.

Florentine Guipure Border.

THIS border is especially suited to church trimmings, such as altar or pulpit covers, surplices, etc.; it may, however, be used also for curtains, window-shades, table-covers, etc. To make the border first work a foundation of the requisite length and width in straight netting. Darn separate parts of the foundation in point de toile as shown by the illustration, and on this work the raised leaf-shaped figures in point de reprise; then also work the remaining open-work and close squares and the different wheels as shown by the illustration. Finally, work the button-hole stitches partly on the netted bars of the foundation and partly on the working thread, which is stretched in a slanting direction from one netted stitch to another, as shown by the illustration; these slanting bars should lie loose on the foundation; therefore, in working them, the needle is not inserted in the netted bars below. The projecting straight picots are worked in connection with the corresponding button-hole stitch bars; work for each picot three or four button-hole stitches on the next netted bar of the foundation, and passing the needle back through these stitches, carry the working thread back to the point from which the work is to be continued. For the wound picots on the small button-hole stitch scallops twist the working thread tight close underneath the stitch to which such a picot is to be joined, by doing this the thread forms a small loop, which is left standing in working the next stitch. Having also edged the outer edge of the border with button-hole stitches, cut away the netted foundation close underneath these stitches and between the design figures, as shown by the illustration; in cutting the netted bars close to the picots, great care should be taken that the working thread is not cut also.

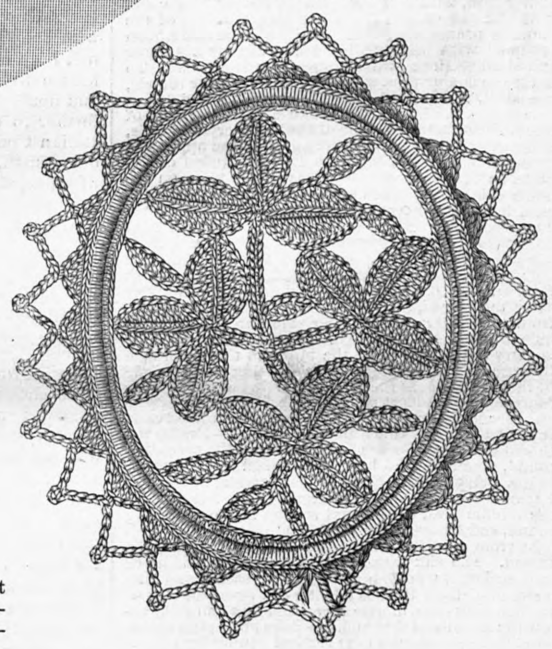

Fig. 2.—CROCHET MEDALLION FOR LINGERIE.

Crochet Medallions for Lingerie, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE medallions, which may be used for trimming lingerie, and when set together in a star also form pretty covers for toilette cushions, are worked with crochet cotton, No. 60. Begin each medallion with the stem of the lower leaves. In working the medallion shown by Fig. 1 make for this stem and for the middle rib of the lower leaf turned toward the right a foundation of 33 ch. (chain stitch), going back on these work 8 sc. (single crochet), 3 sdc. (short double crochet), 10 dc. (double crochet), 3 sdc., 1 sc.; pay no attention for the present to the last 8 ch., which form the stem. Work on the free side of the ch. foundation the points of the leaf as follows: 1 ch., 1 sl. (slip stitch) on the next foundation st. (stitch) in the preceding round, 1 sc. on the following foundation st., 2 ch., 5 stc. (short treble crochet) on the following 5 foundation st. of the preceding round, 2 ch., 1 sdc. on the next foundation st. of the preceding round. The second point is worked in a similar manner; in the third point after 5 dc. there follow 1 sdc. and sc. to the end (point) of the leaf, where 1 ch. is worked. Going back on the middle rib work the second half of the leaf to correspond with the first half, but only to the third dc. of the last point. Work from here, without finishing the point, 20 ch. for the stem of the lower flower, in doing which fasten to the preceding leaf as shown by the illustration. Close the last 6 of these ch. in a ring, and crochet on the ring one round of 8 sc., then 1 ch., 1 sc., 1 sdc. on the first of the 8 sc., 2 dc. each on the next 3 sc., 11 ch., fasten to the back horizontal vein of the last dc., 5 sl. on the last 5 of the 11 ch. To the same vein fasten three more such bars, consisting each of 6 ch. and 5 sl. For the upper edge work five times 3 ch. separated each by 1 sc.; fastened carefully, work sc. on each front vein of the st. in the 2d round, widening 1 st. now and then in order to obtain the greater width on the outer edge. 4th round.—On each back vein of the st. in the 2d round 1 sc., also widening 1 st. now and then. 5th round.—∗ 1 sl. on the next sc. of the preceding round, 1 sc., 1 sdc., 2 dc., 1 sdc., 1 sc. on the following 4 sc. (thus widening 2 st.); repeat from ∗. 6th round.—3 sl. on the first half of the next point in the preceding round, ∗ 2 sc. on the middle 2 dc., 4 ch., 1 p. (picot, consisting of 4 ch. and 1 sc. on the first ch.), 4 ch., and repeat from ∗.

The medallion Fig. 2 is worked similarly to the medallion just described. Begin with the lower stem and work all the leaves in connection, carefully observing the illustration. For each separate leaflet of each three-leaved figure first form the middle rib of one round of sl. on a ch. foundation, then work the two side halves. The illustration plainly shows the order in which the leaf figures and stems and the separate small leaves are worked. The latter consist only of a row of dc. on a ch. foundation. The outer edge, six rounds wide, is worked exactly in the manner described for Fig. 1.

Chenille Satin Stitch Embroidery for Music Portfolios, etc.

THIS medallion is suitable for trimming portfolios (like that on p. 324), work-baskets, back or toilette cushions, etc. The embroidery may be worked on a foundation of light faille—such as gray or fawn—either with fine chenille of various colors, or with filling or saddler's silk, or else with split worsted and silk. In the original the embroidery is worked in dovetailed satin stitch with fine chenille—the flowers and buds in several shades of violet and pink, the leaves, stems, and vines in several shades of green and brown. If the foundation is of another color, for instance light blue, the flowers may be worked in gray and white, and the leaves and stems in moss green and brown. The chenille embroidery in the colors previously described, when worked on a foundation of white silk crape or fine Irish silk gauze, has a very pretty and delicate effect; when worked in this manner the medallion is especially adapted for trimming toilette cushions.

THIS jewel-box is of maple-wood, ornamented with raised polished borders and with painting in bright colors and gold. Fig. 2 shows the painting for the lid, and Fig. 3 for the front of the box, in full size. The arabesques of the design are finely outlined with black India ink; the others retain the original color of the wood. The parts between the arabesques that are of the darkest shade in the illustrations are covered with dark blue, and the lighter parts with light blue color. For the medallion on the middle of the lid set on gold ground and outline the monogram with black India ink. The inside of the box is furnished with blue faille lining quilted in diamonds.

See illustrations on pages 324 and 325.

THIS ash-receiver is made of black varnished cane bars and a small bronzed cup; it is furnished at the top with embroidered lambrequins and blue silk tassels, as shown by Fig. 1. The foundation for the lambrequins, one of which is shown in full size by Fig. 2, page 324, is of red cloth; the embroidery is worked partly with blue saddler's silk in satin stitch, and partly with gold cord and beads. The lambrequins are pinked on the outer edge. The lambrequin Fig. 3, page 324, may also be used for trimming the ash-receiver. The foundation of this lambrequin is of gray cloth in the original; the flowers are cut of violet and the leaves of green cloth, and are ornamented with calixes and veins of saddler's silk of the same color, and sewed on the foundation. The stems and vines are worked with gold cord. The lambrequins are bordered with colored silk braid, and are trimmed in the hollow between the points with covered grelots.

See illustrations on pages 324 and 325.

THIS stand is made of turned black wood, partly varnished and partly stained; the upper plate, designed to hold the tooth-picks, is furnished, as shown by the illustration, with a lambrequin of strung beads and blue silk tassels, and the lower part (the foot) of the stand is ornamented with a ruche of blue silk ribbon trimmed with beads. Figs. 2 and 3, page 324, show full-sized sections of the lambrequins and ruche. To make the lambrequin, which is worked in four rounds, use steel, crystal, and chalk beads, No. 2, and larger crystal beads. 1st round.—Take a double thread of fine white silk, take up one of the larger crystal beads, and carry the thread from the under to the upper side through one of the holes on the outer edge of the plate, so that the bead lies close to the plate on the under side. Then take up one large crystal bead, * 11 steel beads and 1 large crystal bead, pass the thread from the upper to the under side through the next hole, take up 1 large crystal bead, pass the thread from the under to the upper side back through the same hole and through the crystal bead above, and repeat from *. 2d round.—At the beginning of this round carry the thread, without passing it through a bead, from the under to the upper side through the first hole in the preceding round. Take up 19 steel beads, * carry the thread from the upper to the under side through the next hole (without passing through one of the crystal beads there), pass the thread through the fourth before the last of the 19 steel beads, take up 15 steel beads, and repeat from *; fasten the thread carefully at the end of this round. 3d round.—Fasten the thread to the middle bead of a scallop in the preceding round, take up 1 steel bead, * 8 crystal beads, 8 chalk beads, 1 silk tassel, 8 chalk beads, 8 crystal beads, and 1 steel bead, carry the thread from right to left through the middle bead of the next scallop in the preceding round, and through the steel bead taken up last; repeat from * to the end of the round, and fasten the thread. The silk tassels taken up in the middle of each scallop are made previously; for each tassel take a strand of forty threads of blue silk seven-eighths of an inch long each, double them, and tie them tight below the middle. 4th round.—*Take up 11 steel beads, wind them around the next vertical joining bar of two scallops in the 2d round, from right to left, close underneath the plate, and carry the thread through the first of the 11 steel beads, so that they form a loop. Take up 6 crystal beads, 12 chalk beads, 6 crystal beads, twine them through the next two bead scallops of the preceding round, as shown by Fig. 2, and repeat from *, always going forward. Then fasten the thread. To make the border for the foot of the stand take blue silk ribbon three-quarters of an inch wide, arrange it on a strip of card-board half an inch wide, at regular intervals of half an inch, in a triple box-pleat half an inch wide, and baste the edges of the ribbon together in the middle of each pleat, as shown by Fig. 3. Fasten the plain parts between the pleats of this ruche on the strip of card-board, folding the edges of the ribbon on the wrong side of the strip in a hair's-breadth, and basting them together with long stitches. On the smooth parts of the ruche thus fastened stretch six rows of beads each, as shown by Fig. 11, the first row consisting of steel beads, the second of crystal beads, the third and fourth of chalk beads, the fifth of crystal beads, and the sixth of steel beads. Pass the thread from one row of beads to another, through the folded edges of the ribbon on the wrong side of the card-board.

See illustration on page 324.

THE stand and frame of this portfolio are made of turned wooden bars, partly stained and partly coated with black varnish. The stand is twenty-eight inches and seven-eighths high and twenty-six inches and a half wide; the portfolio is twelve inches and seven-eighths high, and sixteen inches and seven-eighths wide, and is furnished with soufflets of dark gray shagreen leather, and divided into two equal parts by a piece of card-board. The foundation of the portfolio is of light gray faille, ornamented in front with a medallion worked with fine colored chenille in satin and half-polka stitch embroidery, for a full-sized illustration of which see page 325 and the accompanying article. The arabesque design which surrounds this embroidery is worked partly with gray saddler's silk and gold thread in point Russe and partly with fine gray silk round cord. On the back of the portfolio is a monogram worked in satin and half-polka stitch with gray silk and gold thread.

See illustration on page 324.

THIS border is suitable for trimming arm-chairs, sofas, curtains, hangings, covers, etc. For the foundation either cloth, silk, or fine woolen material may be used; the color should, of course, harmonize with the furniture of the room. The embroidery is worked in satin and half-polka stitch and in point Russe, either with split worsted or with filling or saddler's silk, in the Turkish style—that is, in different bright colors or several shades of one color. In the original the foundation is light gray cloth, the darkest parts are worked in dark brown, the medium shades alternately in red and light blue, and the lightest shade with maize silk. The illustration distinctly shows the gradations of color. The border is extremely effective, and is well adapted to a great variety of uses.

LADY ANNA.

CHAPTER V.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL MAKES A PROPOSITION.

WHEN Mr. Flick returned from Sicily he was very strongly in favor of some compromise. He had seen the so-called Italian Countess—who certainly was now called Contessa by every body around her—and he did not believe that she had ever been married to the Earl. That an Italian lady had been married to the old Earl now twenty-five years ago, he did believe—probably the younger sister of this woman—and that this wife had been dead before the marriage at Applethwaite. That was his private belief. Mr. Flick was, in his way, an honest man—one who certainly would have taken no conscious part in getting up an unjust claim; but he was now acting as legal agent for the young Earl, and it was not his business to get up evidence for the Earl's opponents. He did think that, were he to use all his ingenuity and the funds at his disposal, he would be able to reach the real truth in such a manner that it should be made clear and indubitable to an English jury; but if the real truth were adverse to his side, why search for it? He understood that the English Countess would stand her ground on the legality of the Applethwaite marriage, and on the acquittal of the old Earl as to the charge of bigamy. The English Countess being so far firm as that ground would make her, it would in reality be for the other side—for the young Earl—to prove a former marriage. The burden of the proof would be with him, and not with the English Countess, to disprove it. Disingenuous lawyers—Mr. Flick, who, though fairly honest, could be disingenuous among the number—had declared the contrary. But such was the case; and, as money was scarce with the Countess and her friends, no attempt had been made on their part to bring home evidence from Sicily. All this Mr. Flick knew, and doubted how far it might be wise for him further to disturb that Sicilian romance. The Italian Countess, who was a hideous, worn-out old woman, professing to be forty-four, probably fifty-five, and looking as though she were seventy-five, would not stir a step toward England. She would swear, and had sworn, any number of oaths. Documentary evidence from herself, from various priests, from servants, and from neighbors there was in plenty. Mr. Flick learned through his interpreter that a certain old priest ridiculed the idea of there being a doubt. And there were letters—letters alleged to have been written by the Earl to the living wife in the old days, which were shown to Mr. Flick. Mr. Flick was an educated man, and knew many things. He knew something of the manufacture of paper, and would not look at the letters after the first touch. It was not for him to get up evidence for the other side. The hideous old woman was clamorous for money. The priests were clamorous for money. The neighbors were clamorous for money. Had not they all sworn any thing that was wanted, and were they not to be paid? Some moderate payment was made to the hideous, creeching, greedy old woman; some trivial payment—as to which Mr. Flick was heartily ashamed of himself—was made to the old priest; and then Mr. Flick hurried home, fully convinced that a compromise should be made as to the money, and that the legality of the titles claimed by the two English ladies should be allowed. It might be that that hideous hag had once been the Countess Lovel. It certainly was the case that the old Earl in latter years had so called her, though he had never once seen her during his last residence in Sicily. It might be that the clumsy fiction of the letters had been perpetrated with the view of bolstering up a true case with false evidence. But Mr. Flick thought that there should be a compromise, and expressed his opinion very plainly to Sir William Patterson. "You mean a marriage," said the Solicitor-General. At this time Mr. Hardy, Q. C., the second counsel acting on behalf of the Earl, was also present.

"Not necessarily by a marriage, Sir William. They could divide the money."

"The girl is not of age," said Mr. Hardy.

"She is barely twenty as yet," said Sir William.

"I think it might be managed on her behalf," said the attorney.

"Who could be empowered to sacrifice her rights?" said Mr. Hardy, who was a gruff man.

"We might perhaps contrive to tide it over till she is of age," said the Solicitor-General, who was a sweet-mannered, mild man among his friends, though he could cross-examine a witness off his legs—or hers—if the necessity of the case required him to do so.

"Of course we could do that, Sir William. What is a year in such a case as this?"

"Not much among lawyers, is it, Mr. Flick? You think that we shouldn't bring our case into court."

"It is a good case, Sir William, no doubt. There's the woman—Countess, we call her—ready to swear, and has sworn, that she was the old Earl's wife. All the people round call her the Countess. The Earl undoubtedly used to speak of her as the Countess, and send her little dribbles of money, as being his Countess, during the ten years and more after he left Lovel Grange. There is the old priest who married them."

"The devil's in it, if that is not a good case," said Mr. Hardy.

"Go on, Mr. Flick," said the Solicitor-General.

"I've got all the documentary evidence, of course, Sir William."

"Go on, Mr. Flick."

Mr. Flick scratched his head. "It's a very heavy interest, Sir William."

"No doubt it is. Go on."

"I don't know that I've any thing further to say, except that I'd arrange it if I could. Our client, Sir William, would be in a very pretty position if he got half the income which is at stake."

"Or the whole with the wife," said the Solicitor-General.

"Or the whole with the wife, Sir William. If he were to lose it all, he'd be, so to say, nowhere."

"Nowhere at all," said the Solicitor-General. "The entailed property isn't worth above a thousand a year."

"I'd make some arrangement," said Mr. Flick, whose mind may perhaps have had an unnatural bend toward his own very large venture in this concern. That his bill, including the honorarium of the barrister, would sooner or later be paid out of the estate, he did not doubt; but a compromise would make the settlement easy and pleasant.

Mr. Hardy was in favor of continued fighting. A keener, honester, more enlightened lawyer than Mr. Hardy did not wear silk at that moment, but he had not the gift of seeing through darkness which belonged to the Solicitor-General. When Mr. Flick told them of the strength of their case, as based on various heads of evidence in their favor, Mr. Hardy believed Mr. Flick's words and rejected Mr. Flick's opinion. He believed in his heart that the English Countess was an impostor, not herself believing in her own claim; and it would be gall and wormwood to him to give to such a one a moiety of the wealth which should go to support the ancient dignity and aristocratic grace of the house of Lovel. He hated compromise and desired justice, and was a great rather than a successful lawyer. Sir William had at once perceived that there was something in the background on which it was his duty to calculate, which he was bound to consider, but with which at the same time it was inexpedient that he should form a closer or more accurate acquaintance. He must do the best he could do for his client. Earl Lovel with a thousand a year, and that probably already embarrassed, would be a poor, wretched creature, a mock lord, an earl without the very essence of an earldom. But Earl Lovel with fifteen or twenty thousand a year would be as good as most other earls. It would be but the difference between two powdered footmen and four, between four hunters and eight, between Belgrave Square and Eaton Place. Sir William, had he felt confident, would of course have preferred the four footmen for his client, and the eight hunters, and Belgrave Square, even though the poor English Countess should have starved, or been fed by the tailor's bounty. But he was not confident. He began to think that that wicked old Earl had been too wicked for them all. "They say she's a very nice girl," said Sir William.

"Very handsome indeed, I'm told," said Mr. Flick.

"And in love with the son of the old tailor from Keswick," said Mr. Hardy.

"She'll prefer the lord to the tailor for a guinea," said Sir William.

And thus it was decided, after some indecisive fashion, that their client should be sounded as to the expedience of a compromise. It was certain to them that the poor woman would be glad to accept, for herself and her daughter, half of the wealth at stake—which half would be to her almost unlimited riches—on the condition that their rank was secured to them—their rank and all the privileges of honest legitimacy. But as to such an arrangement the necessary delay offered no doubt a serious impediment, and it was considered that the wisest course would be to propose the marriage. But who should propose it, and how should it be proposed? Sir William was quite willing to make the suggestion to the young lord or the young lord's family, whose consent must of course be first obtained; but who should then break the ice to the Countess? "I suppose we must ask our friend, the Sergeant," said Mr. Flick. Sergeant Bluestone was the leading counsel for our Countess, and was vehemently energetic in this case. He swore every where that the Solicitor-General hadn't a leg to stand upon, and that the Solicitor-General knew that he hadn't a leg. Let them bring that Italian Countess over if they dared. He'd countess her, and discountess her too! Since he had first known the English courts of law there had been no case hard as this was hard. Had not the old Earl been acquitted of the charge of bigamy, when the unfortunate woman had done her best to free herself from her position? Sergeant Bluestone, who was a very violent man, taking up all his cases as though the very holding of a brief opposite to him was an insult to himself, had never before been so violent. "The Sergeant will take it as a surrender," said Mr. Flick.

"We must get round the Sergeant," said Sir William. "There are ladies in the Lovel family; we must manage it through them." And so it was arranged by the young lord's lawyers that an attempt should be made to marry him to the heiress.

The two cousins had never seen each other. Lady Anna had hardly heard of Frederic Lovel before her father's death; but, since that, had been brought up to regard the young lord as her natural enemy. The young lord had been taught from his youth upward to look upon the soi-disant Countess and her daughter as impostors who would some day strive to rob him of his birthright—and, in these latter days, as impostors who were hard a work upon their project. And he had been told of the intimacy between the Countess and the old tailor, and also of that between the so-called Lady Anna and the young tailor. To these distant Lovels—to Frederic Lovel who had been brought up with the knowledge that he must be the Earl, and to his uncle and aunt by whom he had been brought up—the women down at Keswick had been represented as vulgar, odious, and desreputable. We all know how firm can be the faith of a family in such matters. The Lovels were not without fear as to the result of the attempt that was being made. They understood quite as well as did Mr. Flick the glory of the position which would attend upon success, and the wretchedness attendant upon a pauper earldom. They were nervous enough, and in some moods frightened. But their trust in the justice of their cause was unbounded. The old Earl, whose memory was horrible to them, had purposely left two enemies in their way. There had been the Italian mistress backed up by the will; and there had been this illegitimate child. The one was vanquished; but the other—! Ah, it would be bad with them indeed if that enemy could not be vanquished too! They had offered £30,000 to the enemy; but the enemy would not accept the bribe. The idea of ending all their troubles by a marriage never occurred to them. Had Mrs. Lovel been asked about it, she would have said that Anna Murray—as she always studiously called the Lady Anna—was not fit to be married.

The young lord, who a few months after his cousin's death had been old enough to take his seat in the House of Peers, was a gay-hearted, kindly young man, who had been brought home from sea at the age of twenty on the death of an elder brother. Some of the family had wished that he should go on with his profession in spite of the earldom; but it had been thought unfit that he should be an earl and a midshipman at the same time, and his cousin's death while he was still on shore settled the question. He was a fair-haired, well-made young lad, looking like a sailor, and every inch a gentleman. Had he believed that the Lady Anna was the Lady Anna, no earthly consideration would have induced him to meddle with the money. Since the old lord's death, he had lived chiefly with his uncle Charles Lovel, having passed some two or three months at Lovel Grange with his uncle and aunt. Charles Lovel was a clergyman, with a good living at Yoxham, in Yorkshire, who had married a rich wife, a woman with some two thousand a year of her own, and was therefore well to do in the world. His two sons were at Harrow, and he had one other child, a daughter. With them also lived a Miss Lovel, Aunt Julia—who was supposed of all the Lovels to be the wisest and most strong-minded. The parson, though a popular man, was not strong-minded. He was passionate, loud, generous, affectionate, and indiscreet. He was very proud of his nephew's position as head of the family, and very full of his nephew's wrongs arising from the fraud of those Murray women. He was a violent Tory, and had heard much of the Keswick Radical. He never doubted for a moment that both old Thwaite and young Thwaite were busy in concocting an enormous scheme of plunder by which to enrich themselves. To hear that they had both been convicted and transported was the hope of his life. That a Radical should not be worthy of transportation was to him impossible. That a Radical should be honest was to him incredible. But he was a thoroughly humane and charitable man, whose good qualities were as little intelligible to old Thomas Thwaite as were those of Thomas Thwaite to him.

To whom should the Solicitor-General first break the matter? He had already had some intercourse with the Lovels, and had not been impressed with a sense of the parson's wisdom. He was a Whig Solicitor-General, for there were still Whigs in those days, and Mr. Lovel had not much liked him. Mr. Flick had seen much of the family, having had many interviews with the young lord, with the parson, and with Aunt Julia. It was at last settled by Sir William's advice that a letter should be written to Aunt Julia by Mr. Flick suggesting that she should come up to town.

"Mr. Lovel will be very angry," said Mr. Flick.

"We must do the best we can for our client," said Sir William. The letter was written, and Miss Lovel was informed in Mr. Flick's most discreet style, that as Sir William Patterson was anxious to discuss a matter concerning Lord Lovel's case in which a woman's voice would probably be of more service than that of a man, perhaps Miss Lovel would not object to the trouble of a journey to London. Miss Lovel did come up, and her brother came with her.

The interview took place in Sir William's chambers, and no one was present but Sir William, Miss Lovel, and Mr. Flick. Mr. Flick had been instructed to sit still and say nothing, unless he were asked a question, and he obeyed his instructions. After some apologies, which were, perhaps, too soft and sweet—and which were by no means needed, as Miss Lovel herself, though very wise, was neither soft nor sweet—the great man then opened his case. "This is a very serious matter, Miss Lovel."

"Very serious indeed."

"You can hardly, perhaps, conceive how great a load of responsibility lies upon a lawyer's shoulders, when he has to give advice in such a case as this, when perhaps the prosperity of a whole family may turn upon his words."

"He can only do his best."

"Ah, yes, Miss Lovel. That is easy to say; but how shall he know what is the best?"

"I suppose the truth will prevail at last. It is impossible to think that a young man such as my nephew should be swindled out of a noble fortune by the intrigues of two such women as these. I can't believe it, and I won't believe it. Of course I am only a woman, but I always thought it wrong to offer them even a shilling." Sir William smiled and rubbed his bald head, fixing his eyes on those of the lady. Though he smiled, she could see that there was real sadness in his face. "You don't mean to say you doubt?" she said.

"Indeed I do."

"You think that a wicked scheme like this can succeed before an English judge?"

"But if the scheme be not wicked? Let me tell you one or two things, Miss Lovel—or rather my own private opinion on one or two points. I do not believe that these two ladies are swindlers."

"They are not ladies, and I feel sure that they are swindlers," said Miss Lovel, very firmly, turning her face as she spoke to the attorney.

"I am telling you, of course, merely my own opinion, and I will beg you to believe of me that in forming it I have used all the experience and all the caution which a long course of practice in these matters has taught me. Your nephew is entitled to my best services, and at the present moment I can perhaps do my duty to him most thoroughly by asking you to listen to me." The lady closed her lips together, and sat silent. "Whether Mrs. Murray, as we have hitherto called her, was or was not the legal wife of the late Earl, I will not just now express an opinion; but I am sure that she thinks that she was. The marriage was formal and accurate. The Earl was tried for bigamy, and acquitted. The people with whom we have to do across the water, in Sicily, are not respectable. They can not be induced to come here to give evidence. An English jury will be naturally averse to them. The question is one simply of facts for a jury, and we can not go beyond a jury. Had the daughter been a son, it would have been in the House of Lords to decide which young man should be the peer; but, as it is, it is simply a question of property, and of facts as to the ownership of the property. Should we lose the case, your nephew would be—a very poor man."

"A very poor man indeed, Sir William."

"His position would be distressing. I am bound to say that we should go into court to try the case with very great distrust. Mr. Flick quite agrees with me."

"Quite so, Sir William," said Mr. Flick.

Miss Lovel again looked at the attorney, closed her lips tighter than ever, but did not say a word.

"In such cases as this prejudices will arise, Miss Lovel. It is natural that you and your family should be prejudiced against these ladies. For myself, I am not aware that any thing true can be alleged against them."

"The girl has disgraced herself with the tailor's son," almost screamed Miss Lovel.

"You have been told so, but I do not believe it to be true. They were, no doubt, brought up as children together; and Mr. Thwaite has been most kind to both the ladies." It at once occurred to Miss Lovel that Sir William was a Whig, and that there was, in truth, but little difference between a Whig and a Radical. To be at heart a gentleman, or at heart a lady, it was, to her thinking, necessary to be a Tory. "It would be a thousand pities that so noble a property should pass out of a family which, by its very splendor and ancient nobility, is placed in need of ample means." On hearing this sentiment, which might have become even a Tory, Miss Lovel relaxed somewhat the muscles of her face.

"Were the Earl to marry his cousin—"

"She is not his cousin."

"Were the Earl to marry the young lady who, it may be, will be proud to be his cousin, the whole difficulty would be cleared away."

"Marry her!"

"I am told that she is very lovely, and that pains have been taken with her education. Her mother was well born and well bred. If you would get at the truth, Miss Lovel, you must teach yourself to believe that they are not swindlers. They are no more swindlers than I am a swindler. I will go farther—though perhaps you and the young Earl and Mr. Flick may think me unfit to be intrusted any longer with this case after such a declaration—I believe, though it is with a doubting belief, that the elder lady is the Countess Lovel, and that her daughter is the legitimate child and the heir of the late Earl."

Mr. Flick sat with his mouth open as he heard this—beating his breast almost with despair. His opinion tallied exactly with Sir William's. Indeed, it was by his opinion, hardly expressed, but perfectly understood, that Sir William had been led. But he had not thought that Sir William would be so bold and candid.

"You believe that Anna Murray is the real heir?" gasped Miss Lovel.

"I do—with a doubting belief. I am inclined that way—having to form my opinion on very conflicting evidence." Mr. Flick was by this time quite sure that Sir William was right in his opinion, though perhaps wrong in declaring it, having been corroborated in his own belief by the reflex of it on a mind more powerful than his own. "Thinking as I do," continued Sir William, "with a natural bias toward my own client, what will a jury think, who will have no such bias? If they are cousins—distant cousins—why should they not marry and be happy, one bringing the title and the other the wealth? There could be no more rational union, Miss Lovel."

Then there was a long pause before any one spoke a word. Mr. Flick had been forbidden to speak, and Sir William, having made his proposition, was determined to await the lady's reply. The lady was aghast, and for a while could neither think nor utter a word. At last she opened her mouth. "I must speak to my brother about this."

"Quite right, Miss Lovel."

"Now I may go, Sir William?"

"Good-morning, Miss Lovel." And Miss Lovel went.

"You have gone farther than I thought you would, Sir William," said Mr. Flick.

"I hardly went far enough, Mr. Flick. We must go farther yet if we mean to save any part of the property for the young man. What should we gain, even if we succeeded in proving that the Earl was married in early life to the old Sicilian hag that still lives? She would inherit the property then—not the Earl."

CHAPTER VI.

YOXHAM RECTORY.

MISS LOVEL, wise and strong-minded as she was, did not dare to come to any decision on the proposition made to her without consulting some one. Strong as she was, she found herself at once to be too weak to speak to her nephew on the subject of her late interview with the great lawyer without asking her brother's opinion. The parson had accompanied her up to London, in a state of wrath against Sir William, in that he had not been sent for instead of his sister, and to him she told all that had been said. Her brother was away at his club when she got back to her hotel, and she had some hours in which to think of what had taken place. She could not at once bring herself to believe that all her former beliefs were vain and ill-founded.

But if the opinion of the Solicitor-General had not prevailed with her, it prevailed still less when it reached her brother second-hand. She had been shaken, but Mr. Lovel at first was not shaken at all. Sir William was a Whig and a traitor. He had never known a Whig who was not a traitor. Sir William was throwing them over. The Murray people, who were all Whigs, had got hold of him. He, Mr. Lovel, would go at once to Mr. Hardy, and tell Mr. Hardy what he thought. The case should be immediately taken out of the hands of Messrs. Norton and Flick. Did not all the world know that these impostors were impostors? Sir William should be exposed and degraded—though, in regard to this threatened degradation, Mr. Lovel was almost of opinion that his party would like their Solicitor-General better for having shown himself to be a traitor, and therefore proved himself to be a good Whig. He stormed and flew about the room, using language which hardly became his cloth. If his nephew married the girl, he would never own his nephew again. If that swindle was to prevail, let his nephew be poor and honest. He would give half of all he had toward supporting the peerage, and was sure that his boys would thank him for what he had done. But they should never call that woman cousin; and as for himself, might his tongue be blistered if ever he spoke of either of those women as Countess Lovel. He was inclined to think that the whole case should be immediately taken out of the hands of Norton and Flick, without further notice, and another solicitor employed. But at last he consented to call on Mr. Norton on the following morning.

Mr. Norton was a heavy, honest old man, who attended to simple conveyancing, and sat amidst the tin boxes of his broad-acred clients. He had no alternative but to send for Mr. Flick, and Mr. Flick came. When Mr. Lovel showed his anger, Mr. Flick became somewhat indignant. Mr. Flick knew how to assert himself, and Mr. Lovel was not quite the same man in the lawyer's chambers that he had been in his own parlor at the hotel. Mr. Flick was of opinion that no better counsel was to be had in England than the Solicitor-General, and no opinion more worthy of trust than his. If the Earl chose to put his case into other hands, of course he could do so, but it would behoove his lordship to be very careful lest he should prejudice most important interests by showing his own weakness to his opponents. Mr. Flick spoke in the interest of his client—so he said—and not in his own. Mr. Flick was clearly of opinion that a compromise should be arranged; and having given that opinion, could say nothing more on the present occasion. On the next day the young Earl saw Mr. Flick, and also saw Sir William, and was then told by his aunt of the proposition which had been made. The parson retired to Yoxham, and Miss Lovel remained in London with her nephew. By the end of the week Miss Lovel was brought round to think that some compromise was expedient. All this took place in May. The cause had been fixed for trial in the following November, the long interval having been allowed because of the difficulty expected in producing the evidence necessary for rebutting the claims of the late Earl's daughter.

By the middle of June all the Lovels were again in London—the parson, his sister, the parson's wife, and the Earl. "I never saw the young woman in my life," said the Earl to his aunt.

"As for that," said his aunt, "no doubt you could see her if you thought it wise to do so."

"I suppose she might be asked to the rectory," said Mrs. Lovel.

"That would be giving up altogether," said the aunt.

"Sir William said that it would not be against us at all," said Aunt Julia.

"You would have to call her Lady Anna," said Mrs. Lovel.

"I couldn't do it," said the rector. "It would be much better to give her half."

"But why should she take the half if the whole belongs to her?" said the young lord. "And why should I ask even for the half if nothing belongs to me?" At this time the young lord had become almost despondent as to his alleged rights, and now and again had made every body belonging to him miserable by talking of withdrawing from his claim. He had come to understand that Sir William believed that the daughter was the real heir, and he thought that Sir William must know better than others. He was downhearted and low in spirits, but not the less determined to be just in all that he did.

"I have made inquiry," said Aunt Julia, "and I do believe that the stories which we heard against the girl were untrue."

"The tailor and his son have been their most intimate friends," said Mr. Lovel.

"Because they had none others," said Mrs. Lovel.

It had been settled that by the 24th of June the lord was to say whether he would or would not take Sir William's advice. If he would do so, Sir William was to suggest what step should next be taken as to making the necessary overtures to the two ladies. If he would not, then Sir William was to advise how best the case might be carried on. They were all again at Yoxham that day, and the necessary communication was to be made to Mr. Flick by post. The young man had been alone the whole morning thinking of his condition, and undoubtedly the desire for the money had grown on him strongly. Why should it not have done so? Is there a nobleman in Great Britain who can say that he could lose the fortune which he possesses or the fortune which he expects without an agony that would almost break his heart? He sighed for the wealth without which his title would only be to him a terrible burden, and yet he was resolved that he would take no part in any thing that was unjust. This girl, he heard, was beautiful and soft and pleasant, and now they told him that the evil things which had been reported against her had been slanders. He was assured that she was neither coarse, nor vulgar, nor unmaidenly. Two or three old men, of equal rank with his own—men who had been his father's friends and were allied to the Lovels, and had been taken into confidence by Sir William—told him that the proper way out of the difficulty had been suggested to him. There could be nothing, they said, more fitting than that two cousins so situated should marry. With such an acknowledgment of her rank and birth, every body would visit his wife. There was not a countess or a duchess in London who would not be willing to take her by the hand. His two aunts had gradually given way, and it was clear to him that his uncle would give way—even his uncle—if he would but yield himself. It was explained to him that if the girl came to Yoxham, with the privilege of being called Lady Anna by the inhabitants of the rectory, she would of course do so on the understanding that she would accept her cousin's hand. "But she might not like me," said the young Earl to his aunt.

"Not like you!" said Mrs. Lovel, putting her hand up to his brow and pushing away his hair. Was it possible that any girl should not like such a man as that, and he an earl?

"And if I did not like her, Aunt Lovel?"

"Then I would not ask her to be my wife." He thought that there was an injustice in this, and yet before the day was over he had assented.

"I do not think that I can call her Lady Anna," said the rector. "I don't think I can bring my tongue to do it."

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Charles Alston Collins.—The Byron Secret.—Too good an Executor.—Dickens's Creations.—An alarming "Platform."

IT is a misfortune in some respects to be connected by blood with eminent persons. If Charles Alston Collins had not been the son of a great painter and the brother of a popular novelist, his death, which happened April 9, would have been chronicled with much more of particularity than has been vouchsafed to it. He was a man of independent mark. His Cruise upon Wheels—a description of a tour in France which he made in company with his wife (a daughter of Charles Dickens) in a gig—is one of the pleasantest books of travel ever written; also, as a writer of humorous sketches he had few superiors. Moreover, he was no mean draughtsman; and having executed for his father-in-law the exterior illustrations of Edwin Drood, which are supposed to foreshadow the contents, had the credit of being the only man in England who was in possession of the key to the Mystery. If that was so, he has died and made no sign as to its nature.

The great "triliteral" benefactor to our charitable institutions—who has given no less than £10,000 during the last year to our hospitals alone—is said to have been discovered in the person of one of the nephews of the late Richard Thornton, the millionaire. This does not annoy me personally, Mr. Editor; for though I may have been credited with these gifts (through the known munificence of my general character), you will do me the justice to acknowledge that I have never laid claim to them.

Scandal has lately adapted an old story to fit a modern instance in the person of his highness the heir-apparent of the English crown. He is said to have brushed (of course by accident) with his royal palm the marble shoulder of a beautiful lady of the household. Having done so (and, I have no doubt, apologized), he murmured, with admiration, "How soft!" She took his hand, and, placing it on his own head, observed, "But that is a still softer place."

Dr. Lushington, the head of the Admiralty Court, who died some few months ago, was the sole repository of the "Byron secret." He confessed during his lifetime that his advice to Lady Byron had been to separate from her husband, "no other course," he said, "being open to her," but why that advice was given has never been revealed; and now, in spite of Mrs. Beecher Stowe's revelation, it seems that the explanation of the separation was that "Byron was married already." So runs the present tale, but it may, after all, be wide of the mark, though certainly not so wide as the obituary of Dr. Lushington himself in the Swiss Times, in which wonderful publication that most respectable and law-respecting man is said to have "suffered death in accordance with a sentence passed by the High Court of Admiralty."

Speaking of courts of law, a very curious case, involving the maladministration of a will, will probably soon be made public. A gentleman had a dear friend, whom he made his executor, and in whose custody he placed his last will and testament. He was not ill, nor had he any intention of deceasing, but did it only to ease his mind. Suddenly he found his dividends, from a large sum he had invested in consols, were not paid to him as usual. Accordingly "he went to see" about it at the Bank of England, and found to his astonishment that he was dead and buried in the eye of the law, and that his property had been "administered to." His faithless friend had "proved" the will at Doctors' Commons, performed all the legal formalities as executor, and gone off—probably to Norway, where there is no extradition treaty—with all the bequeste! Thus even Tammany has something to learn, you see, and the Old Country is not so utterly destitute of original commercial genius as some imagine. Some of our business men have humor too. I am informed that upon the London Stock Exchange the Turkish six per cents. are described as "muttons," the loan in question being secured upon the sheep-tax; that United States Five-Twenty bonds were "greens," the first issue of those bonds being of that artless color; that the Newfoundland Telegraph shares are commonly known among our brokers as "dogs;" and (though this is an individual effort) that Tennyson's well-known line, has been applied to rising gas shares.

A literary Titan of the name of Peacock has, it seems, been applying his mind to constructing a sort of concordance to Dickens's works, wherein he has discovered no less than 971 individual fictitious characters. Persons who have a perfect genius for commonplace assert that the great novelist has never "described a gentleman," in which case he has made 326 failures in attempting that delineation, for such is the number of his portraits of the Upper Ten; but his clergy are, by comparison, few—only ten (Established) among his thousand creations. He drew the same number also of lodging-house keepers and of landladies. Among his "miscellaneous" characters are forty-three babies and children, and twelve burglars. Besides these are ten dogs, three horses, and "a final personage, whose stuffed carcass fetched 120 guineas at Christie's auction mart—one raven."

In Spain the tender bud of republicanism is having, just now, a rough time of it. The Carlists, indeed, will scarcely hurt it, since, after all the tall talk of the lovers of right divine, it is found that the total amount subscribed to that "sacred cause" by "the chivalry of France and England" is in the one case £92, and in the other £110. But it has traitors in its own camp. In Los Descamisados (literally the Shirtless), a new political organ in Madrid, we find the following amazing sentiments:

"We form part of what are called 'the dregs of society.'....Ceaseless labor is our chain, infirmity our lash, misery our life, the hospital our refuge, degrading charity our alleviation, and death our only rest....We have reached the climax of suffering, but the hour of our reparation is at hand....War to the Rich, war to the Powerful, war to Society! We have said it—now you know it....We will not conceal an aspiration from you. It is absolute and complete social leveling....Anarchy is our only formula—every thing for every body, from Power even to Woman....This is our programme, but before putting it into practice it is necessary society should be purified. A blood-letting is essential—short, but grand and extraordinary.... These are our desires and aspirations, and now that you know them, tremble, ye bourgeois!....Make way for the Shirtless. Our black flag is unfurled. War to the family! War to property! War against God!"

Upon the whole, this is the most remarkable political document that I ever set eyes on. I think I may say—subject to correction, and without any intention of giving offense to persons of "advanced" opinions—that it seems coming it just a leetle too strong.

USEFUL RECIPES.

ALMOND BLANC-MANGE.—One gallon of cream. Soften in a small portion of this cream (cold) two ounces of isinglass. Have ready blanched two pounds of sweet almonds, with two dozen and a half peach kernels or bitter almonds. Beat these fine in a mortar, with a little rose-water to prevent their oiling. Put the gallon of cream with the melting isinglass into a preserving kettle over the fire, and stir until perfectly dissolved, adding meanwhile one pound and a quarter of white sugar. Let the cream come to a boil. Stir in the almonds smoothly just as you take the blanc-mange from the fire; set aside in a bowl to cool, stirring occasionally until lukewarm, when pour into moulds previously dipped in cold water.

BREAST OF VEAL.—Cover thickly with crumbs of bread, put small lumps of butter about on it, and sprinkle with pepper and salt when baked, making a gravy of butter. This is a very nice dish. Both the rack and breast, as commonly dressed, are but little esteemed, yet in this way make excellent dishes.

ALMOND CAKE, PURE.—Two pounds and a half of flour, equal weights of butter and sugar—as in pound-cake—the whites of thirty eggs, one pound and a half of sweet almonds, with two tea-spoonfuls of extract of bitter almonds, to be poured over the sweet almonds as you pound them up in a mortar.

LOUISE PUDDING.—Six eggs, six spoonfuls of flour, three-quarters of a pound of sugar, two spoonfuls of butter creamed with part of the flour, a gill of wine, half a tea-spoonful of mace ground up fine, half a pint of cream, and a pint of milk. Baked in a deep dish without lining of pastry, and eaten without sauce.

EVENING TOILETTE.

See illustration on page 328.

THIS full-dress evening toilette of serpent (yellowish-green) faille has a demi-trained skirt, trimmed with a Spanish flounce held in full pleats, and draped with a point lace flounce headed by bands of serpent-color and pervenche silk. There is no over-skirt. The back breadths have diagonal bands of pervenche silk, and two long sashes of serpent-color edged with lace and a pervenche band. Low corsage, pointed in front, with a basque back. Long garland of roses arranged in the new fashion down the back. Pearl necklace and ear-rings. High coiffure, with a rose on top.

WALKING SUIT.

See illustration on page 328.

THIS pretty walking suit has a skirt of tourterelle faille, trimmed with clusters of kilt pleats separated by an interval and crossed by two folds. Polonaise of the same material, with embroidered revers, draped in a pouf, and trimmed with kilt pleats and bows. The kilt pleating forms the drapery. Violet faille sleeveless jacket, with slashed elbow sleeves, showing the puffed sleeves of the polonaise, embroidered with violet silk of a darker shade. A Marie Antoinette fichu of white lace and tourterelle silk is worn over the jacket, and fastened in front with a velvet bow. Tourterelle silk hat, with violet revers and ribbon, a curling white feather, and a long tourterelle gauze veil. Tourterelle parasol, edged with white lace.

THE FIRST FLY OF THE SEASON.

LACE.

IF those good people who, inveighing against the extravagances of the rich, waste their anathemas on the lace that rich women wear, could see the effect of their principles carried into action, we wonder whether they would think themselves or the rich wearers of lace the best friends of the poor.

When these people see beauty floating by in her gossamers, they grudge her the satisfaction of the airy webs that wrap her loveliness—but at the same time they grudge the weaver her hodden gray, for they fail to observe that it is because the first wears these priceless robes that the last has any robes at all to wear. Certainly it is not the fault of the first that the world is so adjusted that worms must spin before butterflies may sport, but it is her virtue that, instead of hoarding her gold with miser's love, she spends it freely, and by the disbursement sends it among those households whose stay it is between them and the wolf.

There are to-day many thousand lace-makers who, if this one article of luxury were reformed out of existence, would have no refuge from starvation and sin. It is possible, of course, that better employment might be found for them; but at present there is no such thing, and, should it ever come, we may be sure that trade will equalize, itself and lace-makers forsake their bobbins for implements that are better paying, and lace will cease to exist unless it renders an equivalent for its production. In past times when, by royal or political decree, certain kinds of lace were abolished from polite usage, throngs of workers, men and women, were thrown on the mercy of the world, and died of that mercy in famine and plague. Certainly it is undesirable that any such sudden transition, even though it led in the end to a better livelihood, should occur in our own day; for gradual growth, we know, is always the best growth. For ourselves, we fail to see how the employment of lace-making under its common and favorable auspices is more stunting to spiritual growth than cotton-spinning or dress-making or any other calling of the sort, which is not, however, the subject of so much animadversion.

It is true that there are laces which, owing to requirements concerning the fineness of the thread—as we learn from a pleasant article in the Catholic World, to which we are indebted for some other interesting statements—the worker is obliged to make in damp, under-ground rooms, with a single ray of light upon the pattern. Beautiful as such lace is, we would gladly consign it to the limbo of forbidden things, even without heeding the further statement that the workers are blind at the age of thirty, and although we do not hear the philanthropic enemies of lace in general propose to abolish stone-cutting because the stone-dust causes consumption in the cutter, or friction matches because of the injuries to the bones sustained by those who meddle with phosphorus, or work in quicksilver mines because of the slow death there.

But the lace which is made under unwholesome conditions of this nature is but a little out of a vast quantity. The chief part of the lace that is produced is made at the maker's home, and much that is really valuable and perfect is wrought in the odd moments of domestic duty. The young girl in her neat cottage—it must be neat—sits and dreams over the pillow as her needle follows the parchment pattern, and her happy dreams are woven in with the thread; the mother puts aside her bobbins to catch up her baby, and the fondling and the lullaby and the mother's bliss are in the work. Healthy and pleasant things surround it thus; and though in some instances the work, of course, is underpaid, that can not be said where the worker is allowed to cover her fabric with shillings for her price.

Working in lace, indeed, can hardly be any thing but an elevating occupation when compared with the usual occupations of handicraft, for it enforces a constant familiarity with beautiful shapes, a constant observation of nature, constant interpretation of nature through art; and if the dyer's hand is subdued to what it works in, the lace-maker's soul ought to be as fine and delicate a thing as her lace is.

It has frequently been remarked that it would be interesting to observe the gradual growth of fabrics in lace—its first suggestions, perhaps, from the floating cobwebs of the autumn spider, that the peasants still call the Virgin's thread, from the sea-weed of the shore, or the frost-work on the rock. They tell, indeed, romantic stories of the origin of a special but not uncommon Venetian guipure, in which a maiden embalmed the frail figures of a fan-coral that her lover brought her from the Indian main. But there is another sort of Venetian lace which we seldom or never see in this country, the rose point, which is wrought not of thread but of the native silk in its pale and primitive tint, which is neither yellow nor white, and in whose gorgeous designs the flowers are raised to a high relief, while petal and stem are outlined by the lustre of smallest but purest pearls. The Oriental harems have a lace that almost rivals this; it is called point de Turquie, and it is also made of silk, but of all colors, the flowers and foliage represented on its web being woven in their natural tints, and black and white and green and blue and crimson entering into the composition with a truly Byzantine and fantastic barbarity. The only silk lace, however, that can claim absolute simplicity and high character, apart from its worth as merchandise, is the black Chantilly, in whose darkness no colors mix, and in whose designs nature is artfully indicated rather than slavishly imitated. This lace has also its own romantic character and history, not dependent on any one's poetical fancy, but on the simple record; for having been at one time exclusively an appanage of crowns and coronets, its makers were confounded with its wearers by the revolutionists, whose blind fury was equal to no discrimination, and the knife and the basket that did their work with the aristocrat's head did the same for the poor lace-maker who had ministered to his luxury. Hardly any Chantilly is now made at Chantilly, save the most costly, but almost all at Bayeux; nor, by-the-way, is much Valenciennes made in the city of that name, despite the fact that it was once claimed it could not be made outside the city even by the same hand that wrought it inside, but it is chiefly made at Ypres.

The true lace is, however, the linen lace, and even this is gradually being corrupted—the lace-makers finding cottons more to their purpose, and the lace thus produced being quite as handsome for some years, but eventually becoming much yellower than the old linen lace. This, though, may not diminish its value, there being still so much caprice about it, since not many hundred years ago the secret of a starch for yellowing lace was worth as much as the lace itself. But a corruption, that it seems to us must be recognized as such and dismissed, is a fashion of heightening the fantastic brilliance of the thing by the introduction of one gold thread or a single strand of colored floss in the relief of the pattern. Point d'Alençon is still made of pure linen, however, and so are the best of Brussels and Malines. Alençon is made entirely by hand, and the makers do no other work from childhood, all their delicacy of touch being reserved for this, each separate portion—the net, the flower, the filling, the footing, the joining—being done by different individuals, to the number of twelve. Alençon is the Napoleonic lace, its manufacture having been revived by the first Napoleon, and having been under the especial protection of the third Napoleon. Eugénie gave the Pope a single piece of this lace, valued at forty thousand dollars; the Empress herself had a flounce of it whose completion occupied more than thirty women nearly two years; and the christening robe of the little Prince Imperial was of this superb fabric, which was also used in the adornment of almost the whole of the layette prepared for him.

The royal family of England have in the same manner endeavored to revive the beautiful Honiton lace, the Queen and some of her daughters having had their wedding dresses of the lace. But the effort has not been so successful as that of the imperial people across the Channel, the open fabric being so easily replaced by the point duchesse and by many of the guipures, and the argument being used against it that it does not follow nature closely enough in its floral designs. But Mr. Ruskin and Sir Charles Eastlake would answer such cavilers that the design which hints at nature, rather than vainly attempts to copy her precisely, is the noblest; and nature herself says no less when she shows us the most beautiful of all her fancies on the winter's pane, where there is not one perfect flower or leaf to be found, but countless perfect hints of flower and leaf for the imagination to fill.

Lace is, indeed, a part of the belongings of thrones and empires. Popes wear it, the church hoards it, kings bestow it. To make the bridal robes of a princess a hundred women hang over its growing beauty for a year, and by-and-by the princess is laid away to moulder through her eternal rest in it. But where popes and kings have not entered, Fashion has not feared to go for it. Her critics, who have declared with such unction that she robs the potter's field of the hair that she curls and crimps and braids so bewilderingly, have a charge scarcely less grave to hurl against her here, since to feed the new passion for old lace the tombs are again rifled, and the bride who was wrapped in her veil, the princess in her shroud, the baby in his coverlet, are all made tributary to her who wears old lace which was not her grandmother's.

THE DAFFODIL.

BY MARIAN DOUGLAS.

THE cold, cold winter! Oh, it seemed
As if 'twould never go!
The frosty ferns, unmelted, gleamed
Long days upon the window-pane;
The white drifts filled the farm-house lane,
And all the roads were blocked with snow;
And through the bare elms, on the hill,
The north wind whistled loud and shrill.
But now 'tis past! 'tis May at last—
And lo! the Daffodil!

Sweet flower of promise! welcome back!
For where thy bloom I see,
Hope whispers, with her south wind's voice,
Sad heart! look forward, and rejoice
In brightness yet to be!
Life's dreary winter lingers late,
But spring will come—in patience wait!

A STEP IN THE DARK.

THEY were boarding at Mrs. Campton's for the latter half of the year, when Rossillon arrived to make his annual visit in the same homelike house. He had met Lucretia the summer before, and some symptoms of a vigorous flirtation had developed themselves at that time, which, however, had been arrested by interested parties in season to prevent serious consequences. Lucretia and Lucia were own cousins; they resembled each other in form and feature in a remarkable degree, but Lucia was a brilliant brunette, with a warm color rippling across her cheek and touching her saucy little chin, with eyes of infinite depth and duskiness, with a torrent of waving dark hair; while Lucretia was, as some of her friends remarked, a Lucia done in light colors; as some of the disaffected said, Lucia faded out. Lucretia's eyes were large and light, tender and serious, and fringed with heavy lashes; her hair was a skein of gold that seemed alive in every thread; her color was like the flame in the opal, restless and uncertain, but always beautiful. If her face was not so effective as Lucia's, it was one that would wear better. You may believe that Lucretia had not forgotten Rossillon nor the symptoms; she had never met any man who so completely fitted into the niche of her ideal as he. During the time since they had parted she had received two offers of marriage, but he had stepped between them and dimmed their glory. Very likely she might have accepted one of them if she had never known Rossillon, but Rossillon once known was not to be ignored.

"I am so glad that we meet again," he said, coming to her side after his tea. "Introduce me, pray, to this cousin of yours. She startled me half an hour ago, when I came upon her suddenly in the shrubbery, she is so like and so unlike you."

"Ah? Malicious folks call me Lucia's negative; do you think it's so bad as that?" she laughed.

"So bad? There can be nothing but good in the case."

But after the introduction she saw little more of Rossillon during the evening, or of Lucia either.

"Considering that he was so glad to meet again," she thought, "he might have staid for a word or two." She went to her room early, and waited for Lucia, who came up later, trilling an air from the Magic Flute.

"Who is he, Lucretia? Why didn't you ever speak of him?" she asked, taking the butterfly out of her hair, and regarding herself in the glass as she spoke. "Is he any body in particular? Is he a desirable parti?"

"He is a Rossillon," said her cousin, sleepily; "isn't that enough?"

"It is as if you said 'he is a Bourbon,' without mentioning if he had a throne."

"The Rossillons are made of gold, if you mean that. John Rossillon has a profession and brains; he can sing and dance and sketch."

"And flirt."

"Very well; forewarned is fore-armed. Take care of yourself, then."

"And you?"

"Good-night."

But to take care of one's self was no such easy work in Rossillon's presence, as Lucretia had found to her cost—as she was finding day by day. Though to others she had proved difficult of approach, Rossillon must have seen that the little devotions which he was in the habit of dispensing liberally and thoughtlessly to whatever pretty girl happened in his way had seemed to her to be the very words and actions for which she had listened and waited all her life; and perhaps Rossillon had not the heart to dispel the illusion for the nonce, especially as there might be no need of it, since they were certain to part before many weeks, and time would be equally sure to dissolve the enchantment with gentle touches. But how many things of which we are certain prove themselves to be the baseless fabric of a dream!

To the unwary heart Rossillon was a dangerous friend, his approaches were so like Fate's. His manners possessed a gracious familiarity which flattered without offending, in virtue of which Lucretia had seemed the favored confidante of his ambitions and creed, of such sorrows as he had tasted—a trick of nature, demanding sympathy in his pursuits and prospects, to which she responded in diapason. It had never occurred to Lucretia to observe that he had required no return of confidences on her part; that he entertained no curiosity about her modes of thought and being; that her soul, except so far as accident had revealed it to him, was a mystery which he had never cared to penetrate.

But that first evening was hardly the key-note of the rest. Being the only gentleman staying in the house at that time, they took their pleasuring together; they galloped through the twilight woods, and found out new pathways through green glooms where the partridge was at home, and great fern fronds tossed in the wind and shook out their spices; where the voices of birds, like distant cathedral bells, echoed through the solitude, as if a hundred chimes were ringing; and sometimes they lost their way, and sometimes a thunder-storm overtook them, and made the air vocal, and blasted trees before their eyes; lighting the secret avenues of the forest; for an instant revealing the flower in the calyx, the dew upon the thorn, the tangle of bough and brier and climbing vine, and hiding all as suddenly. Or they picnicked upon the Black Creek that wound in a crooked labyrinth to the sea beneath an overhanging growth; or spread their table on the sand, and gathered strange hints of romance and danger from the drift that the tide washed up. It was a season of frolic happiness, when neither seemed pre-eminent in Rossillon's regard, but each received a wholesome share of attention. Yet, in the mean time, Fate was silently settling the matter for them all.

One day Lucretia sprained her ankle in one of their excursions, and was forced to drop out of these jaunts by sea and land; one might say that it was an unlucky thing for Lucretia, because it taught Rossillon, who had not yet penetrated beneath the surface of her character, that she had added little or nothing to his pleasure, which was, as he fancied, mainly derived from Lucia's fascinations. Very likely, if the sick ankle had been Lucia's, the case might have been reversed. However, when there was nothing better to do, the two were kind enough to gather about Lucretia's sofa and recount their day's adventures, leaving how much unrecounted; they brought her bouquets of wild flowers, sprays of red berries, keepsakes from the beach. Rossillon had always a word of sympathetic sorrow for her loss of the summer weather.

"It was such a shame you could not have been with us to-day," he would say, regarding her compassionately: since he had begun to taste the sweets of love himself, he had more tenderness for her share of its bitterness All the same, Lucretia's lively imagination tortured her with the probable result of all these excursions, but she firmly refused to believe in the suggestion. Lucia had a world full of lovers, for whom she cared quite as much as for Rossillon; it were hard indeed if he should be required of her to feed Lucia's vanity. She could not believe in any thing so unfair. She was young, with infinite faith that every thing would come out right in the event; that true love could not pass unrequited; that misery and broken hearts were dreams of the novelist. Truth to tell, Lucretia was able to move about in a surprisingly brief space of time. Perhaps she understood the emergency without allowing that there was any. But the danger was at its height on the afternoon when Lucretia, for the first time since her accident, joined the party, which had been enlarged by several neighboring friends, to picnic at Echo Beach.

They had a happy afternoon of it, with croquet and flirtation on the shore, listening to the echo that with a hundred silver voices far beyond the dunes chorused to their songs and laughter—a melody, as Thoreau says, which the air had strained. They cooked their supper in gypsy style, with cross-sticks and caldron, Rossillon and Lucretia going shopping in the wherry to the old clam-digger up the creek for wherewithal to fill the caldron. Then they reclined lazily upon the sands, and counted the sails of the mackerel fleet as they came in sight, and heard the crew of a schooner intoning at the capstan, and the musical reverberations of the rifle of some sportsman lying low in his float among the marshes, and braided the hours with jest and sentiment till the twilight trembled down, and the fading sunset reflected a chromatic scale of rich hues upon the eastern sky, which in turn the sea repeated, breaking the mass into a mosaic of jewels; and Lucia and Rossillon strolled away to light a bonfire on the crest of the slope, to which the others brought contributions of drift-wood, making picturesque groups along the beach. Some of the party, tired of the romp, gathered about the blaze—for the evening was growing chilly by the sea—while others loitered still, and watched the smoke curl and the light touch up the picture: among these last was Lucretia. By-and-by the fire died away, leaving only a mass of red and blackened embers; Rossillon left Lucia's side to gather more fuel; the party dispersed by twos and threes. Lucretia drew near and took Lucia's vacant place, not dreaming that it had been hers, and held out her hands to the embers. Rossillon wandered back, and threw down his handful of drift: it was still a little damp, and did not kindle readily.

"Shivering still!" he said, resuming his seat beside the crouching figure. "'Oh, for a heart of fire to warm you through!'" he quoted. "'Come under my plaidie.' Here's an unclaimed wrap"—winding it about her. "So they have all taken themselves off, have they? I don't care—do you?"

"Not a fig," responded Lucretia.

"I've half a mind to tell you a secret," he said, with a hand on hers, "it's so dark and lonely here—a secret you haven't suspected, of course. Shall I?"

"You will please yourself."

"Ah! that sounds so like your cousin Lu—half defiance and half assent"—rising and trying to urge the embers into life; then he returned, and without another word took her in both arms. "It is too dark for the others to make out this charming tableau," he whispered; for she had started and drawn away, or rather had made an effort to draw away. "Don't be afraid, darling; the fire won't burn, and—and my flame will. I love you!"

"You love me! Impossible! You are laughing at me."

"Let those laugh who win. Come, you surely do not want me to do all the loving; say that it is measure for measure!"

"Pressed down and running over? Oh, it is too good to be true! It's like fairy gold. Are you sure? are you sure?" she whispered back. "I thought it was—" But he stopped her mouth with kisses.

"Don't say another word, or I'm afraid you'll revoke it all. If it's too good to be true, you don't hate ~~me~~. You belong to me, for ever and ever."

"If you are sure you want me so long."

"I never was surer of any thing.

"'Doubt that the sun doth move,
But never doubt—'"

The smouldering embers flared into sudden life, and lit up Lucretia's face, rosy and dimpled with happiness; glistened in the crystal eyes, and touched the ringlets dropping about her cheek with gold. Another man, perhaps, would have dropped the hand resting confidently in his, and told the whole story in a word; but not Rossillon. He sat silent a moment after the revelation, and counted the cost, as was but natural. An instant ago he had believed himself quite happy, and now—was he altogether miserable?

"Come," he said, presently, rising and treading out the tell-tale flames; "they are calling us to go aboard. Take my arm: the sand slips under one's feet, and it is dark." He still spoke as tenderly as if the illusion had not been dispelled. They slid home under the quiet stars, hardly conscious that they moved, passing a joke or singing a song, watching the moon come up to show the ragged reflections in the dark water, the tide setting about the piers with a will, the black wharves running out to meet it, as it seemed, the ghostly shapes of anchored and deserted ships rocking on the swells. Lucretia half wished that they might keep slipping on forever thus. Her happiness was so unexpected that she half feared to go home lest it should prove a myth, too sweet "for human nature's daily food." As for Rossillon, he flitted about in his usual style, now dropping a word to Lucia, engrossed in a flirtation with an elderly Crœsus—for Lucia never left any lode unworked—now lending a hand with rope or rigging, now looking into Lucretia's eyes, that mirrored the supreme joy of her soul, and wondering at the freak of fortune that should so choose and order his way for him. To Rossillon it was already a foregone conclusion that he should marry Lucretia. He would have thought as soon of selling his birthright as of explaining the situation and demanding a release, or of giving her occasion to suspect it. Quixotic, if you please; but the mistake was his—the consequences should be. Lucretia had only made the mistake of loving him. All his Christian and gentlemanly impulses rebelled against allowing her to bear the burden of his blunder. You may think, very likely, that he could not have loved Lucia to distraction. Possibly not. Many a young man has believed himself in love when misled by the gracious circumstances of youth and beauty, and has lived to find his creed worn threadbare. And how many of us to-day thank our star that interfered between us and our first love! What a delicious agony it was at the time, to be sure; but what an ecstasy of retrospect at the present!

They agreed between them—and I believe it was Lucretia's suggestion—that the engagement should not become public till her return home, which, besides giving him time to accustom himself to this change of base, also relieved him from some of the restraints of an acknowledged lover.

"I suppose you will speak of it to Lucia," he said, smiling in spite of himself at the droll side of the affair.

"Not unless you wish it. It is proverbial that Lucia can't keep a secret. With the best intentions in the world, it will slip out."

"Then she certainly doesn't deserve to have the keeping of ours," he returned.

Now Rossillon was one of those fortunate beings who attach great value to whatever belongs to them. If a possession is yours, they regard it with benign indifference; if it is theirs, its worth grows with their growth and strengthens with their strength. It is a pity that such natures are rare, rather than that class whose appreciation of an object is in exact proportion to the distance between them, whose blessings only brighten when they take their flight. Since Lucia was beyond Rossillon's reach, he began to detect in her affectations that had passed for realities; to discover the shallows of her mind, the hollowness of her heart; to perceive a thousand counter-charms. Once he had seen her only in one light, and that so dazzling that it had rather misled him than revealed her; now he was beginning to believe that he had painted her in Lucretia's colors. Gradually possession was bringing out Lucretia's strong points, as heat brings out invisible writing. Her shining qualities were becoming apparent; the intimacy of their relationship was bringing into existence, or rather into play, fascinations of which he had never dreamed, for which hitherto Lucretia had had no demand. He had always thought her a nice sort of girl, with plenty of common-sense and a pleasant manner; but when he came to study her, to interest himself in her, to make love to her, he found that he had never known her. It was like making a new acquaintance; for there are some women who never believe in themselves, in their power of pleasing, hold themselves in reserve, and never appear at their best till some responsible person has indorsed them. It requires the magnetism of love to develop their power. Like plants, they refuse to blossom, or rather are incapable of blossoming, without sunshine.

The progress of events proved that one lover was as good as another to Lucia, as her facile affections were easily transferred to the elderly Crœsus; and Rossillon having unselfishly decided to save Lucretia's feelings, was not a little surprised to find, at the end of the autumn, that he had been taking care of his own at the same time. The idea of spending a lifetime with Lucia had become a synonym for misery. Fate, in opposing him, had offered him the great opportunity of his life. Indeed, Rossillon was so sure of himself and so delighted with his experiment that he thought it no treachery to write to his own familiar friend, to whom he would have trusted his soul:

"I have taken a step in the dark—no false step, let me assure you. I fancied myself in love. Youth can not wait even for daylight. I proposed in the dark to the wrong person, and was accepted. I accepted the situation, and have been happy in discovering that she is the one woman designed for me from the foundation of the world. Few could do better in daylight."

The familiar friend read this interesting item to his sweetheart—a bit of property acquired since his last meeting with Rossillon. "Moral," said that young lady, "always propose in the dark. How do you like my hair arranged in this style? Madame Alamode says it's the very latest. I wish you would take some notice!"

The sweetheart was a friend of Lucretia's. Lucretia was to spend Christmas at the Glenhavens', and at New-Year's Rossillon was to meet her at her own hearth-stone, where the engagement was to be made public. They had arranged a programme at Mrs. Glenhaven's for Christmas-eve of pantomimes and private theatricals, to wind up with a Christmas-tree of the most fruitful kind; and Lucretia and Kate Turnan were busy one morning preparing their costumes, and talking all manner of nonsense, as happy as two larks in building-time.

"I do so hope," said Kate, "that you and Rupert will get on well together."

"I should think it much more important that you should get on well with him," laughed Lucretia.

"Yes, but it's so nice having one's choice approved by one's friends, you know. It was the strangest thing how it came about, too. I hadn't the faintest idea that he liked me. Every body said he wasn't a marrying man, and his attentions didn't signify; so when he proposed I was so astonished that I said 'No'—it's always my first impulse to refuse whatever's offered me—and then as he was going away it struck me that I wanted to say 'Yes,' and I was just wondering how I could correct my mistake, when he put down his hat, and vowed he wouldn't take 'No' for an answer. I was ever so glad, because, you see, it saved both my happiness and dignity. Dear me, what an egotist I am! Do tell me something about your love affairs. Does this gold-lace look too much tarnished to use? Hasn't somebody been saying sweet things to you this summer? Mrs. Glenhaven has an old brocaded satin, one of her very greatest grandmother's—"

"Brocaded in fig-leaves?" put in Lucretia.

"No; it's a gold ground, with pink morning-glories blooming all over it—the most heavenly thing! And you are to wear it when you play Cinderella in the pantomime. Did you know that Rupert is going to be the prince? The dear old goose won't know whether you've on a brocade or linsey-woolsey. What a pity you haven't got a real prince of your own, dear!"

"I live in hopes," said Lucretia, gayly.

"Oh, I heard of the drollest piece of love-making this summer! It's nobody you or I know, so there's no harm speaking of it. See, would you loop up this sleeve with a flower or a bow? I'm going to wear Miss Helen's emeralds. I'm afraid Rupert won't know me in such gorgeousness. Oh, I was going to tell you," continued the chatter-box. "You see, a friend of Rupert's has been staying at the sea-side near Echo Beach, where he met a beautiful nymph, and lost his heart. I guess he must have lost his wits too, for the ninny proposed in the dark—to the wrong girl! There! did you ever imagine such a dilemma! Which would you do, let this lace stand up or lie flat?"

"What did Rupert's friend do?" asked Lucretia, letting the lace gloriously alone.

"He?—oh, he accepted the situation. What else could he do? Rupert says it's Rossillon. Heavens! Lucretia, what's the matter?"

"I've run a needle into my finger clear to the bone. The sight of blood always makes me faint. See, there's a drop on Miss Glenhaven's India muslin. What shall I do?"

"Let me get you some arnica."

"No, thank you; I'll go up to my room and lie down a moment. I shall be all right presently."

"You didn't break off the point in your finger?"

"I think not; if I did it will work out: things usually do;" and so she went to her room and locked the door; but she did not lie down, neither did she remember any hurt but that which Kate's heedless tongue had wrought. All her happiness had vanished like a mirage, dissolved by a rude breath, a word; all this time she had been robbing Lucia, she had been defrauding Rossillon. She had given her heart away when nobody wanted it, and Rossillon had accepted the gift from pure compassion. But how admirably he had played the part of lover! Well, there should be no more play; it should be downright earnest hereafter. But how could she live without him? what should she do with her thoughts, that had learned the trick of following him, and would not be easily coerced? Above all, what should she do with the love that she was about to take back? It seemed for a while as if there was no corner in the wide world big enough to hide and hold it all. After she had in a manner composed herself, she wrote Rossillon a few words, telling him a little of that which he already knew, adding her regrets at having been the cause of so much unhappiness to him, and releasing him from the engagement. The next night but one was Christmas-eve, when she was to take the part of Cinderella in the pantomime; and as there was no ghost of an excuse for her to offer if she withdrew, it behooved her to dry her eyes and dissemble her sorrow. And Christmas-eve drew down cold and crisp, the ideal Christmas weather, when good cheer and comfort seem so comfortable. The northern lights coruscated across the sky, which already resembled some mighty arras embroidered with medieval designs; the gaunt trees were tasseled with icicles, the hedge-rows seemed set with jewels; great flashes of light splintered from the ragged edges of snow-drifts where the star-beams touched them; the frozen ponds reflected the glory a thousandfold, when up came the moon and made a torch-light procession of the weird old elms, in their armor of ice, guarding the approach to the Glenhaven mansion. Inside the curtain is up, disclosing the stage, where the step-sisters are dressing for the ball. Cinderella is plaiting Kate's long hair, while Olive Glenhaven trails a white silk, embossed with forget-me-nots, and looks over her white shoulder at the effect in the mirror. Presently they are ready for conquest; they lock the door on Cinderella, who disconsolately takes to the chimney-corner, and hides her face in her two hands. Lucretia feels every inch a Cinderella. Haven't they all gone to the carnival of youth and happiness, and left her locked up in solitude and poverty of heart? Isn't Rupert this moment kissing blushing Kate in the passageway?—she can see them through a chink in the scenery—and aren't Olive and young Earle flirting together behind the scenes?

As she broods there, a soft light irradiates the dull hearth-stone, and godmother, with her peaked hat, spangles, and sandals, appears, and touches Cinderella with her wand. Presto! the rags drop away from her like witchcraft, and the beautiful gold-colored satin, with its opening morning-glories, lights up the sad face, lends a glow to the pale cheek, and a lustre to the wan eyes; and so Cinderella goes to the ball, just as she did in the old fairy story, and dances with the prince. Kate dances too, with a partner whose mustache is blonde, and whose hair is yellow, curling gold; Lucretia wonders vaguely who he may be, without caring enough to ask or to give him more than a passing glance: blonde men were never after Lucretia's model. Rossillon's hair was brown as the bursting chestnut, and a mustache would have interrupted the classic and expressive outlines of his face. While she is wondering where she has seen this blonde stranger before, the clock chimes midnight, and Cinderella vanishes from the revel. The prince, nothing daunted, dispatches one of his followers to seek her; it is the blonde young man, who meets only a wretched little servant-maid, hurrying home, in the next scene. Behind the curtain, Lucretia lingers a moment in the great bay-window, to look out on the still Christmas weather, wishing that the evening was ended and oblivion begun. The moonlight lends a fairy glamour to the distant hills and snow-crested fields; the frost glitters on the pane in fantastic imagery of summer-time—that summer so far away, and yet so precious, whose mere remembrance can warm her still. While she regrets it, some one pauses uncertainly there, in the half twilight, and approaches her.

"Cinderella, are you looking for your slipper?" asks a familiar voice. She starts, and turns to meet the blonde youth again, curling his mustache and regarding her.

"So you don't know me, Lucretia? A wig and mustache make quite a success of me, don't they?"

"Rossillon! Oh, what made you come!"

"So you are not glad to see me? Shall I go away?"

"Yes—no—how could you—"

"How could you?"

"Oh, I never thought of it's being a mistake. I ought to have known better—I—"

"I meant to ask how you could write me that saucy letter of dismissal."

"What else could I do? I hope you will take care not to propose a second time in the dark, Mr. Rossillon."

"It is not very dark here; I can see your face; and I'm going to propose that you give me a Christmas present of—yourself!"

"And Lucia?" falters Lucretia.

"Lucia, thank Heaven, is a by-gone folly. I never loved her as I love you; it was a short-lived fancy at best; and I have you and the twilight at Echo Beach to thank for my escape. Will you give me my Christmas gift, or shall I take it?"

"Hark! they are calling me: the curtain is about to rise. You may take it," she answers, "or I shall be late at the ball!"

"Take care; there's a step here. Give me your hand, darling!"

"A step in the dark?"

"I wouldn't care if life were made up of steps in the dark, if by their means you were induced to give me your hand."

And so the play ended in downright earnest.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE Vienna Exposition is attracting crowds to Europe who, without some such special impulse, would never have summoned courage to cross the uncertain ocean. Disasters on the sea alarm the public for a brief time, but the effect soon passes away from the mind. It is probable that travel to Europe will be more universal during the present season than it has ever been before. It is even doubtful whether there will be sufficient steam-ship accommodation to meet the demand. Yet there is a goodly number of vessels engaged in ocean service between New York and Europe, and the list is constantly swelling. Last year it was not uncommon for six or seven steamers to leave this port on a Saturday. Next summer very likely double that number may leave in one day. The exact number of steamers running between the port of New York and Europe is somewhat variously stated, a little confusion probably arising from the large number of steam-ships now being built, many of which are nearly completed. But it is safe to say that about one hundred and twenty steamers are now regularly sailing from our harbor. The prominent lines of steamers are well known, and new lines have been recently established, and will soon be in operation. The ocean fleet swells with the rapid growth of our country, indicating increased commerce, wealth, and enterprise.

In many sections of the Eastern States May-day came with curious mingling of snow-banks and springing vegetation. Digging down beneath the reluctant snow, and pushing aside last autumn's dead but protecting leaves, bright and fresh and green there peeped out lilies, daffodils, crocuses, daisies, and violets—some even in bud and bloom. The contrast was curious between these bursting plants and the snow, deep and heavy in some places, close beside them. But the great quantity of snow which has covered the earth in some sections during the past winter and spring had kept it warm and rich. When once the spring sun began to melt it the snow vanished as by a miracle. Then there was no waiting for frozen ground to thaw—the winter covering had done its work—the grass was springing up, the eager plants unfolding.

One of the most severe storms ever known in Nebraska occurred about the middle of April. It was accompanied by violent winds and severely cold weather. Men were frozen to death within a few rods of their own houses while trying to reach their cattle to give them food; travelers perished while attempting to find shelter; houses were blown down and filled with snow; and the destruction of cattle was very great.

Independence Hall, Philadelphia, is being restored as nearly as possible to the appearance it presented in 1776. An adjoining room is to be prepared for the reception of such pictures and objects of historic interest belonging to the city as will be out of place in the hall as restored to its original condition.

About eighteen miles north of the Yosemite Valley lies the cañon of the Tuolumne River, which has recently been explored for the first time. The falls of the Tuolumne surpass those of the Yosemite in endless variety of cascades and water-shoots, though not in volume of water. Nevertheless, the Tuolumne Cañon bids fair to be quite a rival to the Yosemite Valley.

A conscientious pickpocket writes to one of the New York journals, requesting the public always to keep their names and addresses in their porte-monnaies, as he and his associates sometimes come into possession of papers and photographs they would be glad to return. He goes on to say:

"I remember an instance where I met with serious trouble because I could not make up my mind to destroy a picture of a baby which I had found in the pocket-book of a gentleman which came into my hands in the way of business on the Third Avenue road. I had lost a baby myself the year before of the same age as this one, and I would have given all I had for such a picture. There was no name in the porte-monnaie, and no way of finding out who was the owner; so, like a fool, I advertised it, and got shadowed for it by the police."

Since the use of stoves and kerosene oil in railroad cars is universally known to be an unnecessarily added danger to railroad traveling, why are they not prohibited by law? Safer methods of warming and lighting cars should be insisted on. A consuming fire raging in the midst of the wreck caused by a collision or other accident is a horror which has occurred far too often. Can not law interfere to protect life?

Curiosity and relic hunters have demanded pieces of the rock at Mars Head as a memento of the terrible fate of the unfortunate Atlantic. Chicago papers reckon that something like half a ton of this rock has arrived in that city, and it is peddled by those who declare that it was taken from the rock on the day of the wreck. It is further stated that it is probable that the sale will reach a few hundred tons, and the stone-quarries in that vicinity are being drawn upon to keep up the supply.

San Salvador has been destroyed eight times within one hundred and fifty years, and partially ruined many more times. Yet the authorities of the city are resolved to rebuild it on the same site. As an inducement, a permit has been given to allow "squatting" in any part of the city. The ground is said to be a mere shell; by placing the ear to the earth, running water is distinctly heard; and if the earth is struck by any heavy weight, a hollow sound is produced. The opposition to the projects of the government is very strong on the part of the people, though they are quiet in it all. Most of them have moved, with such property as has been saved, to Santa Tecla, three leagues distant. There are now at least fifteen thousand people in Santa Tecla, though formerly it was a small, insignificant town.

Dirty and dismal at first, then dusty and damp, are many dwelling-houses during the week or two succeeding May moving-day in New York. The golden rule is not yet so universally observed that the majority of people leave a house on moving out of it in the condition they would wish to find it were they moving into it. Hence results a season of discomfort, and often of misery, unless materfamilias is a wise and skillful woman. Men naturally and proverbially think that a house never needs cleaning; women know that it does. Men would know it also if their wives did not periodically attend to that much-abused business—house-cleaning. However, there is not the least occasion to upset the entire household in the process—to have scrubbing-women and brooms and mops, soap and sand, in every room in the house on the same day. Good sense and tact will enable the housewife so to plan that there is always one comfortable room in order, to which the family may resort at any time.

The Italie gives a curious detail of the habits of the imperial court of Russia. The Empress does not correspond with the Emperor by the post-office. A service of couriers has been established between Sorrento and St. Petersburg, composed of eighteen persons, who are continually en route between the two places. The immediate friends of her Majesty write to Russia like other people—that is to say, through the obliging and economic medium of the Commander Barbavara. But no letter of the Czarina is ever thrown into the box or sent to the Russian legation; every time the Empress writes—as she does nearly every day—a courier starts with the packet, which he is instructed to deliver into the hands of the Czar himself.

"Captain Jack," the chief of the Modoc Indians, is reported to be about thirty years old. He was chosen chief of the tribe two or three years ago, and though firm, determined, and haughty, he was not supposed to be base or cruel previous to the recent acts of treachery. He has always exacted the greatest marks of respect from all who came in contact with him, and is said never to smile.

The little hippopotamus, now about six months old, whose native place is the Zoological Gardens, London, continues greatly to interest not only the public generally, but naturalists in particular. "Guy Fawkes" is his name, and he is playful as a kitten and tame as a calf. He seems to play some tricks, and once terribly alarmed his keeper by diving to the bottom of the tank and not making his appearance for about twenty minutes. As the mother of this frisky little beast has never trusted herself under water more than three minutes without blowing or taking breath, great alarm was felt lest he had been seized with cramp or something of the kind. But just as they were thinking what must be done to save him, he suddenly reappeared, shaking his ears, and as brisk as ever.

A party of live fish are to take a railroad trip across the continent some time during the charming month of May. They will each and all have a free ticket given them by the California Fish Commissioners, who have planned this nice little excursion, no doubt, solely with reference to the pleasure of the fishes. At any rate, they intend to make up an agreeable party of eight or ten different varieties, and provide for their comfort by supplying two thousand gallons of water, in which they can make themselves quite at home. The fishes are to be all "first class," comprising the best varieties not found in California.

Value of a period in telegrams: An English gentleman recently found it necessary to ask a head railway official, by telegraph, that a train might take him up at a small station. The abrupt answer came back, "No one will stop for you." But the courteous official had really done all in his power by promising that train No. 1 would comply with the request made.

One of the worst Indians in the whole Modoc tribe is "Hooka Jim." He is young, but large and powerful. He is not a Modoc proper, but belongs to a band of Indians known in Siskiyou as the "Como-Twashes." They are composed of remnants of several tribes, and have long been regarded as thieves and murderers.

It does not speak well for the good sense or good taste of American girls or their mothers that a lady visiting abroad—Dr. Mary Safford—makes such a report as the following:

"While visiting a school at Frankfort-on-the-Main I asked if there were American pupils, and the preceptor replied: 'No; we do not take them. They dress so extravagantly, they think and talk so much of their clothes, that they disturb the quiet, simple ways of our German girls, and we find that their influence does us more hurt than their money does us good.' In Dresden I knew an American lady who could not find a private school where they would take her daughter, for similar reasons."

It would hardly seem worth while in these days of many physicians for one to attempt to vaccinate himself. Certainly some slight knowledge of surgical science should precede the operation. It should at least be understood that newspaper is not a proper bandage on a fresh wound. Naturally we should suppose that every one would instinctively know this. But a young man near Hamburg, Iowa, recently attempted to vaccinate himself, using virus from his sister's arm, she having been previously vaccinated by a regular physician. He covered the wound with a piece of damp newspaper. Result: a painful arm, mortification of the sore, amputation, and finally death.

VIEWS AT ST. HELENA.

ONE of our sketches represents a view of James Town and harbor as seen from the road leading from Napoleon's tomb. It is the chief town of the island. The celebrated ladder to the signal station, having 365 steps, is situated on the right of the church. The valley between the two hills is the most verdant spot in the island. At the extreme end of the valley a very beautiful appearance is created by some fine banana-trees.

Along the road to the left of the town is the way to Longwood, distance about six miles. About half-way there is a weeping-willow wood, in which an immense quantity of turtle-doves abide. Four miles from the town, a little distance from the main road, in a neat little valley, is the tomb of Napoleon I., which is protected by a French soldier. On one side of the tomb is a well of beautiful clear water. After regaining the main road you pass by a small church and village, of about fifty inhabitants, on a very rugged road, to within half a mile of Longwood, when you pass through a narrow archway, and find yourself on a grassy plain (the only flat place on the island), on which Longwood House is built. The house is only one story, surrounded by a small garden. The window at the extreme left is that of the room in which Napoleon died.

ON GETTING UP.

AMONG the many and varied complaints to which mankind is subject, and which contribute to sustain and provide for a large number of doctors' wives and children, there is not one, perhaps, which is treated so lightly and noticed so jocularly as sluggishness. If some persevering and talented person would compile statistics showing to what extent there exists among us the class who are deeply impressed with the necessity of early rising, but who lie in bed—who know the benefits of being awake and about at six in the morning, but who are habitually asleep at that hour—it would indeed be a matter, we think, for the astonishment of the community at large to see what a power this inability to rise exercises over the minds of their reasoning fellow-creatures. And the individual undertaking such a task would have to find his way into all classes of society, for the errand-boy "who is a lazy rascal," and the son and heir who is "naturally inert," suffer from one and the same complaint, the chief symptom of which is that they "can't get up."

There are, of course, people (to whom we shall afterward allude) who are thoughtlessly lazy; who do not particularly see, and who certainly do not try to find out, any reason why they should rise by preference at six instead of ten, and who, even if called at the latter hour, would probably consider the service premature; but, on the other hand, there are those who know of better things, and who pass their lazy days in rigid resolutions "to get up early to-morrow morning." And there can be no doubt in the mind of any one who has given attention to this matter that the mortification and annoyance endured by this class of sluggards must be extreme. Listen to this piteous account of himself by a sufferer:

"I put my watch upon a little nail at my bedside. My time of business is half past nine, and I believe that if I rose at eight I should have just nice time to get there. I say 'I believe if I rose at eight,' for I have not yet done so. I generally awake about half past seven. Delighted to find I have yet another half hour, I turn on my side, and invariably fall asleep again immediately. I wake again at eight. Then I say to myself, 'It is time to get up.' I have scarcely made this observation when I perceive that it is five minutes past eight. While remarking how quickly the five minutes passed, it becomes ten minutes past, and I yawn finally and rub my eyes, as people do just before they spring out of bed.

"When I take my hands away from my eyes I keep the latter shut for a moment, while I take, as it were, a farewell of my bed for the day.

"Twenty-five minutes past eight! I feel with a horrid sense of guilt that I have been to sleep again.

"Knowing now I must get up, I assume a sitting posture, and think for a moment over the miseries of my position. The last twenty-five minutes have been exceedingly uncomfortable, and I have been frightfully tormented by my sense of what is right. And then comes the bitterest part of my reflections. The act of rising is not one whit more pleasant or less discomforting than it was half an hour ago. Deeply impressed with the significance of this fact, I crawl slowly out of bed, and for the next two hours the hurry and fluster I am in remind me painfully of the time I have wasted."

Is not this a case for pity?

Not the least interesting feature of the disease which such unhappy people suffer from is their steady demand for alarums and other mechanical contrivances to perform the work of Nature, when she has fairly given up in disgust. And we must do them the justice to say that many sluggards have, in their praiseworthy and conscientious endeavors to conquer their failing, inflicted upon themselves considerable annoyance, and occasionally that of a very painful nature. The writer was acquainted with a college student whose punctuality in being exactly fourteen minutes late for chapel every morning was a marvel to his friends, and who therefore determined to rouse himself fully half an hour earlier every morning by means of an alarum.

This he accordingly bought, and having duly wound and set it, placed it upon the corner of his dressing-table, styling it his "friend," who was going to cure him of his weakness. But what a change of opinion the morning brought about! At the appointed hour the machine duly went off with a bang, "whir-r-r," after the manner of such instruments. Alas for its too prompt and zealous friendship! With a cry of indignant remonstrance a heavy boot was hurled at it, and cut short in its appeal, it fell to the ground in a state of complete silence and annihilation—while its owner turned on his side and "slumbered again."

We have mentioned these last cases as appertaining to a class struggling against its failings. But, as we remarked before, there are persons, equally slaves to this vice, who are confessedly and hopelessly given over to its influence, and these endeavor to work the mine of its delights to the utmost. It must not be imagined that simply to lie in bed all day would be a supreme happiness for these individuals, for their tastes are more refined, and wishes and ideas more epicurean. Their highest object is generally the realization of pleasures which exist only in anticipation.

A person of this class, called on Saturday at nine and due at business at ten, knows he must get up. But give him a Sunday morning, and he is so persuaded of the comfort an extra hour would have been the day before, that he tries to keep up an idea that Sunday is Saturday. But in vain. He endeavors to make himself believe that he is due at ten, in order that he may experience the pleasure of being in bed at that hour under such circumstances. But he knows that he is not due, he knows that he may lie in bed for the next twenty-four hours if he will; and the salt having lost its savor, he laments the impossibility of feeling as he did the day before. The writer's grandfather was an amusing instance of this class. For the greater period of his life he was a lieutenant in the army, and a great slave to lying in bed of a morning.

His servant called him regularly with the words, "Time for parade, Sir!" and with an exclamation, and after grumbling and moaning, the officer was obliged to turn out and attend parade. After he had retired, and the parade no more demanded his presence, he gave instructions to his servant to call him still at the same time, and with the same words, in order that he might have the satisfaction of blessing the parade, and going to sleep afterward!

CENTRAL ASIAN POLITICIANS.

CENTRAL ASIAN POLITICIANS.

THE accompanying illustration represents a group of ragged Tashkend politicians, discussing Khivan affairs with as much Oriental gravity as if their tatters were robes of state, and they themselves veritable emirs charged with regulating the affairs of the nation. This interesting sketch forms one of a remarkable series of pictures of life in Central Asia, by a Russian artist, Mr. Basil Wereschagin, which are exhibited in the Crystal Palace at London. Mr. Wereschagin accompanied the Russian expedition under General Kauffman, in 1868–70, through the campaign which ended in the taking of Samarcand and the establishment of Russian power in the heart of Bokhara, and his pictures, which were painted on the spot, are a faithful revelation of the manners and customs of a singular people of whom we have known but little.

The khanate of Khiva, to which the course of the Russian expedition is now directed, lies to the south of the Sea of Aral. It is noted for its fecundity and wealth, being placed in the delta of a great river, the Oxus. The total population of the khanate is about 500,000, but the military force is contemptible; and if a Russian army of 5000 men, with artillery, were ever encamped before the capital, there would probably be little serious opposition. The real strength of Khiva lies in its inaccessibility, as it is completely surrounded with deserts, the tracks through which are very scantily provided with water and provisions. The Khivans are a very barbarous people; great cruelties have been inflicted on Russian prisoners; and M. Vámbéry gives in his travels, undertaken in the disguise of a dervish, a horrifying account of the gouging out of the eyes of prisoners, and of sackfuls of decapitated heads, emptied out as coolly as if they had been potatoes.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MRS. S. L.—For information about making the various suits you mention we refer you to the New York Fashions of Bazar Nos. 17 and 18, Vol. VI.

FANNY.—Deep brown or else plum-color would look well with your striped silk. You can, however, get a basque, apron over-skirt, and lower skirt, with four flounces behind and bias puffs down the three front breadths, out of your twenty-six yards.

E. H.—Make your black Hernani by description of black grenadines in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 18, Vol. VI.; make the cashmere with a châtelaine redingote by pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. VI. Yak lace looks very heavy on thin Hernani. We can send cut paper pattern of Dolman sacque.

COUNTRY.—For black alpaca use large button-moulds covered with alpaca; linen and chintz covers are also on moulds, but large pearl and imitation ivory buttons are more fashionable for wash goods.

ZILLAH.—Red-in-gote is accented on the first and last syllables; Ren-ais-sance on the last syllable; and vigogne is pronounced as if spelled ve-goan, with the accent on the last syllable.

MRS. H. N. P.—Read about black grenadines in Bazar No. 18, Vol. VI.

CORA.—Your sample is Irish poplin, such as is sold for about $2 a yard. It is leaf brown.

MISS H. G.—Black cashmere mantles are always lined throughout with farmer's satin, or else thin silk. Yak lace will cost from 75 cents to $1 50 a yard for narrow widths.

MRS. R. B.—Your daughter's letter failed to reach us.

AGNES.—For the voyage to Europe get a water-proof suit for yourself and a pressed flannel wrapper with hood, also a black silk suit for traveling on the Continent. For your little daughter get a sailor suit of navy blue flannel, or else of blue English water-proof. Make few purchases of clothing before you leave, as you can buy much cheaper abroad.

MRS. T. A. R.—We can not give you the desired information.

DRESS-MAKER.—Print dresses are made in gored wrappers, or else with a plain Spanish flounce skirt and loose belted polonaise. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 19, Vol. VI., for directions about sewing skirts on belts. We sell the cut paper pattern of boy's sailor suit for 25 cents. Your sample failed to reach us. The trowsers of sailor suits are buttoned to an under-body.

ALBERTA C.—See our advertising columns for the addresses you want.

LUCILLE.—Make your blue check silk with a solid blue sleeveless basque, blue bands down the front breadths, and bind the flounces that are on the back with blue.

MRS. B.—For your boy of three make kilt skirts and jackets (by our Highland suit pattern) of white piqué and gray linens. For the younger boy make white Gabrielles and walking coats.

AN INQUIRER.—After being pleated the skirts are slightly gathered in at top, but this is a heavy fashion that will not be used for summer.

M. F. L. B.—Over-skirts will be worn again. A black grenadine for mourning should have a silk under-skirt covered to the knee with bias folds of grenadine; then an over-skirt and a basque with silk lining, also trimmed with folds.

SUBSCRIBER.—A tight basque is the best dress waist for stout figures. A black Irish poplin will look well made by pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 11, Vol. VI.

MRS. L. S.—We can safely recommend to you the Mechanical Oarsman, advertised on this page, as being the most attractive new toy for your children.—[Com.]

ANOTHER TRIUMPH FOR THE WILSON SEWING-MACHINE CO.—At the Seventh Grand State Fair of the Mechanics' and Agricultural Fair Association of Louisiana, held April 23, 1873, at New Orleans, the world-renowned celebrated Wilson Shuttle Sewing-Machines were awarded a GOLD MEDAL for the best sewing-machines, and five separate premiums for the best work done on sewing-machines, thus making Forty-one Premiums, Nine Medals, and Three Diplomas that have been awarded to the Wilson Machines within a year. It is a notorious fact that, without a single exception, the Wilson Sewing-Machine Co. has sent its machines to every State Fair and Exposition in this country and Europe, where awards were offered to the best sewing-machines, in order to show the great people of the world that the "Wilson" is not only better than all others, but that it has the ability, capital, and pluck to defeat and humiliate the combined force of nineteen competitors, all of whom have fought the Wilson Machine, inch by inch, to prevent it from getting a foothold in the American market, and to compel the Wilson Sewing-Machine Co., by their formidable competition, to raise the price of the Wilson Machines to that at which theirs are sold for, or else go out of the market entirely. But the people of America are with the Wilson Machine, and are too intelligent to be imposed upon by misrepresentation regarding the merits of a machine which, without exception, has excelled all competitors in every contest, and been so decided by an intelligent board of arbitrators. There are, we hope, but very few people so ignorant as to be imposed upon by misrepresentation, and then pay the imposter at least fifteen dollars for his success. The Wilson Sewing-Machine Co. have warehouses in every city in the civilized globe. Go and see their wonderful machines. Salesroom in New York at 707 Broadway.—[Com.]

WEBSTER'S PATENT

Button-hole Worker.

Pat. June 27, 1871. Awarded first premium at the Am. Institute and Md. Institute Fairs, 1871.

It is one of the most important inventions of the age. The most perfect Button-hole Worker ever invented! So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Every stitch is taken with the most perfect mechanical accuracy. Is used entirely independent of the sewing machine, and will last a lifetime. Does away with pricking the fingers, straining the eyes and with imperfect and irregular worked button-holes. They give universal satisfaction. Ladies who use them say that they are worth their weight in gold. Over eleven thousand sold during the first week of their introduction. Local and traveling agents wanted everywhere. They sell at sight, and give over 100 per cent. profit. Sample Button-hole Worker and sample Button-hole Cutter packed in a neat case, with full directions for use, together with sample of our new and novel way of canvassing, sent to any address on receipt of 65 cents. Orders by mail receive prompt attention. Address WEBSTER M'F'G CO., Manufacturers, Ansonia, Ct. Please state in what paper you saw this.

PARALLEL CORSET-SPRINGS.

Ten Reasons why they are the Very Best:

I. They are made of English Clock-spring Steel.
II. They can be attached to any corset, new or old.
III. The hooks are so constructed they can not unfasten during wear.
IV. There is no disagreeable space between the steels.
V. They never turn edgwise; one turning in and the other out is impossible.
VI. The greater the strain the closer they fit.
VII. They are wider in steel and narrower in wear than any other.
VIII. They can be washed without rusting.
IX. When fastened they make a perfect corset-board.
X. Though more elastic, they are stronger and outlast all others.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

BAZAR Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

CAPTAIN JACK'S MOTHER-IN-LAW.

Our brave Boys having captured Captain Jack's Mother-in-law, threaten to send her back unless he comes to Terms at once. Captain Jack surrenders immediately. This extreme Measure is justified by the fiendish Acts of Atrocity committed by the Modoc Chief.

FACETIÆ.

THE latest feminine fashion of wearing the front hair is known as the Skye terrier style. Probably it is only a natural consequence of the prevalence of this fashion that the puppies are attracted.

IMPROVING ONE'S TIME—Mending the clock.

"An experienced surgeon will accompany every train," very properly composes a part of a railway advertisement.

"Love laughs at locksmiths!" Yes: not at wedlock, though.

CHANGE OF RESIDENCE.—The gentleman who resided over a week in Bond Street is now lodging over a confectioner's in the same quarter.

FIZZICAL WEAKNESS—Love of Champagne.

"You have lost a friend, I see," said a traveler to a negro whom he met on the road.
"Yes, massa."
"Was it a near or distant relative?"
"Well, purty distant—'bout twenty-four miles," was the reply.

The times are affecting the poor Indian. He complains that none but bald-headed emigrants go West.

PERILOUS SITUATION.—Last Sunday morning a clergyman in one of the churches during the services was quite at sea, and the congregation was overbored.

A young man seeks advice. He meditates joining a friend in buying a theatre for the purpose of reletting it. That young man had better let it alone.

SHROUDS AND SPECTRES.—Among the spring fashions are announced, "medium textures." Are these to be worn at séances for "spirit photographs?"

A little girl was one day reading the History of England with her governess, and coming to the statement that Henry I. never laughed after the death of his son, she looked up and said, "What did he do when he was tickled?"

An amateur snake-fancier, whose neighbors complain of him for keeping boa-constrictors on the roof of his house, defends himself by saying that he supposes he can put any sort of tiles he pleases on his roof, and that he prefers reptiles.

A SAFETY SEA-GOING APPARATUS.

"O joy,
To be a floating human buoy!"—Chadband, altered.

Perfectly secure, Brown starts on his European Tour.

He clings to the Side of the Ship despite the Remonstrances of the Captain.

VOL. VI.—No. 22.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 31, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Knitted and Crochet Shawl-Strap, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS shawl-strap is worked with light brown zephyr worsted, crosswise, in elastic knitting, not too loose, however, in rounds going back and forth, and is edged with crochet points of dark brown worsted. Begin the knitting with a foundation of 14 st. (stitch). On these work the 1st round.—All knit plain. 2d round.—All purled. Sl. (slip) the first st. of each round, and knit off the last st.; as these two st. do not belong to the design, they are not referred to again in the following pattern rounds. 4th round.—2 sl. (always slip these 2 st. off together, as if going to purl them), lay the thread back of the st., 3 k. (knit plain), 2 sl., 3 k., 2 sl. 5th round.—2 sl., lay the thread before the st., 3 p. (purled), 2 sl., 3 p., 2 sl. 6th and 7th rounds.—Like the 4th and 5th rounds. 8th round.—Like the 4th round. These eight rounds are repeated constantly. Care should be taken that the thread which lies back of or before the sl. in the 4th–8th rounds is neither left too loose nor drawn too tight; the length of this thread should exactly correspond to the space taken up by the corresponding 2 st. Having finished the knitting, border the shawl-strap all around with 1 picot round, working with dark brown worsted, always alternately, 1 single crochet on the outer edge, 1 picot (5 chain stitches and 1 single crochet on the first chain stitch); pass over a corresponding interval of the outer edge with the picot. Finally, fasten tabs of brown carriage leather furnished with a button-hole each on the ends, and set several buttons on the opposite ends, as shown by Fig. 1, which shows the strap inclosing a shawl. Fig. 2, page 340, shows a full-sized section of the strap.

IMITATION OF MARBLE.

A PLAN by which real white marble may be made to imitate different varieties of marble, with rich colored veins and clouds, will certainly interest the reader who delights in novelties of this kind. Take a slab of marble, no matter if not entirely white, smoothly finished but not polished, and warm it in an oven to open the pores before applying the colors. These colors consist of alcoholic solutions of various coloring substances: for a beautiful lavender tint a solution of alkanet root, madder lake for crimson, indigo for blue, verdigris for green, and gamboge for yellow. Out of combinations of these any desired colors or tints may be obtained. The veining and clouding is easily done upon the surface of the stone according to the taste of the artist, copying, if possible, some natural specimen. After the coloring is done let the slab be again heated, to favor the absorption of the same, then cooled gradually, and polished with pumice-stone and water.

A LOVE SONG.

If it were not for one thing, this perfect day,
I'd feel as light as a child at play;
My heart, all careless and blithe, would bound
With joy that the world spun round and round;
I would revel in sunshine, and be content,
With never a thought of what it all meant.

Yet but for this one thing, when troubles came,
How could I bear them and be the same?
How should I fear not each shadow's increase,
Or carry my soul in patience and peace?
Ah, many a time would courage give way
But for the one thing that holds me to-day!

Thank God for the joy that deepens and thrills;
Thank God for the fear that startles and chills;
Thank God for the wonder that brings me control,
For the beautiful trouble that vexes my soul:
For the one nameless blessing that dims all the rest
Let us serve Him, dear heart, as it suiteth Him best.

THE LAW OF A WIFE'S PROPERTY.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

IN every case of suffering we instinctively seek the cause, and if we can fasten the blame on some one, there is an immediate sense of relief. If hardship can be traced to an unjust law, it is no small satisfaction to pound away upon the enormity of the existing law, and to work for its repeal. Yet it is forever and forever true that individual suffering can never be prevented by general laws. We may frame them into a code as just and wise as the human mind can compass, and still men and women will be happy and miserable according to their own private temperament, sagacity, character. This should not prevent us from improving laws wherever improvement is needed, but it should prevent us from expecting too great results from the improvement; and we should also remember that, though one person suffers under the law, and because of the law, its repeal or modification may work equal suffering on another person. Remembering all this, let us glance at the laws of property as they relate to domestic relations.

Statute law, in some of the States at least, gives to the husband a right of dower in his wife's estate. She dies, leaving a large property in real estate inherited from her father, and in no manner acquired from her husband. But he, though he can not sell this property, controls its entire income as long as he lives. The children have no claim on it whatever during their father's life, and no benefit from it except through his will and pleasure. He may be an affectionate father but an inefficient man, and may let their wealth dwindle into insignificance through sheer incapacity or indolence; and though his daughter grow up and marry an energetic business man, who could rehabilitate her possessions and establish a fortune, he can not touch them unless the father gives consent. The father may marry again a domineering, niggardly, and narrow-minded woman, who hoards in her own name the income of the property of her step-children, who has not foresight enough to see that a certain expenditure on that property is necessary to keep it from deterioration. By this law, therefore, the children are absolutely deprived of any right in or control over their own inheritance during their father's life. They are no better off than if nothing had been left them.

Of joint property the laws are different in different States. In some, men are favored; in one or two, perhaps, women. I think the more common custom is for the man to inherit the whole income of his wife's estate during life, and to be under obligation to support the children. The wife inherits by law one-half, or less, of the personal property, and the income of one-third of the real estate during life. The personal property she may dispose of, but the real estate is inalienable, and reverts to the children after her death. The man may make a will, but if he does not leave his wife her "thirds," she can break the will. The wife's will is not valid without the consent of her husband. No act of hers can deprive him of his right of dower in her real estate, his life income from her property. He is inalienably "tenant by courtesy," as the law gingerly puts it. One corrective the law supplies—that a certain degree of incapacity or neglect in the father makes it possible for both himself and his children to be placed under guardianship. The inequality of footing on which men and women are placed by the action of these laws is not so great as is often supposed. He is required to support her children, while his children are not legally thrown upon her, but have separate provision made for them. Nor is this, as it might at first seem, because a father's love is assumed to be stronger than a mother's. It is—at least, out of respect to the heads of law-makers, let us assume that it is—because the father is supposed to have a better business capacity, a better understanding of the investment of money, than has the mother. The children can be just as safely trusted to her love; but as she is not generally the business manager during her husband's life, it is supposed that she is relieved by having the children's property relegated to another guardian than herself.

The evil of this is that the family bond is weakened, the dependence of children upon their mother lessened, and, in some cases, her life narrowed. When there are minor children it is far better that the family should be kept together, and that the mother's influence should be strengthened by her being really as well as nominally the head of the family. She should have not only moral but real power. The authority that formerly rested in father and mother should now be centred in her. The appropriating power of parliaments is a great check on sovereigns. It is good for boys to know that their mother holds the purse.

If the children are grown men and women at their father's death, it is a cruel thing for them to take the property away from their mother. It is by moral right hers as much as her husband's. She has worked as hard as he. Her prudence, patience, industry, sagacity, have contributed as much as his to the family fortunes. Her sufferings, privations, self-sacrifice, have been immeasurably greater than his. It is often true that the combined labor of both has gathered a sum whose income of itself is only enough to furnish a comfortable living. If the widow could have it just as it was during her husband's life, she would be abundantly provided for; but the division allowed by law leaves her an entirely insufficient sum, and she feels immediately cramped and anxious, while the money which she has hardly earned is carried away by sons and daughters. This is unjust and offensive.

THE DAUGHTER AT HOME.

THERE are many young women who think themselves exceedingly ill treated by fate because they have disagreeable homes, and their one desire is to get away from them. They visit their friends—school acquaintances, possibly, of better circumstances; they meet comfort and cheer, bright faces, soft words, and smiles; and whether they suspect it probable that their friends may have put the best foot forward for company, or whether they recognize the fact that such is only what should be met in a home with or without company, they bemoan themselves that in their own home there is so deplorable an example of family life.

Perhaps their father is absorbed in business or other things; perhaps he is poor; perhaps their mother is worn out by sickness, disappointment, and cares; perhaps there is a cluster of younger children littering the rooms with toys, clamoring with all their wants, and quarreling with all their hearts; perhaps there is trial and deprivation in making both ends meet, or in keeping up appearances; there may be no books, no pictures in the house, nothing to please the eye, little to please any other sense, little but the ceaseless grind of daily labor; and if, in addition to all this, there may be wrangling and bickering and backbiting, the home is indeed a melancholy place, and we do not wonder that the daughter is glad to escape from it by any avenue, either of work or marriage.

There are, however, too many homes where, if not the whole of this is true, a varied portion of it is, and where one day dawns like another, and, without saying so much consciously, nobody has any hope of doing any thing better than getting through with it, where work is a hated routine, where strife is casting out love, and where pleasure as mere pleasure is a thing unknown. One may well pity the daughters of such homes, not because they are more pitiable than the sons—nothing can be more pitiable than the boys early driven out by the natural instincts of youth for pleasure, its natural antipathies to pain, to seek enjoyment where it can be had, and that may be in haunts where horror treads close upon the pleasure—but because we are dealing more especially with the daughters. One may well pity all the children of such a home, and, if they develop any good, wonder to what stature the goodness might have reached if it had not been stunted by the unfortunate conditions of its growth.

But while according the unhappy young creatures every measure of sympathy, we may at the same time question if they have done all they could to bring about a different state of things, for bad as that state of things may be, there is still much in their power to do toward its amelioration—not, of course, while very young and unable to generalize on the daily events, but as soon as they have reached those years of only tolerable discretion when we are all apt to think ourselves wisest.

It is not to be dreamed of, we admit, that a daughter is able to effect much in the way of composing differences between parents, nor is it desirable that she should ever interfere in dissensions that are not her own: neither duty nor policy would allow it, and in such case she does best when she remembers that a third party always widens a rent. But she can at least permit her unhappiness at those disturbances to be seen. She can throw oil upon the troubled waters by doing the little things which show anxiety for the comfort of both parties, and so soften the disposition of the moment, and incline to content and thence to peace, and she can quietly fill many short-comings on either side. But unless she is sure that she meets all her own obligations faithfully as a daughter and sister—that she saves her mother's steps, that she spares her father trouble, that she receives the demands of the little children without fretfulness, and sets them no bad example to follow—she has not the right to so much as observe that others fail in any of their own duties.

However, to pass that phase of unhappiness in a home without further discussion, there are other doors open for the person who really desires to bring improvement into the family circle. There is a door which is a sort of CLAUDE LORRAINE glass, gilding every landscape so that one always looks through it at the bright side of things: the cheerful face, the sweet smile, the pleasant word, that come in this door, the habit of never borrowing trouble—these are like good angels in a house. Other doors there doubtless are, through which other angels come; doors of all the fine moralities, and with which we must suppose every one who has had the common teaching of a Christian community to be well acquainted. But besides all these there are others still, little postern-gates we might call them, through which a great deal of happiness can creep into a house almost unawares.

It is, for example, within the power of every young girl who obtains her parents' consent thereto—a thing usually given before asked—to make her home a beautiful place to the eye, and therefore (other things being equal, such as the kind hearts, the happy atmosphere) attractive to the lingerer. There may be an ingrain carpet on the floor there, or even none at all; there may be wooden chairs and an ugly stove; but on this rude frame her simple efforts can build a world of beauty. Let her begin at the windows of the room, with their plain shades: she suspends a hanging-basket in one of these windows, let us say; not a basket bought at the florist's for five or ten dollars, and stocked with splendid tropical things, but a wooden box filled with earth, and set in one of those little wickers that are usually to be found knocking about every house, and are, at any rate, to be had in the shops for twenty cents; and she laces it by a stout cord twisted from the twines that have come home round the kitchen parcels. Here she plants nasturtiums and the delicate Madeira vine, and any green leaf that will grow, trailing these stems over the cords, and suffering those to droop across the edge, and her window is presently finer than if curtained with point lace. Another window she fills by degrees with a double tier of plants, raised from such slips as neighbors give each other—a rose, a geranium, a daphne, a gloxinia rooted from a single leaf, a fuchsia, a jasmine; she gives them such sunshine as she can, charcoal, warm water, and care, and she soon has a tapestry of blossoms there that rival in brilliancy any tapestry of foreign looms, and an atmosphere of fragrance outdoing LUBIN'S distillery. If there is a third window, she stands a pot of ivy near it, and winds the branches in and out across it as they grow till it is a lattice-work of greenery, and then the long stems slowly spread their arms about the room and make it a little bower, while the coal-stove in use in every house prevents all injury to the pretty nurslings in the coldest weather. Is not that simple decoration in itself preferable to those of Mrs. Potiphar's drawing-room, where there were curtains of every conceivable dye, and carpets that looked as if the curtains had dripped on them?

There is then, perhaps, a hideous paper on the walls; she puts up with it, if she must; but when it is to be replaced, she remembers that the backs of the commonest kitchen wall-papers, that sell at six cents a roll, are always of a soft and uniform gray; and since satin-faced, pearl-tinted, and gilded papers are out of the question, she uses her influence to have the kitchen paper put upon the parlor wall, with the plain wrong side out. To the ornamenting of this plain surface she then turns her labors. Perhaps she can induce the purchase of a print; perhaps a lithograph comes with the weekly paper; perhaps she is forced to resort to the double supplement of some chance sheet; whatever she has, she frames it in a passe-partout of her own, and finds nothing easier to do; and she pins up about it, as it hangs, a sort of halo of delicate pressed ferns radiating from it. In another spot she hangs a wreath of the vivid and varied maple leaves of autumn; and perhaps she incloses the little photographs of some friends in frames made of four sticks, and covered by the help of a little putty with the shells that have been in the garret ever since she was born, or with gray winter mosses and scarlet berries. Then she has dealings with the wizard ol' clo' man, and certain useless garments of the house turn into vases for the mantel-shelf, which she has already hidden and fringed with the knotted ravelings of an old shawl; and in the vases are dried twigs, branches of scarlet elder berries, lovely seed-vessels, and tufts of the milk-weed, whose frost-split pods look like little white-sailed birds sailing away on the wind—daintier things than wax-flowers, or china shepherdesses, or any of the other frequent mantel-shelf atrocities. She has, meanwhile, importuned till her father has bought a square of green baize, or else she has found some way of turning a penny and has bought it herself, and she has hemmed and tasseled it for a table-cloth; and after so much she makes haste to bend all her energies to the covering and cushioning of the wooden chairs with a pretty copper-plate, to the making of a box-lounge, to a barrel-chair stuffed with hay; and at last she and her brothers sit about the table to draw designs for little brackets to adorn the corners and waste places of the room, and to whittle them out of such old cigar boxes as they have been able to lay their hands on.

There, then, is one delightful room. And others easily follow; for of course the parents, on seeing such a spirit, can not be very backward in giving what assistance may be possible to them.

Now out of all this better things even than pretty windows and pleasant walls have arisen. There has been created a growing regard for the affairs of home, an engagement and absorption in them; the mother has been gratified, and has allowed the work; the father has been pleased, and has given as he could; he has felt it his duty to encourage; he has brought home a pretty lamp, perhaps, or a chromo, or a rug, if he had to pinch himself in many a pipe or other pleasure to do it; the boys have been interested, and have been kept out of the streets—hammering and whittling and helping; they have been proud to bring their companions in, and round the green baize table cheerful games have started into life, and the evenings that used to be tedious horrors have found wings that fly all too quickly. Moreover, in the new surroundings new manners have come about. People frequently find that rude and boorish ways are ill at ease in the midst of refined and graceful things, and so gradually accommodate themselves to circumstances. We all, unconsciously albeit, behave ourselves better than common when in our "Sunday clothes." And the daughter who has taken this interest and these pains will find gentle answers and pleasant attentions springing up about her, just as the soft and new forest growth of maple and oak spring up when the rugged forest of pine has been cut away. She will find, too, that the mother grows ambitious to have the little sitting-room match the parlor; a more civilized conduct will be demanded there by her—napkins will develop on the table, perhaps plated forks; collars will be put on before breakfast, and the best chamber will begin to blossom like a rose.

There is, in fact, no limit to what one ambitious and determined young girl who is dissatisfied with her home can accomplish there in perfectly proper ways. And we think that if instead of imagining that her dissatisfaction is a calling to teach in the Five Nations or go a missionary to the Feejee Islands, she looks at it and understands it, and stays and does her whole duty at home, she will have accomplished a greater work, both of civilization and religion, and will have realized the full meaning of that saying of Colonel HIGGINSON'S, that "noble discontent is the path to heaven."

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

TRAVELING OUTFITS.

THE various shades of brown, from écru and dust-color down to mordoré and leaf brown, are preferred this season for traveling suits instead of the gray dresses that have been in vogue so long. Next to brown in popularity are the grayish-green shades, sage, réséda, and mignonette; and there are many new suits of the stylish ocean tints of grayish-blue. Two shades are generally used in these suits—a very light shade for the over dress, and an extremely dark one for the skirt beneath, that must come in contact with the street. The darkest shade is used for trimming the lighter garment, and gives it character. A few suits are made entirely of one shade, but they are insipid-looking.

The materials for traveling dresses are those rough-surfaced goods that have the appearance of being worn for service and as semi-dress, yet are so limp and flexible that they drape gracefully, and are therefore stylish. First among these is camel's-hair and its many serge imitations. This is merely bought for the polonaise, which requires four or five yards of this double-width goods, which costs from $3 to $6 a yard. The skirt is usually silk, but for long journeys, such as an ocean voyage or the trip to the Pacific, a skirt of the camel's-hair is added, and trimmed simply with bias bands of the material, edged perhaps with wool fringe. Next in favor for these lengthy voyages are suits of English water-proof of the deep purplish-blue shade; with buttons of oxidized silver for the only ornament, a polonaise suit of this fabric may be made very effective, and will stand the hard wear of travel better than any material in use. The water-proof cloth costs from $2 50 to $4 a yard; a polonaise made of it is very pretty when worn with a black silk skirt. For brides' traveling dresses the soft caressante cashmere is still very popular, though it is being gradually displaced by more "fuzzy stuffs." Of the latter, de baize is the principal inexpensive fabric. This is soft undressed wool, rough-surfaced, thin enough for the wind to blow through, yet strong, and so clinging that it gives sufficient warmth. It is single width, and costs 50 cents a yard. $10 buys sufficient for a dress, and if made at home the cost of the entire suit will be from $15 to $20. Bias silk bands of a darker brown, with silk collar, pockets, cuffs, sash, and large button-moulds covered with silk, are the trimming. Velvet instead of silk is much used for trimming traveling dresses, but is too heavy for de baize. These velvet-trimmed dresses will be worn all summer, and velvet skirts will also be stylishly worn until the heat of summer makes them intolerable. Gray mohair, for 50 or 60 cents a yard, is a durable fabric for traveling suits. Its glazed surface repels dust, and it will not cockle after dampness. For short trips in summer undressed linen the natural color of the flax will be made in suits as formerly, also the deep blue linens that are new this season, and of which we have already spoken. Pure flax linens cost 40 or 50 cents a yard, and are trimmed with flounces, bias bands, and large white buttons, either pearl or imitation ivory. Very little blue linen has been imported; it is found only at the private modistes', and costs $1 a yard. In still thinner batiste the lace-striped goods are chosen for polonaises, and solid grounds for the lower skirts. Exclusive houses show fine batistes that are sold for $2 a yard, but the same patterns are imitated in the coarse goods sold for 25 cents a yard, and this is bringing figured batistes into disfavor. The plain ground finely embroidered in darker brown shades, and the camel's-hair or tufted batistes, are very handsome. French embroidered costumes, unmade, shown in boxes, cost from $12 to $25. The embroidery is done by hand in Napoleon blue on the more expensive costumes, while the cheaper ones show many ruffles ornamented with woven Hamburg embroidery in white.

The appropriate mode of making traveling dresses is a very long plain polonaise and single skirt trimmed with bands, facings, and simply gathered flounces, but without heavy pleatings and those elaborate hand-made trimmings that catch dust and are so difficult to cleanse. Two ten-inch flounces gathered, with a band of silk for heading and edging, trim de baize and other woolen skirts prettily. A réséda or a brown camel's-hair polonaise may be found ready-made, with silk or velvet trimmings, for $50; if made to order it will cost $75. A suit with brown silk skirt and camel's-hair polonaise, made at the best modistes', costs about $150. These flannel-like suits of camel's-hair are especially appropriate for the sea-side and for mountain excursions. The fronts of polonaises are long enough to touch the bottom of the skirt beneath them. One or two rows of buttons ornament this front, and sometimes there is a wide silk facing or revers, with imitation bound button-holes placed down the front. The loose-fronted polonaise with a single dart, worn full and without a belt, gives an appearance of embonpoint to the most slender figure. The back consists of two straight sacque-shaped lengths, belted down either outside or underneath, with much fullness added for the skirt drapery. There are two new modes of draping this season; the first catches the skirt up in the middle of the back only, drawing the front open and down in a long point on each side; the second leaves the closed front and sides plain and square without a wrinkle, and strings are used to tie them back under the bouffant back. A third fashion—not new, but still very popular—drapes the sides high and very far back, while the back breadths hang long and full.

The traveling hat is of chip, brown or gray to match the dress, and is trimmed with two shades of bias silk of the colors used in the costume. The shape is either a Rubens with brim turned up on the side only, or else a Rabagas which is turned up all around. A black chip hat is used when black velvet collar, cuffs, and sash are on the polonaise. The handkerchief veil of gray or very dark green grenadine is universal. The new lingerie for traveling is made of percale, with dark gray, blue, or black lines and bars on white. It comes in little chemisettes, with standing English collar and deep cuffs turned over in points at the corners to match the collar. Plain sets of collar (without chemisette) and cuffs cost 40 cents. Écru batiste lingerie is also worn with the pretty black taffeta silk suits made especially for traveling and for morning wear on the street.

Long dusters of gray linen, with striped skirts of black and white percale, are the French "over-all" suits imported to be put on over a handsome traveling costume and preserve it from soil. The linen duster is merely a very long polonaise with loose double-breasted front, belted back, and cape. This with the percale skirt costs $12. Large plain linen dusters, made like a water-proof cloak, cost $5. The undressed kid gloves worn when traveling are very long, fastened by but one button at the wrist, but with a long closed cuff that moulds itself on the arm. In Russia leather belts the lisse (smooth) leather, either black or dark green, is preferred to the red. They are fastened by silvered clasps before or behind, and have a silvered châtelaine for an umbrella, vinaigrette, etc. The useful châtelaine bag seems to have lost favor merely on account of its popularity. The accessories of traveling toilettes, such as folios for paper, nécessaires for sewing materials, dressing-cases, inkstands, drinking cups, and even tiny clocks, are now covered with Russia leather, or else with écru canvas bound with leather.

LACE SACQUES AND POLONAISES.

Strong, serviceable guipure will be the proper lace this summer, and sacques and polonaises the fashionable lace wraps. The stylish sacque is amply long and loose, or else is slightly shaped to the figure, and has half-flowing sleeves. Young ladies will wear sacques that are slashed up the back, but the plain simple shape will be most used. Many sacques have centres of imitation guipure in rose patterns with real lace border; these are very well thought of, because the imitation guipure is all silk and jetty black, differing from real guipure only in being woven instead of hand-made. These sacques, with real borders, cost $33 for the best styles, and other qualities are shown as low as $12. Newer than these, and still handsomer, are the imported sacques made of real guipure insertion sewed in lengthwise stripes, slightly shaped to the figure, and with flowing sleeves. A very pretty one may be bought for $60; thence the price increases to $200. Yak lace or woolen guipure sacques are also shown; they are commended for their durability and pretty designs; some have the square Dolman sleeves, and are fastened by a filigree silver clasp. Llama lace sacques woven in imitation of hand-made thread lace are prettily worn with black dresses, are durable and strong, and are now worn by ladies who a few years ago refused to wear any thing less than thread lace. They cost from $12 to $80; the qualities most salable are those costing from $30 to $40. A small llama sacque with slashed back, such as young ladies wear, may be bought for $35, of such admirable quality that it can scarcely be distinguished from real thread. Fine thread lace sacques cost from $60 to $275. Ladies who can afford to have one of these frail and beautiful garments usually purchase a llama or guipure sacque to save their finer ones.

Long belted polonaises with flowing sleeves are shown in guipure lace, costing from $80 to $150; an especially fine one, with insertion stripes, a high standing fraise, an exquisitely wrought lace border, and voluminous back breadths draped in square scarfs and held by a blue sash, costs $450. Plainer llama polonaises cost from $40 to $100.

Lace points retain their three-cornered shape. The shaded princesse designs in llama and thread lace are very beautiful, but have not met with proper appreciation, and shawls ornamented with these shaded figures are sold now for one-third of their original price. Very beautiful princesse llama shawls now offered for $25 were formerly marked $80. Directions for draping lace points to form stylish mantles were given in the New York Fashions of Bazar No. 20, Vol. VI. Watered ribbon bows look especially well with laces.

Lace scarfs for the neck are usually made of Spanish blonde with polka dot or else a thickly wrought sprig, and fanciful appliqué border in scroll or else leaf pattern. They cost from $8 to $12, and measure from a yard and a half to three yards in length.

VARIETIES.

Among the latest importations are suits of black grenadine with five lengthwise graduated puffs covering the three front breadths and meeting a narrow flounce at the foot. On the back breadths are four wide straight gathered flounces. The basque is long, and in this instance the silk lining is cut low. Other grenadine basques have thread insertions sewed in the side forms and arranged in Pompadour squares.

Pale blue camel's-hair polonaises for carriage costumes have white vines of embroidery, and are edged with white unbleached yak lace: price $140. Another carriage wrap is a white cashmere mantle with long square fronts; it is lined with blue silk, has a blue silk hood, and watered ribbon Watteau bow, and the edge is finished with yak insertion and lace: price $90. A third wrap is of tourterelle gray cloth with silk lining and oxidized clasp.

French morning dresses of white nansook have a jacket and demi-train, with the front covered with horizontal tucks and Valenciennes lace. The neck is edged with a high fraise of lace.

To wear with white or black dresses are pink and blue turquoise silks made in vest shape, and trimmed with appliqué embroidery and Valenciennes lace. Bows of black velvet fasten the front. Price $20. Very full fluffy ruches of white tulle for the neck, with lengthwise jabot bows of pink, green, or blue, cost $3. The plain high tulle ruche is $1 50. Pleated muslin fraises in two standing frills, shaped very high behind and sloped away in front, are edged with Italian Valenciennes, and sold for $1 25.

Imported white repped piqué polonaises prettily braided and edged with bullion fringe are sold in boxes, not made up, for $25.

New bustles with arched whalebone frames covered with muslin, and afterward with ruffles edged with lace, cost from $7 to $15.

PERSONAL.

M. DE LESSEPS, who nineteen years ago conceived and opened to SAID PASHA, of Egypt, the project of making the Suez Canal, and who, in 1859, commenced the work, may now have his little laugh against England. Lord PALMERSTON spoke of the enterprise as being fettered with insurmountable difficulties, and English capitalists generally refused to take stock in it. Of the £16,000,000 expended in its construction France furnished £12,000,000, and now that it is a success M. DE LESSEPS, who virtually controls it, makes Englishmen pay roundly for their lack of faith and foresight. For upward of a year the canal dues have been in effect doubled, and as out of every hundred ships going through the canal seventy-nine are British, the cost to the bold Briton is something that touches him deeply.

—The Duke of Edinburgh, according to German journals, has been making large purchases of furniture, etc., at Berlin, with which he is fitting up his palace at Coburg anew in magnificent style. Over there they talk about it as though house-furnishing was the chief end of man. It is not.

—Mr. RALPH W. EMERSON, who was lately a visitor at the London Working-men's College, of which Mr. TOM HUGHES is principal, said he had derived pleasure from the visit, and that the college was one fit for England and worthy of England; and, in a sly way, Mr. E. thought, as a country, that England fairly stood next to the United States.

—On Tuesday evening last the Rev. Dr. HAIGHT, of this city, who declined the episcopate of Massachusetts, delivered a sermon before the Episcopal Convention of that diocese on the life and labors of the late Bishop EASTBURN.

—Emulating the example of DREW and VANDERBILT, a wealthy gentleman of San Francisco has placed in the hands of Bishop KIP a handsome sum of money for the purpose of purchasing a lot just outside the grounds of the State University at Berkeley, and the erection thereon of a handsome chapel for the accommodation of professors and students. He is an Episcopalian, but refuses for the present to have his name published.

—Mr. MONCURE D. CONWAY writes from London that "Mr. EMERSON still continues to be the lion of London. Noblemen are clamorous to have him sit at their tables, and the Lord Mayor of London offers him a banquet he has had to decline. This evening the Dean of Westminster will entertain him at dinner. Mr. EMERSON will visit Oxford, where he will be the guest of Professor MAX MÜLLER; he will perhaps visit South Wales, York, and Edinburgh; and will sail for America on May 15, in company with Mr. CHARLES NORTON, of Cambridge, and his sisters. Mr. EMERSON and his daughter voyaged up the Nile as far as Philæ."

—One KASTNER, a scientist of renown, who has lately investigated the phenomena of singing flames, described at a recent meeting of the Academy of Sciences an instrument which he had invented, and which he called the pyrophone.

—We forbear to give the name of that Massachusetts editor who says that when a Universalist clergyman prays in secret he steadfastly gazes toward Boston, and petitions that he may have a call, if not to the Hub itself, at least to some of its charming suburbs.

—The villa of the late ALEXANDER POPE, Esq., poet, etc., at Twickenham, is advertised for sale. The present house is modern, being a substantial edifice of Elizabethan design, the villa actually inhabited by POPE having been pulled down by Lady HOWE and Sir WATHEN WALLER nearly seventy years ago, and part of POPE'S grounds having been built over. The garden, lawn, and adjoining grove are comparatively but little changed from what they were when tenanted by ALEXANDER POPE.

—PAREPA set the Egyptians all agog at Cairo recently by singing a Greek song. There was to be a concert in half a dozen languages, and the Greek basso took sick; and PAREPA, though knowing nothing of the language, mastered it sufficiently in twelve hours to give the song so well that the public "nearly went mad over her"—and there is a good deal of PAREPA to get mad over.

—Mr. ADAMS, of Hartford, was another good man. He died recently. But he had previously made a will leaving $20,000 as a fund to support lame horses. For that purpose, ample; for ducks, quite inadequate.

—Rev. OLYMPIA BROWN, pastor of the Universalist Society at Bridgeport, Connecticut, after winning and converting much Yankee heart, has finally solaced herself with a single one, which beats in the interior of the manly form of Mr. JOHN HENRY WILLIS, a respectable business man and citizen of her parish. Although the wedding was celebrated in Providence, it was not by special dispensation. We might introduce a classical quotation on OLYMPIA, but refrain.

—M. GRAMME, of Paris, has won fame and a prize of $10,000 for the invention of an electro-magnetic machine, one of the simplest and most efficient that has been invented. The prize was paid by the Paris Academy of Sciences. The construction is so free from complications that the instrument will work and give a continuous current for months together, and to those who know any thing of the subject these will appear as results of the highest importance. One of the uses to which this machine may be immediately applied is the production of a light of intense brilliancy, which will be seen farther than any other electric light yet known. One of the French steam-ship companies is about to use this light on its vessels as a precaution against collisions or other casualties, and it is obvious it can be made of great general utility.

—Madame THIERS lent the prestige of her presence to a bazar at the Paris Opera-house, where one hundred and forty thousand francs were realized for the orphans of soldiers killed in the war.

—Think what an excellent woman was MARY CLARKE, the mother of that famous man who commentated so tremendously on the Bible. This was what she inculcated on her sons: "Do nothing carelessly, and then, with the ability you have, you will do most things well. Be exact in all you do, nor let the least matter pass you unexamined. In your reading, too, investigate your subject, and be not satisfied with skimming on the surface of things, nor make any attempt to grasp the whole without attending to every part in order. Paying attention to particulars as well as to generalities will by degrees give you a habit of mental observation, while at the same time it will deepen your knowledge. Do not forget to bear your needs and your heart in private before God, that He may grant you grace and direct all your future path in life."

—THOMAS JEFFERSON'S family carriage, imported by him from Europe, was, as they say of woolens and things, "good goods," for it still withstands the thousand shocks that such vehicles are heir to, and was lately sent to a wagonist's to be repaired. By a judicious system of repairing that antique vehicle may be kept in running order a thousand years, to excite the veneration of future generations, and rack the bones of future owners.

—Colonel JEROME NAPOLEON BONAPARTE and wife (formerly Miss EDGAR, of this city) are stopping in town awaiting the finishing of their residence at Newport, where they will dwell during the heated months.

—STRAUSS'S memory has been honored in Vienna. The fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of the orchestra bearing his name was celebrated on the 6th of April by the two sons, JOHANN and EDUARD. In 1823 the old original STRAUSS performed his first composition in an orchestra composed of eighteen musicians, a number subsequently raised to thirty. He died in 1849, and his eldest son, JOHANN, further augmented the band by twelve performers. In 1853 JOSEPH, the second son, took command of the orchestra in association with EDUARD, and on his death, in 1870, EDUARD succeeded to the sole charge of a band now numbering forty-seven.

—Mr. DAVID LAURIE, of Glasgow, has just sold to a musical amateur in Edinburgh the beautiful Cremona violin known as the "Sancy Stradivarius," for the large sum of $1750. The date of the violin is 1713, and it is in perfect preservation.

—Mr. C. P. SHELTON, of New Haven, Connecticut, has erected a building called "Shelton Hall," especially for the benefit of his son, WILLIS SHELTON, the famous boy organist. It was dedicated a few days ago, with the aid of OLE BULL, S. P. WARREN, of Grace Church, in this city, and a few other musical eminents.

—Mr. JOHN ROMEYN BRODHEAD, of this city, who died on the 6th inst., was of a family of renown, and well did he maintain the fame of his ancestors. From his youth he devoted himself to the study of American history, with especial reference to the period when the Dutch were in the ascendant in this country. In 1839 he went to Holland as a member of the United States legation at the Hague, and while there was appointed, in 1841, by Governor SEWARD, under the authority of the Legislature, to search out and make copies of such original documents as referred to the early history of this State. The next three years of his life were spent in this work. He examined the archives of Holland, England, and France, and as the fruit of his labors obtained more than five thousand separate papers, which he brought with him to this country in 1844. After an examination of these documents Mr. BANCROFT said of them that "the ship in which he returned was more richly freighted with new materials for American history than any that had ever crossed the Atlantic." From 1846 until 1849 Mr. BRODHEAD was in England as secretary of the United States legation, of which Mr. BANCROFT was chief. On his return he began his History of the State of New York, the first volume of which was issued in 1853, and the second in 1871. From 1853 until 1857 he was Naval Officer of this port, having declined the appointment of consul-general to Japan, which was conferred on him in 1855.

—The Rev. Dr. CHAPIN has no special cause for complaint at the closeness of his congregation. On the 7th inst. was celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of his pastorship of that church. And what did the brethren do? Behold they gave unto him a silken purse, deftly made by lady hands, in which was artfully concealed ten thousand dollars. But the doctor found it out, and exposed the nefarious transaction in language fit and emphatic. They even talk of aggravating the affair by stretching the purse.

—Mrs. General WOOL, who died a few days ago at Troy, at the age of eighty-six, was a worthy helpmate to her distinguished husband. She was descended from one of the oldest and best families in the country, some of whom had given to it their blood, and some their lives.

—Captain HENRY, grandson of PATRICK HENRY, died a few days since at Washington. He had been a man of means, but was brought into reduced circumstances by the war, and at the time of his death was serving as a watchman in the Treasury Department.

—Mr. GROTE, the historian, and Sir GEORGE C. LEWIS held one curious belief in common, viz., the slight value to be attached to early traditions. Mr. GROTE doubted whether there was any ground for the belief that Troy had existed.

—At a concert recently given at Pesth the audience tried to carry away LISZT piecemeal, in the manner of relic hunters. His music, coat, buttons, and shirt collar went; in short, he was generally and successfully burgled. He now contemplates a backward movement, and again to become a fine old monk.

Gentleman's Collar-Box. Crochet and Point Russe.—Figs. 1-3.

THIS box with an underlapping lid is of thick cardboard, and is three inches and three-quarters high and six inches in diameter. It is covered on the inside with white glazed paper, and on the outside with brown carriage leather of a medium shade, which is ornamented, as shown by the illustration, with crochet strips of gray cotton and point Russe embroidery in saddler's silk. The strips for the rim of the box consist each of ten rounds, which are worked lengthwise, going back and forth, as follows: On a foundation of the requisite length crochet the 1st–4th rounds all in sc. (single crochet), in ribbed crochet stitch, always inserting the needle in the front vein of each st. (stitch) in the preceding round. At the end of these rounds, before turning the work, always 1 ch. (chain stitch). 5th round.—3 ch., which count as first dc. (double crochet), 1 dc. on the next st. (inserting the needle in both upper veins), * 2 ch., with these pass over 2 st., 2 dc. on the next 2 st.; repeat from * to the end. 6th round.—3 ch., which count as first dc., then always alternately 2 ch., 2 dc. on the 2 ch. in the preceding round. 7th–10th rounds.—Like the 1st–4th rounds. Having worked the requisite number of such strips, baste them on the carriage leather at regular intervals, and join them with point Russe and knotted stitches of saddler's silk in several shades of brown, as shown by Fig. 3, which gives a full-sized section of the embroidery border. Paste the finished cover on the rim of the box. On the outside of the bottom paste a piece of dark brown carriage leather of the requisite size, and bind the box on the upper and under edges with worsted braid of the same color, which has first been ornamented with a cross seam of lighter silk. Work the eight crochet strips for the cover of the lid partly in connection. Begin from the middle with a foundation of 4 ch., which are closed in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch). On this ring crochet three rounds of sc., always going forward, widening in the first round 1 st. on each st., and in the second and third rounds widen so that the third round counts 16 st. 4th round.—* 30 ch. as a foundation for the first strip of the crochet part, pass over the last 3 ch. (these count as first dc.), and going back on the remaining ch. work 2 dc. on the next foundation st.; four times alternately 2 ch., pass over 2 foundation st., 2 dc. on the following 2 foundation st., then 3 ch., pass over 3 foundation st., 7 sc. on the next 7 foundation st., 1 sc. on the second following st. in the third round; repeat from *, always going forward, and fasten the thread. 5th round.—This round is worked on the wrong side of the crochet-work, and is begun at the end of a strip; * 25 sc. on the foundation st. of the next strip in the preceding round, passing over the last 3 and the first 2 st., 1 ch., 25 sc. on the corresponding st. of the following strip, 3 st. on the 3 ch. which count as first dc. at the end of the strip, and repeat from *. In a similar manner work three rounds more in ribbed crochet, narrowing the sc. at both sides of each strip toward the middle of the crochet part by 2 st. each, and working always 1 ch. in the hollow between two strips. Fasten the finished crochet part on the carriage leather with point Russe and knotted stitch, as shown by Fig. 2, and then paste the carriage leather on the lid. On the middle of the lid set a crochet-covered button, on which silk is stretched, and furnish the outer edge with a binding of brown braid ornamented with a cross seam in the manner shown by the illustration.

Medallions in Satin and Half-polka Stitch and Point Russe Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE small medallions are suitable for trimming baskets, memorandum-books, and other fancy articles. They are those used on the card-rack, page 341, and are worked in satin and half-polka stitch and point Russe on light cloth or faille with saddler's silk, either in various bright colors, or else in several shades of one color. In the latter case it is advisable to use some real gold thread.

See illustrations on page 341.

THESE rosettes may be set together for tidies, or for covers of small or large cushions, work-baskets, etc. The originals are worked with mignardise and twisted crochet cotton, No. 80.

Fig. 1.—For this large rosette work, first, the middle star, fastening the ends of a piece of mignardise nineteen inches and a quarter long carefully together, then lay the mignardise in eight equal loops, as shown by the illustration, and join the eight loops of the mignardise which come together in the centre with 8 sl. (slip stitch). Border the star thus formed on the outer edge with the following three rounds. 1st round.—* 1 sc. (single crochet) on the middle loop of the next point of the star, 11 ch. (chain stitch), 1 stc. (short treble crochet) on the third following loop of the same point, and 1 stc. on the corresponding loop of the next point, work off both stc. together, drawing the thread through once, and 1 sc. on the upper vein of the joining stitch, 11 ch., pass over two loops, and repeat from . 2d round.—On each st. (stitch) of the preceding round 1 sc. 3d round.— 1 sc. on the next st., 7 ch., 1 p. (picot, consisting of 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these), 3 ch., pass over 6 st., and repeat from *. Pay no attention to this crochet part for the present. Take another piece of mignardise, and on one side crochet the 4th and 5th rounds as follows: 4th round.—1 sc. on the next loop, 13 ch., 1 sc. on the second following loop, 4 ch., fasten to the ninth of the 13 ch. Now turn the scallop upward, and on the wrong side of the work crochet 3 ch., 1 sl., with which fasten together the three loops which come together on the other side of the mignardise, 2 ch., 1 sl., with which fasten together the next two corresponding loops, 5 ch., drop the last st. from the needle, turn and bands for holding the necessary writing utensils, as shown by Fig. 1. The inkstand is set in a separate case at one end on the outside. To this box is joined a portfolio or pocket eight inches and seven-eighths long, furnished with a flap two inches and seven-eighths wide, of Russia leather, which serves to hold the paper, and at the same time answers for a foundation in writing, as shown by Fig. 1. The inside of the pocket is covered with black shagreen leather, ornamented in the corners with satin stitch, point Russe, and half-polka stitch embroidery with maroon saddler's silk and gold thread. Figs. 3 and 4 show two designs for the corners in full size. The portfolio is also trimmed on the outside with two embroidery borders as shown by Fig. 2, which represents the desk closed. Figs. 5 and 6, page 340, give two designs for these borders; these are worked either on the leather or on maroon faille with saddler's silk of the same color in point Russe and knotted stitch. The border Fig. 5 is also trimmed with small buttons covered with maroon silk.

See illustration on page 341.

THE cover is of maple. For the arabesques leave the original color of the wood, and draw all the contours and lines with black Indian ink. Between the design figures cover the foundation partly with dark and partly with light blue, and for the small dots which simulate the nails of the mountings set on gold. Of course the painting may be done in other colors, as, for instance, entirely in sepia.

See illustration on page 341.

THIS card-receiver, which simulates a small stand with portfolio, is six inches high and four inches and a half wide. It is made entirely of red Russia leather, and trimmed with small buttons, plates, and a handle of bronze. The front of the portfolio is ornamented with an embroidered medallion. The foundation of the embroidery is of light gray faille; the embroidery is worked with maroon saddler's silk and gold thread in satin and half-polka stitch and in point Russe. Figs. 1 and 2, page 340, give two designs suitable for the medallion.

See illustrations on page 341.

THIS dressing-case, which simulates a high trunk, and is especially designed for traveling, is of maroon Russia leather, eight inches high and four inches and a half wide. It is ornamented with an embroidery border, the side edges of which are covered with a strip of leather fastened on with large bronze buttons, as shown by the illustrations. A similar strip forms the handle of the dressing-case, which is closed with a bronze lock. The design for the border on the front is given by Fig. 44, Supplement, and the design for the border on the back and lid by Fig. 45. The flowers and leaves of the border are applied in maroon velvet, edged in satin stitch with saddler's silk in a lighter shade, and ornamented with half-polka stitch veins, and in the middle with several knots. The arabesques are worked in half-polka and knotted stitch with maroon silk in two shades. The front of the dressing-case is not joined with the sides, so that it may be turned down. The inside of the dressing-case, as shown by Fig. 1, consists of several large and small sections, which are designed to hold various toilette articles, and may be taken out, so as to insert a mirror in the space thus formed.

See illustration on page 341.

THE main piece of this Russia leather case, which is eight inches long, serves to hold a flask, to which is fastened a goblet by means of elastic bands, as shown by the illustration. The upper part, forming the lid, is trimmed with an embroidered medallion on the outside. For the medallion work colored petit point embroidery on silk canvas, or else the foundation may be of light faille, and the embroidery in satin and half-polka stitch or point Russe with saddler's silk. Fig. 22, Supplement, gives the design for a medallion worked in this manner. Both parts of the case are furnished, as shown by the illustration, with long, stout leather loops through which coarse maroon worsted cord is run; this cord is thrown over the shoulder in carrying the case. The case may also be trimmed like the writing-desk illustrated on the same page, with either of the borders shown by Figs. 5 and 6, page 340, instead of the medallion.

See illustration on page 341.

THIS embroidery border may be worked on light velvet, cloth, or cashmere, with braid and saddler's silk in various bright colors, in the Turkish style, or else in several shades of a color in harmony with the foundation. In the original the foundation consists of light gray cloth, and the embroidery figures are worked with dark brown, red, green, blue and maize saddler's silk in point Russe and half-polka stitch, and ornamented with knots and small gold beads. For the border of the figures sew on fine dark brown and maize silk braid (soutache); the trimming between the rows of braid is worked with saddler's silk of the same colors and with gold beads. This embroidery may also be used for round cushions.

LADY ANNA.

By ANTHONY TROLLOPE,

Author of "The Warden," "The Small House at Allington," "Barchester Towers," "The Golden Lion of Granpere," "Orley Farm," "The Eustace Diamonds," etc., etc.

CHAPTER VII.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL PERSEVERES.

THERE was considerable difficulty in making the overture to the two ladies—or, rather, in making it to the elder lady, for the suggestion, if made to the daughter, must of course come to her from her mother. It had been decided at last that the Lady Anna could not be invited to the rectory till it had been positively settled that she should be the Lady Anna without further opposition, and that all present and future opposition to the claim should not be withdrawn till the young people were engaged to each other. "How can I call her Lady Anna before I have made up my mind to think that she is Lady Anna?" said the parson, almost in tears. As to the rest of the family, it may be said that they had come silently to think that the Countess was the Countess and that the Lady Anna was the Lady Anna—silently in reference to each other, for not one of them except the young lord had positively owned to such a conviction. Sir William Patterson had been too strong for them. It was true thas he was a Whig. It was possible that he was a traitor. But he was a man of might, and his opinion had domineered over theirs. To make things as straight as they could be made it would be well that the young people should be married. What would be the Earldom of Lovel without the wealth which the old mad Earl had amassed?

Sir William and Mr. Flick were strongly in favor of the marriage, and Mr. Hardy at last assented. The worst of it was that something of all this doubt on the part of the Earl and his friends was sure to reach the opposite party. "They are shaking in their shoes," Sergeant Bluestone said to his junior counsel, Mr. Mainsail. "I do believe they are not going to fight at all," he said to Mr. Goffe, the attorney for the Countess. Mr. Mainsail rubbed his hands. Mr. Goffe shook his head. Mr. Goffe was sure that they would fight. Mr. Mainsail, who had worked like a horse in getting up and arranging all the evidence on behalf of the Countess, and in sifting, as best he might, the Italian documents, was delighted. All this Sir William feared, and he felt that it was quite possible that the Earl's overture might be rejected because the Earl would not be thought to be worth having. "We must count upon his coronet," said Sir William to Mr. Flick. "She could not do better even if the property were undoubtedly her own."

But how was the first suggestion to be made? Mr. Hardy was anxious that every thing should be straightforward, and Sir William assented, with a certain inward peevishness at Mr. Hardy's stiff-necked propriety. Sir William was anxious to settle the thing comfortably for all parties. Mr. Hardy was determined not only that right should be done, but also that it should be done in a righteous manner. The great question now was whether they could approach the widow and her daughter otherwise than through Sergeant Bluestone. "The Sergeant is such a blunderbuss," said the Solicitor-General. But the Sergeant was counsel for these ladies, and it was at last settled that there should be a general conference at Sir William's chambers. A very short note was written by Mr. Flick to Mr. Goffe, stating that the Solicitor-General thought that a meeting might be for the advantage of all parties, and the meeting was arranged. There were present the two barristers and the one attorney for each side, and many an anxious thought was given to the manner in which the meeting should be conducted. Sergeant Bluestone was fully resolved that he would hold his own against the Solicitor-General, and would speak his mind freely. Mr. Mainsail got up little telling questions. Mr. Goffe and Mr. Flick both felt that it would behoove them to hold their peace, unless questioned, but were equally determined to hang fast by their clients. Mr. Hardy in his heart of hearts thought that his learned friend was about to fling away his case. Sir William had quite made up his mind as to his line of action. He seated them all most courteously, giving them place according to their rank—a great arm-chair for Sergeant Bluestone, from which he would hardly be able to use his arms with his accustomed energy—and then he began at once. "Gentlemen," said he, "it would be a great pity that this property should be wasted."

"No fear of that, Mr. Solicitor," said the Sergeant.

"It would be a great pity that this property should be wasted," repeated Sir William, bowing to the Sergeant, "and I am disposed to think that the best thing the two young people can do is to marry each other." Then he paused, and the three gentlemen opposite sat erect, the barristers as speechless as the attorneys. But the Solicitor-General had nothing to add. He had made his proposition, and was desirous of seeing what effect it might have before he spoke another word.

"Then you acknowledge the Countess's marriage, of course," said the Sergeant.

"Pardon me, Sergeant, we acknowledge nothing. As a matter of course, she is the Countess till it be proved that another wife was living when she was married."

"Quite as a matter of course," said the Sergeant.

"Quite as a matter of course, if that will make the case stronger," continued Sir William. "Her marriage was formal and regular. That she believed her marriage to be a righteous marriage before God, I have never doubted. God forbid that I should have a harsh thought against a poor lady who has suffered so much cruel treatment."

"Why have things been said, then?" asked the Sergeant, beginning to throw about his left arm.

"If I am not mistaken," said Mr. Mainsail, "evidence has been prepared to show that the Countess is a party to a contemplated fraud."

"Then you are mistaken, Mr. Mainsail," said Sir William. "I admit at once and clearly that the lady is not suspected of any fraud. Whether she be actually the Countess Lovel or not, it may—I fear it must—take years to prove, if the law be allowed to take its course."

"We think that we can dispose of any counter-claim in much less time than that," said the Sergeant.

"It may be so. I myself think that it would not be so. Our evidence in favor of the lady, who is now living some two leagues out of Palermo, is very strong. She is a poor creature, old, ignorant, fairly well off through the bounty of the late Earl, but always craving for some trifle more, unwilling to come to this country, childless, and altogether indifferent to the second marriage, except in so far as might interfere with her hopes of getting some further subsidy from the Lovel family. One is not very anxious on her behalf. One is only anxious—can only be anxious—that the vast property at stake should not get into improper hands."

"And that justice should be done," said Mr. Hardy.

"And that justice should be done, of course, as my friend observes. Here is a young man who is undoubtedly Earl of Lovel, and who claims a property as heir to the late Earl. And here is a young lady, I am told very beautiful and highly educated, who is the daughter of the late Earl, and who claims that property, believing herself to be his legitimate heiress. The question between them is most intricate."

"The onus probandi lies with you, Mr. Solicitor," said the Sergeant.

"We acknowledge that it does, but the case on that account is none the less intricate. With the view of avoiding litigation and expense, and in the certainty that by such an arrangement the enjoyment of the property will fall to the right owner yet, we propose that steps shall be taken to bring these two young people together. The lady, whom for the occasion I am willing to call the Countess, the mother of the lady whom I hope the young Earl will make his own Countess, has not been sounded on this subject."

"I should hope not," said the Sergeant.

"My learned friend takes me up a little short," said Sir William, laughing. "You gentlemen will probably consult together on the subject, and whatever may be the advice which you shall consider it to be your duty to give to the mother, and I am sure that you will feel bound to let her know the proposition that has been made—I do not hesitate to say that we have a right to expect that it shall be made known to her—I need hardly remark that, were the young lady to accept the young lord's hand, we should all be in a boat together in reference to the mother's rank, and to the widow's claim upon the personal property left behind him by her late husband."

And so the Solicitor-General had made his proposition, and the conference was broken up, with a promise that Mr. Flick should hear from Mr. Goffe upon the subject. But the Sergeant had at once made up his mind against the compromise now proposed. He desired the danger and the dust and the glory of the battle. He was true to his client's interests, no doubt—intended to be intensely true; but the personal, doggish love of fighting prevailed in the man, and he was clear as to the necessity of going on. "They know they are beat," he said to Mr. Goffe. "Mr. Solicitor knows as well as I do that he has not an inch of ground under his feet." Therefore Mr. Goffe wrote the following letter to Messrs. Norton and Flick:

"RAYMOND'S BUILDINGS, GRAY'S INN, July 1, 183-.

"DEAR SIRS,—In reference to the interview which took place at the chambers of the Solicitor-General on the 27th ult., we are to inform you that we are not disposed, as acting for our clients, the Countess of Lovel and her daughter the Lady Anna Lovel, to listen to the proposition then made. Apart from the very strong feeling we entertain as to the certainty of our clients' success—which certainly was not weakened by what we heard on that occasion—we are of opinion that we could not interfere with propriety in suggesting the marriage of two young persons who have not as yet had any opportunity of becoming acquainted with each other. Should the Earl of Lovel seek the hand of his cousin, the Lady Anna Lovel, and marry her with the consent of the Countess, we should be delighted at such a family arrangement; but we do not think that we, as lawyers—or, if we may be allowed to say so, that you, as lawyers—have any thing to do with such a matter.

"We are, dear Sirs,
"Yours very faithfully,
"GOFFE AND GOFFE.

"MESSRS. NORTON AND FLICK."

"Balderdash!" said Sir William, when he had read the letter. "We are not going to be done in that way. It was all very well going to the Sergeant, as he has the case in hand, though a worse messenger in an affair of love—"

"Not love as yet, Mr. Solicitor," said Mr. Flick.

"I mean it to be love, and I'm not going to be put off by Sergeant Bluestone. We must get to the lady by some other means. Do you write to that tailor of Keswick, and say that you want to see him."

"Will that be regular, Sir William?"

"I'll stand the racket, Mr. Flick." Mr. Flick did write to Thomas Thwaite, and Thomas Thwaite came up to London and called at Mr. Flick's chambers.

When Thomas Thwaite received his commission he was much rejoiced. Injustice would be done him unless so much were owned on his behalf. But, nevertheless, some feeling of disappointment which he could not analyze crept across his heart. If once the girl were married to Earl Lovel, there would be an end of his services and of his son's. He had never really entertained an idea that his son would marry the girl. As the reader will perhaps remember, he had warned his son that he must seek his sweetheart elsewhere. He had told himself over and over again that when the Countess came to her own there must be an end of this intimacy; that there could be nothing in common between him, the radical tailor of Keswick, and a really established countess. The Countess, while not yet really established, had already begged that his son might be instructed not to call her daughter simply by her Christian name. Old Thwaite on receiving this intimation of the difference of their position, though he had acknowledged its truth, had felt himself bitterly aggrieved, and now the moment had come. Of course the Countess would grasp at such an offer. Of course it would give her all that she had desired, and much more than she expected. In adjusting his feelings on the occasion the tailor thought but little of the girl herself. Why should she not be satisfied? Of the young Earl he had only heard that he was a handsome, modest, gallant lad, who only wanted a fortune to make him one of the most popular of the golden youth of England. Why should not the girl rejoice at the prospect of winning such a husband? To have a husband must necessarily be in her heart, whether she were the Lady Anna Lovel or plain Anna Murray. And what espousals could be so auspicious as these? Feeling all this, without much of calculation, the tailor said that he would do as he was bidden.

"We have sent for you because we know that you have been so old a friend," said Mr. Flick, who did not quite approve of the emissary whom he had been instructed by Sir William to employ.

"I will do my best, Sir," said Mr. Thwaite, making his bow. Thomas Thwaite, as he went along the streets alone, determined that he would perform this new duty imposed upon him without any reference to his son.

CHAPTER VIII.

IMPOSSIBLE.

"THEY sent for me, Lady Lovel, to bid me come to your ladyship and ask your ladyship whether you would consent to a marriage between the two young people." It was thus that the tailor repeated for the second time the message which had been confided to him, showing the gall and also the pride which were at work about his heart by the repeated titles which he gave to his old friend.

"They desire that Anna should marry the young lord!"

"Yes, my lady. That's the meaning of it."

"And what am I to be?"

"Just the Countess Lovel—with a third of the property as your own. I suppose it would be a third; but you might trust the lawyers to settle that properly. When once they take your daughter among them they won't scrimp you in your honors. They'll all swear that the marriage was good enough then. They know that already, and have made this offer because they know it. Your ladyship needn't fear now but what all the world will own you as the Countess Lovel. I don't suppose I'll be troubled to come up to London any more."

"Oh, my friend!" The ejaculation she made feeling the necessity of saying something to soothe the tailor's pride; but her heart was fixed upon the fruition of that for which she had spent so many years in struggling. Was it to come to her at last? Could it be that now, now at once, people throughout the world would call her the Countess Lovel, and would own her daughter to be the Lady Anna—till she also should become a countess? Of the young man she had heard nothing but good, and it was impossible that she should have fear in that direction, even had she been timorous by nature. But she was bold and eager, hopeful in spite of all that she had suffered, full of ambition, and not prone to feminine scruples. She had been fighting all her life in order that she and her daughter might be acknowledged to be among the aristocrats of her country. She was so far a loving, devoted mother, that in all her battles she thought more of her child than of herself. She would have consented to carry on the battle in poverty to the last gasp of her own breath, could she thereby have insured success for her surviving daughter. But she was not a woman likely to be dismayed at the idea of giving her girl in marriage to an absolute stranger, when that stranger was such a one as the young Earl Lovel. She herself had been a countess, but a wretched, unacknowledged, poverty-stricken countess, for the last half of her eventful life. This marriage would make her daughter a countess, prosperous, accepted by all, and very wealthy. What better end could there be to her long struggles? Of course she would assent.

"I don't know why they should have troubled themselves to send for me," said the tailor.

"Because you are the best friend that I have in the world. Whom else could I have trusted as I do you? Has the Earl agreed to it?"

"They didn't tell me that, my lady."

"They would hardly have sent, unless he had agreed. Don't you think so, Mr. Thwaite?"

"I don't know much about such things, my lady."

"You have told—Daniel?"

"No, my lady."

"Oh, Mr. Thwaite, do not talk to me in that way. It sounds as though you were deserting me."

"There'll be no reason for not deserting now. You'll have friends by the score more fit to see you through this than old Thomas Thwaite. And, to own the truth, now that the matter is coming to an end, I am getting weary of it. I'm not so young as I was, and I'd be better left at home to my business."

"I hope that you may disregard your business now without imprudence, Mr. Thwaite."

"No, my lady—a man should always stick to his business. I hope that Daniel will do so better than his father before him, so that his son may never have to go out to be servant to another man."

"You are speaking daggers to me."

"I have not meant it, then. I am rough by nature, I know, and perhaps a little low just at present. There is something sad in the parting of old friends."

"Old friends needn't be parted, Mr. Thwaite."

"When your ladyship was good enough to point out to me my boy's improper manner of speech to Lady Anna, I knew how it must be. You were quite right, my lady. There can be no becoming friendship between the future Lady Lovel and a journeyman tailor. I was wrong from the beginning."

"Oh, Mr. Thwaite! without such wrong, where should we have been?"

"There can be no holding-ground of friendship between such as you and such as we. Lords and ladies, earls and countesses, are our enemies, and we are theirs. We may make their robes and take their money, and deal with them as the Jew dealt with the Christians in the play; but we can not eat with them or drink with them."

"How often have I eaten and drank at your table, when no other table was spread for me?"

"You were a Jew almost as ourselves then. We can not now well stand shoulder to shoulder and arm to arm as friends should do."

"How often has my child lain in your arms when she was a baby, and been quieter there than she would be even in her mother's?"

"That has all gone by. Other arms will be open to receive her." As the tailor said this he remembered how his boy used to take the little child out to the mountain-side, and how the two would ramble away together through the long summer evenings; and he reflected that the memory of those days was no doubt still strong in the heart of his son. Some shadow of the grief which would surely fall upon the young man now fell upon the father, and caused him almost to repent the work of his life. "Tailors should consort with tailors," he said, "and lords and ladies should consort together."

Something of the same feeling struck the Countess also. If it were not for the son, the father, after all he had done for them, might be almost as near and as dear to them as ever. He might have called the Lady Anna by her Christian name, at any rate till she had been carried away as a bride by the Earl. But, though all this was so exquisitely painful, it had been absolutely necessary to check the son. "Ah, well," she said, "it was hardly to be hoped that so many crooked things should be made straight without much pain. If you knew, Mr. Thwaite, how little it is that I expect for myself!"

"It is because I have known it that I am here."

"It will be well for her, will it not, to be the wife of her cousin?"

"If he be a good man. A woman will not always make herself happy by marrying an earl."

"How many daggers you can use, Mr. Thwaite. But this young man is good. You yourself have said that you have heard so."

"I have heard nothing to the contrary, my lady."

"And what shall I do?"

"Just explain it to Lady Anna. I think it will be clear then."

"You believe that she will be so easily pleased?"

"Why should she not be pleased? She'll have some maiden scruples, doubtless. What maid would not? But she'll exult at such an end to all her troubles; and what maid would not? Let them meet as soon as may be, and have it over. When he shall have placed the ring on her finger, your battle will have been won."

Then the tailor felt that his commission was done, and he might take his leave. It had been arranged that in the event of the Countess consenting to the proposed marriage, he should call upon Mr. Flick to explain that it was so. Had she dissented, a short note would have been sufficient. Had such been the case, the Solicitor-General would have instigated the young lord to go and try what he himself could do with the Countess and her daughter. The tailor had suggested to the mother that she should at once make the proposition known to Lady Anna, but the Countess felt that one other word was necessary as her old friend left her. "Will you go back at once to Keswick, Mr. Thwaite?"

"To-morrow morning, my lady."

"Perhaps you will not tell your son of this—yet?"

"No, my lady. I will not tell my son of this—yet. My son is high-minded and stiff-necked, and of great heart. If he saw aught to object to in this marriage, it might be that he would express himself loudly." Then the tailor took his leave without even shaking hands with the Countess.

The woman sat alone for the next two hours, thinking of what had passed. There had sprung up in these days a sort of friendship between Mrs. Bluestone and the two Misses Bluestone and the Lady Anna, arising rather from the forlorn condition of the young lady than from any positive choice of affection. Mrs. Bluestone was kind and motherly. The girls were girlish and good. The father was the Jupiter Tonans of the household—as was of course proper—and was worshiped in every thing. To the world at large Sergeant Bluestone was a thundering, blustering, sanguine, energetic lawyer, whom nobody disliked very much, though he was so big and noisy. But at home Sergeant Bluestone was all the judges of the land rolled into one. But he was a kind-hearted man, and he had sent his wife and girls to call upon the disconsolate Countess. The disconsolate Lady Anna having no other friends, had found the companionship of the Bluestone girls to be pleasant to her, and she was now with them at the Sergeant's house in Bedford Square. Mrs. Bluestone talked of the wrongs and coming rights of the Countess Lovel wherever she went, and the Bluestone girls had all the case at their finger-ends. To doubt that the Sergeant would succeed, or to doubt that the success of the Countess and her daughter would have had any other source than the Sergeant's eloquence and the Sergeant's zeal, would have been heresy in Bedford Square. The grand idea that young Jack Bluestone, who was up at Brasenose, should marry the Lady Anna had occurred only to the mother.

Lady Anna was away with her friends as the Countess sat brooding over the new hopes that had been opened to her. At first she could not tear her mind away from the position which she herself would occupy as soon as her daughter should have been married and taken away from her. The young Earl would not want his mother-in-law—a mother-in-law who had spent the best years of her life in the society of a tailor. And the daughter, who would still be young enough to begin a new life in a new sphere, would no longer want her mother to help her. As regarded herself, the Countess was aware that the life she had led so long, and the condition of agonizing struggling to which she had been brought, had unfitted her for smiling, happy, prosperous, aristocratic luxury. There was but one joy left for her, and that was to be the joy of success. When that cup should have been drained, there would be nothing left to her. She would have her rank, of course—and money enough to support it. She no longer feared that any one would do her material injury. Her daughter's husband no doubt would see that she had a fitting home, with all the appanages and paraphernalia suited to a dowager countess. But who would share her home with her, and where should she find her friends? Even now the two Misses Bluestone were more to her daughter than she was. When she should be established in her new luxurious home, with servants calling her my lady, with none to contradict her right, she would be enabled to sit late into the night discussing matters with her friend the tailor. As regarded herself, it would have been better for her perhaps if the fight had been carried on.

But the fight had been not for herself, but for her child; and the victory for her girl would have been won by her own perseverance. Her whole life had been devoted to establishing the rights of her daughter, and it should be so devoted to the end. It had been her great resolve that the world should acknowledge the rank of her girl, and now it would be acknowledged. Not only would she become the Countess Lovel by marriage, but the name which had been assumed for her amidst the ridicule of many, and in opposition to the belief of nearly all, would be proved to have been her just and proper title. And then, at last, it would be known by all men that she herself, the ill-used, suffering mother, had gone to the house of that wicked man not as his mistress, but as his true wife.

Hardly a thought troubled her then as to the acquiescence of her daughter. She had no faintest idea that the girl's heart had been touched by the young tailor. She had so lived that she knew but little of lovers and their love, and in her fear regarding Daniel Thwaite she had not conceived danger such as that. It had to her simply been unfitting that there should be close familiarity between the two. She expected that her daughter would be ambitious, as she was ambitious, and would rejoice greatly at such perfect success. She herself had been preaching ambition and practicing ambition all her life. It had been the necessity of her career that she should think more of her right to a noble name than of any other good thing under the sun. It was only natural that she should believe that her daughter shared the feeling.

And then Lady Anna came in. "They wanted me to stay and dine, mamma, but I did not like to think that you should be left alone."

"I must get used to that, my dear."

"Why, mamma? Wherever we have been, we have always been together. Mrs. Bluestone was quite unhappy because you would not come. They are so good-natured! I wish you would go there."

"I am better here, my dear." Then there was a pause for a few moments. "But I am glad that you have come home this evening."

"Of course I should come home."

"I have something special to say to you."

"To me, mamma! What is it, mamma?"

"I think we will wait till after dinner. The things are here now." Go up stairs and take off your hat, and I will tell you after dinner."

"Mamma," Lady Anna said, as soon as the maid had left the room, "has old Mr. Thwaite been here?"

"Yes, my dear, he was here."

"I thought so, because you have something to tell me. It is something from him?"

"Not from himself, Anna, though he was the messenger. Come and sit here, my dear—close to me. Have you ever thought, Anna, that it would be good for you to be married?"

"No, mamma; why should I?" But that surely was a lie! How often had she thought that it would be good to be married to Daniel Thwaite and to have done with this weary searching after rank! And now what could her mother mean? Thomas Thwaite had been there, but it was impossible that her mother should think that Daniel Thwaite would be a fit husband for her daughter. "No, mamma; why should I?"

"It must be thought of, my dearest."

"Why now?" She could understand perfectly that there was some special cause for her mother's manner of speech.

"After all that we have gone through, we are about to succeed at last. They are willing to own every thing, to give us all our rights—on one condition."

"What condition, mamma?"

"Come nearer to me, dearest. It would not make you unhappy to think that you were going to be the wife of a man you could love?"

"No—not if I really loved him."

"You have heard of your cousin, the young Earl?"

"Yes, mamma; I have heard of him."

"They say that he is every thing that is good. What should you think of having him for your husband?"

"That would be impossible, mamma."

"Impossible! Why impossible? What could be more fitting? Your rank is equal to his—higher even in this, that your father was himself the Earl. In fortune you will be much more than his equal. In age you are exactly suited. Why should it be impossible?"

"Oh, mamma, it is impossible!"

"What makes you say so, Anna?"

"We have never seen each other."

"Tush! my child. Why should you not see each other?"

"And then we are his enemies."

"We are no longer enemies, dearest. They have sent to say that if we, you and I, will consent to this marriage, then will they consent to it also. It is their wish, and it comes from them. There can be no more proper ending to all this weary lawsuit. It is quite right that the title and the name should be supported. It is quite right that the fortune which your father left should, in this way, go to support your father's family. You will be the Countess Lovel; and all will have been conceded to us. There can not possibly be any fitter way out of our difficulties." Lady Anna sat looking at her mother in dismay, but could say nothing. "You need have no fear about the young man. Every one tells me that he is just the man that a mother would welcome as a husband for her daughter. Will you not be glad to see him?" But the Lady Anna would only say that it was impossible. "Why impossible, my dear? What do you mean by impossible?"

"Oh, mamma, it is impossible!"

The Countess found that she was obliged to give the subject up for that night, and could only comfort herself by endeavoring to believe that the suddenness of the tidings had confused her child.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THIS is the season of the year when dwelling-houses are most frequently brightened up with fresh paint, paper, and furniture. It is expedient to consider health as well as beauty in the refitting of our home apartments. In selecting wall-paper hangings an intelligent care should be exercised. More than fifteen years ago the evils resulting from occupying rooms decorated with paper colored with arsenic green attracted the attention of medical men in Europe. Ample evidence has been gathered to prove the danger of using these poisonous papers. Notwithstanding their character, the common arsenic colors—Schweinfurt green and Scheele's green—are largely employed in consequence of their elegance of color and low cost. The arsenical colors are the more dangerous because in their common uses they are not firmly attached to the surface of paper by means of oil or varnish, or some strongly adherent substance, but are simply mixed with size and spread upon the surface. Consequently the particles are easily detached. All green papers are not colored with arsenic, but if the shade is brilliant its presence may be suspected. Some persons are much more susceptible to poisonous influences than others; but there is no question that the occupant of a room whose walls are covered with arsenical paper-hangings is exposed to serious danger. The chemical test for arsenic green is simple, the two common pigments being arsenite of copper (Scheele's green) and aceto-arsenite of copper (Schweinfurt green). Plunge a bit of the paper or suspected article into warm aqua ammonia: a blue color will betray copper, and a drop of the blue ammoniacal liquid on a crystal of nitrate of silver will show a yellow coating if arsenic be present.

Ladies who are planning an ocean voyage should not fail to supply themselves with an abundance of warm clothing, for the weather in crossing the Atlantic will be found decidedly cool. Those who can remain on deck in the open air will be most likely to recover soonest from the almost inevitable seasickness. But a nice dress would be ruined in a day or two on deck. There is no occasion for personal adornment at sea. Warm and simple woolen garments are all that is necessary, but these are very essential.

New York is abundantly supplied with every thing edible in its season. From all quarters of the country the best and earliest fruits and vegetables are poured into this city's markets. The early garden produce has been tardy in its arrival this spring, because every where the season has been unusually backward. But now it is beginning to be brought abundantly. Bermuda potatoes, Southern green pease, asparagus, onions, rhubarb, lettuce, tomatoes, and even strawberries are every day becoming more plentiful.

The new desks and chairs to be supplied to the House of Representatives, in Washington, are made of oak, quite plain, but neat. The chairs have cane bottoms and backs, with revolving seats. The cost of them is much less than the original cost of the old desks and chairs, which have been sold at auction. This auction, by-the-way, was a rather curious performance. Many persons were desirous of obtaining a particular chair or desk for old associations connected with it. Consequently the competition was pretty lively, and the sale exceedingly productive.

The space originally fixed for the Vienna Exhibition has proved far too small, and it has been found necessary to inclose many of the courts between the transverse galleries, and exhibitors are spending much money to insure themselves adequate room for their products.

The epizootic has been prevailing to an alarming extent among the horses in San Francisco and other California cities. Government horses have suffered severely.

Rumor assures us that there will be exhibited at the Vienna Exposition an elegant dress of point de Venise—the first specimen of that kind of lace manufactured in more than a hundred years. The current story, which may interest our readers, is briefly as follows: A few years before the fall of Paris the Empress Eugénie one day discovered among some old laces which had been transferred to her as souvenirs of the Empress Josephine about a quarter of a yard of a lace flounce of most peculiar mesh and beautiful design. It was worn and yellow with age. Eugénie at once realized that it was an art treasure. She sent for M. De Lisle, lace manufacturer of Paris, showed him the lace, and requested him to reproduce it, mesh and design, in a full lace dress for herself. The manufacturer told the Empress that her remnant was real old point de Venise, the art of making which had been lost for upward of a century, and he feared it would be impossible to execute the commission. The Empress, however, requested him to spare no pains to revive the lost art. M. De Lisle took the bit of lace, and for more than a year he used every possible means to discover how to make such lace again. He sought the oldest lace-makers; not one knew the mesh. He selected the most intelligent girls among his employées—those with keenest eyes and deftest fingers—supplied them with the most powerful lenses, and a sample of the old lace; but no progress was made. M. De Lisle was about to give up the experiment, when one day came the welcome news that a young girl had discovered the old point de Venise mesh. The fortunate workwoman was appropriately rewarded, and the work begun in earnest. Eugénie visited the manufactory from time to time, exhibiting much pleasure at the restoration of a lost art to the lace-weavers. Before the dress was completed the Empress was an exile, but the delicate fabric was saved from destruction. She wrote from England that she would still take the dress if the manufacturer would be a loser by keeping it. The manufacturing company, touched by the misfortunes of Eugénie, agreed to release her from the engagement. Such is the romantic story of the lace dress which will be exhibited at Vienna.

Cincinnati is in a fair way to become a musical city. A few days ago fifteen hundred singing birds of different varieties, imported from Germany, were let loose in the suburbs of the city. It is hoped that many of them will become domesticated in this country.

The quibbles of law are unending, and often a disgrace to common-sense. Not long since a man was tried in the criminal court of Baltimore for embezzlement and larceny to the extent of $1500. The defendant's counsel demurred to the indictment on the ground that the word "fraudently" was used in the indictment for "fraudulently." The point was argued at length, and numerous authorities cited on both sides. The defendant's counsel cited acts of the British Parliament in force in Maryland, requiring all indictments to be in the English language, and contended that the word used was unknown to the language, and that it was not a clerical error. What a curious and wonderful thing is the science of law! And what a vast deal of ingenuity is necessary to make a "successful lawyer!"

People often complain of a weak and weary feeling during the spring months. "Tonics" and "bitters" are resorted to as a remedy; whereas, in a majority of cases, a little hygienic treatment, without medicine, would bring the system into its normal condition. An abundance of fresh air and exercise is of the utmost importance. And then in spring we usually eat the wrong kind of food, and too much of it. The hearty meats and rich, heating articles of diet which help to fortify the system against the winter's cold should be laid aside, or at least sensibly lessened in quantity, as the warm weather approaches. The diminished appetite is not a cause of alarm; a light, spare diet of early vegetables, fruits, and articles commonly considered "cooling" is the best. But if too much animal heat is generated by the food, the weary spring feeling increases, and illness is scarcely escaped.

The Empress of Russia, accompanied by her daughter the Grand Duchess Marie Alexandrowna, her son the Grand Duke Vladimir, the Duke of Hesse, and a numerous suite, has recently gone to Naples. The Hotel Tramontano has been transformed into little short of a royal palace, and fitted up with elegance and good taste for the illustrious visitors. The rooms of the Empress are furnished with pale blue silk, and those of the Grand Duchess with pale pink. The dining-room is furnished in dark maroon velvet and gold. A smoking-room is very tastily arranged with colored lamps and handsome ottomans. The garden has been most beautifully laid out, and a handsome walk made from the Hotel Tramontano to the Villa Nardi. One hundred and twenty rooms will be occupied in both hotels, and the suite exceeds eighty persons. The Hotel Tramontano is surrounded by a garden of orange, palm, lemon, almond, and rose trees, which slopes down toward the sea, where the imperial yacht, a veritable bijou, is now floating. From the balcony of her Majesty's bedroom the eye overlooks the whole magnificent panorama of the Bay of Naples. The Empress has brought not only her cooks, but a baker, who makes her bread with a mixture of Hungarian and French flour, and a special oven has been prepared. For excursions to the environs a troop of donkeys, brought from the East, is kept in readiness.

We have not tried it ourselves, but are very willing our readers should do so—this "recipe for drowsiness:" Take a common onion, cut through the middle, and place it in close contact with the eyes. Some involuntary tears are, of course, produced by this process, but it leaves the eyeballs refreshed, and dispels the soporific heaviness.

Statistics show that the trade in sponges increases every year. The demand for them is so great, and the submarine fields where they grow are every year so thoroughly cleared, that it is feared their reproduction will soon cease to be adequate. This singular substance, which is simply a cellular fibrous tissue produced by minute creatures known as polypi, is found chiefly in the Grecian Archipelago and along the shores of Syria. Sponge-fishing is carried on from June to October, though July and August are the most favorable months. Sponges of inferior qualities are gathered in shallow waters, being torn from their native rocks by means of harpoons. The finer kinds are only found at a depth of twenty or thirty fathoms, and are carefully detached from the rocks by divers. There are many varieties of this article.

A new luxury has been introduced into England by French sailors—namely, garden snails, which are publicly sold, and pronounced a delicacy by certain epicures. Every one to his taste—snails may be good, as well as frogs.

A little black-and-tan terrier of Lafayette, Indiana, by too constant association with the human race, has sunk to the depths of canine degradation. He has become addicted to habitual intoxication, and staggers about the street a disgrace to his kind.

Holyoke, Massachusetts, has grown suddenly into a city of over 14,000 inhabitants. The grand foundation of this growth and prosperity is its splendid water-power.

We do not know how long robins usually live; but there is a lady in Maine who has a robin which has been in her house for sixteen years, and he is now apparently as brisk as ever, and sings as sweetly as ever he did.

Ladies' Dress Caps, Figs. 1-5.

Fig. 1.—BLACK TULLE AND LACE DRESS CAP FOR ELDERLY LADY. This cap of figured black tulle is trimmed with black lace two inches wide, loops and ends of watered ribbon an inch and a quarter wide, and agrafes of black satin beads. Arrange the cap on a foundation of black stiff lace as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 2.—SILK TULLE AND PINK SILK RIBBON DRESS CAP. This cap is arranged on a stiff lace foundation of white figured silk tulle and white blonde an inch and two inches wide. Loops and ends of pink silk ribbon two inches and three-quarters wide trim the cap as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 3.—SILK TULLE AND LACE DRESS CAP. This cap is made of white figured silk tulle. The trimming consists of white blonde an inch and seven-eighths wide, black lace an inch and a quarter wide, loops and ends of black velvet ribbon two inches wide, and rosettes and ends of green gros grain ribbon an inch and a quarter and two inches and a half wide. Arrange the cap on a stiff lace foundation as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 4.—BLACK TULLE AND LACE DRESS CAP FOR ELDERLY LADY. This cap is made of figured black tulle, and is trimmed with a box-pleated ruche of the material, black lace an inch wide, bows of velvet ribbon three inches and a half wide, jet grelots, and a jet agrafe. The veil, which falls low in the back, is joined with scarfs, which are tied in front.

Fig. 5.—TULLE AND LACE DRESS CAP FOR ELDERLY LADY. This cap is made of white and black silk tulle. The trimming consists of white blonde insertion an inch and a quarter wide, white blonde an inch and a half wide, black lace seven-eighths of an inch and two inches wide, and loops and ends of purple silk ribbon an inch and a quarter and two inches and three-quarters wide. Strings of similar ribbon. To make the cap cut of black tulle and lustring lining one piece each from Figs. 39 and 40, Supplement. Pleat the crown as indicated on the pattern, join it with the front according to the corresponding figures, and on the back edge, on the wrong side, set a strip of silk half an inch wide for the shirr. Into this shirr is fastened a piece of elastic ribbon. Bind the outer edge of the front narrow. Trim the front edge of the cap, as shown by the illustration, with a box-pleated ruffle of white tulle seven-eighths of an inch wide trimmed with blonde, and a similar ruffle an inch and three-quarters wide, and with a black tulle ruffle an inch and seven-eighths wide edged with narrow lace. Between the ruffles set loops and ends of the narrow silk ribbon and of black velvet ribbon an inch wide. Cut of white tulle one piece from Fig. 41, Supplement, and edge it with insertion and lace. Lay this piece in a fold along the dotted line, so that the straight lines come on each other, and gather the double material along the straight lines to a length of eight inches. This forms a puff. Pleat the upper edge of this piece, and sew it on the cap as shown by the illustration. For the upper veil cut of black tulle one piece from Fig. 42, Supplement. Having edged this piece with the wide black lace, cut a slit along the double line, and fasten this piece also on the crown of the cap. Draw the puff of the lower veil through the slit of Fig. 42. Finish with the remainder of the trimming and the strings.

TORTOISE-SHELL.

THE animal which produces this beautiful substance is a marine tortoise, called the hawk's-bill turtle, which is found in the following localities, viz., Manilla, Singapore (these two places produce the finest shell), West Indies, Honduras, Calcutta, Bombay, and throughout the Indian Archipelago. The covering of the tortoise consists of thirteen principal plates of a horny substance, overlapping each other at the edges, each layer being deposited annually, and each extending a little beyond the previous one. Some of the tortoise-shells are colored in very dark brown tints, running into black, and interspersed with light gold-colored dashes and marks; these are considered the best. Others are lighter, even to pale red-browns, yellow, and white; the last are not valued; the yellow are used for covering the works of musical boxes, and the light red and brown shells are manufactured into ladies' combs for exportation to Spain, where they obtain double the price of those made of the darker-colored tortoise-shell.

Of all reptiles the sea-tortoise is the most useful to man. In countries where they are common their flesh is esteemed the most healthy and nourishing food, and their carapace, or back-piece, serves as a canoe, in which the natives paddle along the shores. They even roof their huts with them; they convert them into drinking troughs for their cattle, and into baths for their children.

The eggs of all the tortoises are greatly sought after. The females are commonly caught when they go upon land to lay their eggs, their captors turning them upon their backs, when they become quite helpless, and are easily dragged away by means of ropes. They are also harpooned when sleeping on the surface of the water; and in the South Seas divers watch them when floating, and by plunging into the water and rising beneath them are enabled to attach ropes to their fins, and thus secure them. But in China a most extraordinary method of taking them is common among the fishermen.—They have a species of remora, or sucker-fish, to which they attach a strong cord, and keep for service in tubs in their boats. When a tortoise is discovered the remora is placed in the water, and on perceiving the reptile, swims directly toward it, and by means of its peculiar mechanism attaches itself firmly to the shell. The remora and its unwieldy prey are then hauled in together.

The first turtle was brought to London in 1752, and turtle soup may, therefore, be considered quite a modern dish. The hawk's-bill turtle feeds on marine plants, on mollusks, and small fishes, and is chiefly sought after for its shell. Its flesh is rendered unpalatable by its musky flavor, but its eggs, on the contrary, are excellent when fresh. Marine tortoises are the largest of their species. They swim and dive with great facility, and can remain long under water. Some of the species seek the shore at night, when they frequent the banks of desert and solitary isles, where they browse on marine plants. Although they walk with difficulty, and even with pain, in quiet seas they may be seen floating like a boat, in absolute immobility, and asleep on the surface of the water. They possess not only affection for their own species, but, in the case of the females, for certain localities. These, accompanied by the males, frequently resort, year after year, almost to a day, to the sandy shore of some desert isle, where they drag themselves ashore during the night, sufficiently inland to be safe from the tide. In some such spot, using their hind-feet by way of a shovel, they excavate holes about thirty inches deep. Here they lay frequently a hundred eggs, covering them up afterward with the fine sand, leveling the surface, and then returning to sea, leaving the eggs to be hatched by the solar rays. From the high temperature communicated to the sand-bank, they are hatched in about fifteen days. The female seems to have two or three layings in the season, at intervals of two or three weeks. When the young turtles are hatched they are feeble, white, and about the size of frogs, and their instinct leads them at once to the sea. Under the fostering care of their mother, those which have escaped the birds of prey on their way to the sea and the fishes lying in wait for them rapidly develop, and attain, under favorable circumstances, an enormous size, some of them having been known to reach the weight of eighteen hundred pounds, with a circumference of fifteen feet and a length of seven feet. The value of the shell of the tortoise is often deteriorated from the fact of barnacles, limpets, and other shell-fish adhering to it when alive, and preventing its proper growth and coloring on the spots where these attach themselves.

Among the Romans of the Augustan age the taste for the employment of tortoise-shell in ornamentation was not so much a fashion as a fury. It was used for inlaying tables, cabinets, and other articles; the frames of the couches on which the Romans reclined at table were covered with the largest and most beautiful plates of it that could be found; in fact, it was used wherever it could be to beautify and adorn. There is, however, no record of this people having employed it as a material for combs. It was brought by Indian and Arabian traders from the islands in the Indian Sea to Adulis, in Abyssinia, together with ivory, rhinoceros horns, and hippopotamus hides. Here it was purchased by Egyptian merchants, was transmitted to Alexandria, and thence passed to Rome and the other great cities of the empire.

In the Great Exhibition in London in 1851 some remarkably fine specimens of tortoise-shell were exhibited from Ceylon, from Labuan, and from Trinidad; but by far the most and the finest quality came from Manilla. The method adopted for detaching the tortoise-shell from the bone is to place the shell over a fire, when the expansive power of the heat soon causes the plates to start away from the bone, the separation being assisted by a thin knife. The preparation of tortoise-shell for the purpose of the manufacture is similar to that of horn. It is first softened in boiling water, but with great care, as too much boiling destroys the beauty of the colors. Tortoise-shell possesses the valuable property of welding. Pieces of shell can be perfectly united by scraping and thinning down their edges, and then overlapping these edges, and fixing the shell in a screw-press. The press is put into boiling water, and tightened from time to time. In this way, in the course of a few hours, and without injury to the colors of the shell, the joining is effected. In making tortoise-shell combs—a very important manufacture—machinery is used through which the valuable material is economized by cutting two sets of teeth at the same time. Economy is also observed in making frames for eyeglasses. Instead of cutting these out of a flat piece of shell, thus wasting the refuse, a thin strip is cut, and two slits of the proper size made in it with a thin saw. The shell being then softened by heat, these slits are pulled out into circular holes to receive the glasses, and are then finished and fashioned to the appropriate form. The groove for the edge of the glass is cut with a small circular cutter, about half an inch in diameter, and the glass is slipped in when the frame is expanded by heat.

Tortoise-shell boxes and other moulded articles are largely made, and require the use of a press, moulds, etc. The process of moulding is effected while the shell is immersed in boiling water, when it readily assumes the form of the dies used: the work is finally completed by means of the turning-lathe. Sometimes the shell is shaved and filed thin, and then the different pieces required are welded together by using hot tongs. The fragments of shell which are the refuse of this manipulation are welded together in the manner described, and made into inferior articles; while even the fine dust and filings, being treated with boiling water, may be moulded and pressed into desired shapes; but they are opaque and brittle. Tortoise-shell has been manufactured into hollow walking-sticks; and there is in the British Museum a tortoise-shell bonnet, made in Navigator's Island, and presented by her Majesty the Queen.

Inlayings of mother-of-pearl, gold, silver, etc., on the tortoise-shell, are made by pressing the inlayings into the substance of the shell, and while still under pressure, plunging the whole into cold water. Ear-rings and other ornaments are moulded; napkin-rings are welded. The shell is capable of receiving the very finest polish, and is frequently treated with rich colors, mixed in fish glue, which artificially enhance the brilliancy of the shell. Tortoise-shell is commonly imitated, and sometimes very successfully. Still it requires very little discernment or experience to detect the counterfeit.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

The Butcher Baronet.—Aliases of the Great.—Wilkie Collins a Dictator.

A YOUNG gentleman at a certain aristocratic club, endeavoring, last autumn, to make himself agreeable to a famous old sporting nobleman, observed, "I suppose your lordship will soon be thinking about fox-hunting?" "Sir," was the uncompromising reply, "I never think of any thing else."

The same answer could now be given by all the gossips in turn respecting the new trial of "the claimant" for perjury, which has just begun. They are thinking, or, at all events, talking, of nothing else. The proceedings, indeed, are likely to be much more exciting than in the former case, since the object of the prosecution will be no longer to show that this fellow is not the lost baronet, but to prove that he is the butcher of Wapping. His brother-in-law and one of his sisters are said to be among the witnesses to this effect. A great panic, as was natural, seized upon all who were liable to be impaneled on a jury whose sittings might last from April to August. On the last occasion those who were called upon to serve adopted the most ingenious devices to evade the infliction. One man sent all his servants out of town, shut up his house, and presented to the view of the summoning officer a charwoman only, who "knowed nothink about master except that he was gone abroad;" and now the poor jurors were still less willing to enter on so protracted an ordeal. Nevertheless the threat that all who should absent themselves would be fined £5 the first day, £50 the next day, £500 the third day, and so on, had marvelous effect in bringing the whole twelve into their places, and at the appointed hour the great trial began. You will doubtless have an opportunity of perusing it for yourselves, but of the "points" already made by the counsel for the prosecution (Mr. Hawkins) I may mention these, the telling character of which was received by the whole audience—usually so silent and undemonstrative—with "roars of laughter:"

I. In Mr. Arthur Orton's own pocket-book was found this remarkable reflection, as singularly out of character with Roger Tichborne, the young cavalry officer, as it is appropriate to one who was about to play for a great stroke with loaded dice, but under every element of suspicion: "Some men has plenty brains and no money, some has plenty money and no brains—surely the men as has plenty money and no brains are made for the men as has plenty of brains and no money.....These are the sentiments," he adds, "of Rodger Tichborne, baronet," the Roger being spelled with a d, as the real Roger never spelled it. At other times this gentleman spells his surname with an additional t—Titchborne. Only second in absurdity to not knowing one's own name is the not knowing one's mother's; yet this ludicrously stout butcher jumps to the conclusion that Lady H. F. Tichborne must needs be Lady Hannah Francis, and addresses her as such; and when corrected by a fellow-conspirator in England, who unhappily writes her real name to him instead of pronouncing it verbally, he calls her (being ignorant of that language with which the real Roger was more familiar for twelve years than his own) Henriette Feliçite, instead of Felicité.

II. He had been married under the name of Le Castro in a Wesleyan chapel, but as soon as he resolved to "go for" the missing baronet he proceeds to join the Roman Catholic religion by the easy process of being remarried in a Catholic chapel in the name of Titchborne (with a t), and of writing to his "dearest mamma, may the blessed Maria have mercy on your soul!"

III. When, disappointed of getting money out of Lady Tichborne in Australia—from which he had never meant to budge—he ventures to come to England, instead of seeking his presumed relatives, the Seymours or the Radcliffes, he hurries to the only house he was in reality familiar with, No. 69 High Street, Wapping. "Whose house was that?" inquires one of the three judges on the bench. "The house of the late George Orton, the butcher," replies the counsel.

There are tens of thousands of fools who still believe in this fat villain, but I may truly say not a single man of any intelligence, unless he has pecuniary reasons for so doing. For once, too, "the men as has no brains" have also no money, or next to none, and it is said that the £500 paid to Dr. Kenealy, who is counsel for the accused, has cleared the so-called Tichborne Defense Fund to its last dregs.

There has been a great endeavor of late among art circles to form a Phillip collection, and every one who possesses one of that painter's works has been importuned to send it for exhibition to the public. One old lady alone refused to let her "Phillip" leave her own walls, and since it was a very famous example of the artist's style, there was great "pressure" put upon the owner. At last the Prince of Wales himself was besought to write to her, which he accordingly did in his own hand, and signed the letter as usual, Albert Edward. In reply to this the resolute old dame is said to have expressed herself as being astonished at his impudence, which it is likely enough she really was, since she addressed her communication to Albert Edward, Esq., Marlborough House, to the said Albert Edward's extreme amusement and delight. I remember Du Chaillu, the gorilla man, making the like mistake in the case of the Archbishop of York, whose invitation to breakfast he somewhat brusquely declined upon the ground of not enjoying the personal acquaintance of Mr. Ebor. In America every man who is not in difficulties with the police is known, I suppose, by a single name, which must be a great convenience; but here our Duke of Cambridge (when he does me the honor to ask me to dine in a friendly way) is only "George," and the Bishop of Oxford (though, by-the-bye, he has never asked me), Oxon.

Next fall, as you are probably aware, Mr. Wilkie Collins will pay you a visit, provided that his health admits of it; and I have the pleasure to tell you that I saw him yesterday, looking well and hearty. He has, however, been a great sufferer from, I believe, rheumatic gout. At one time it affected his eyesight, and the indomitable man, "with the presses thundering behind him" as usual, had therefore to dictate his serial story to an amanuensis. You would not have imagined that any portion of that enthralling book, the Moonstone, had been composed under such depressing circumstances, yet so it was. He found that grown-up persons interested themselves too much in what they had to set down: they expressed approbation, or even ventured upon criticism (fancy criticising an author with the gout!); so in the end he employed a child, who, of course, did not trouble him in that way. Perhaps some day you may hear, among the absurd reports that fly about concerning books and authors, that the Moonstone was written by a girl of ten years old, and, if so, you may confirm it.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

ROSY'S WEDDING PORTION.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

SHE stood at the gate, with her hat on the back of her neck and the morning sun streaming over her bare bright head, while she spoke with the young man who leaned across the rail and gazed at her out of a pair of earnest brown eyes. In one hand she held the broken rose and spout of an old watering-pot that she had just carelessly picked up, and neither she nor the father and mother who gazed at her from the little sweet-brier-draped veranda knew that she held in her hand the greater part of her wedding portion.

"Let him have my little clover blossom?" cried the father, angrily. "Not by a long shot! Have I been rearing her this twenty years to throw her over the fence at last?"

"But, father—"

"No, mother, that will do. Mr. Monteith may be a part of the solid earth, for all I know—you women seem to think so. But I'll send him flying higher than Gilderoy's kite if he asks me for Rosy Mayne!"

"But, father—" the timid voice began again.

"There, that will do, mother, I say. See her down at the gate now." And the dutiful wife turned her head to look at the pretty maiden, tall and slender and well-shaped, and with a face than whose wonderful colors, so pellucid, so rich, so changing, Aurora herself could have none fairer or brighter—a face whose brilliant hazel eyes accented all the colors with their clear lustre, and the fine and flying hair about which was of that marvelous tint which is neither chestnut nor red, but has something of the shadow of the first, something of the splendor of the last. "Look at her," said the father. "I can't believe a thing so fine as that is any of mine. She's you all over again when I courted you. And I'm sure she shall be none of his! Am I going to give that girl to a ragamuffin of an inventor to go and starve in a city lodging, do you think? Why, she has taken the prize for bread at every fair the country round; her cheese is the best; her butter is the best; her darning is the—"

"Then I'm sure, father, she's all the better prepared to marry a poor man."

"Well, she's not going to do it!" said the farmer, sharply. "The man that marries my Rosy is a man that I shall be satisfied knows how to take care of her. He shall be able to plow a straight furrow, to drain a field, to lay out a farm."

"But, father," persisted the audacious wife, "you know yourself that it's a hard life, and there are other things just as good as farming; and if so be he can—"

"There, there, there!" answered Mr. Mayne. "Not another word. There's an end of it. Don't talk to me, either, of what was done over to the Beach. George Rives would done it if he hadn't. I'm sorry I ever let him come here, idling away the summer in our best room, building coffer-dams down in my brook, and making love to my girl; and to-morrow I'll send him packing! I'm going over to get George Rives to help me a spell, I guess, anyhow—and maybe that 'll put this folly out of her head. I don't know why you don't like George. I do. And he has more land than any two in the township."

"I'd rather she'd die an old maid!"

"Well, I hadn't. And now about that hanged old churn of yours—what is it you want? The hoop fixed on the bottom? Roll it out, then, and we'll see what can be done. It's a strange thing that in all these years none of you women that have been churning your heads and shoulders off can find any better way to bring the butter than this!"

"Oh yes, father, I have made enough for Mr. Monteith's breakfast many a time, fresh, with a bowl and spoon. He told me how to do it himself—just whip the wind into it."

"Whip the nonsense into it!" said Mr. Mayne. "Great he knows about butter-making! Get us the hammer, Mrs. Mayne, and a shingle-nail or two. Strange a woman can't drive a nail without mashing her thumb!" And perhaps good Mrs. Mayne was not altogether displeased when, a minute or two afterward, she saw her liege lord sucking his index finger as if it were a piece of sugar-cane.

They were standing, as it was said, on the veranda that ran along the shady side of the house, where Mrs. Mayne and Rosy were wont to do their churning. It was here that, one fine morning, when the spring was opening and the lilacs were in bud, four or five months ago, a strong and pleasant face appeared through the lattice, and a stranger asked if Mrs. Mayne would take a summer boarder. The farmer was away on a jury; and Mrs. Mayne, looking at the stranger, and thinking of her empty room and of the added money, rolling her hands into her apron and rolling them out again, thinking she liked his face, thinking there was that half-melancholy something in it that she had noticed in the dumb creatures, as of a soul struggling with its expression, finally decided in the affirmative; and the stranger had said his name was Rodney Monteith, and the minister knew him; and he had taken his knapsack and himself up stairs and into her front-room.

The minister did know him; he had paid his board regularly; she had grown fond of his still, grave ways; and when Farmer Mayne came home he found his wife and daughter watching the new-comer build some strange contrivance for the model of an improved lifting lock down at the falls of the brook; and he grumbled the rest of the summer.

But Mrs. Mayne and Rosy had no thought of grumbling. To Mrs. Mayne her lodger was a superior being, who knew more than the minister; and to Rosy—he was a lover. The handsome, stately girl, who knew how to behave like a witch with all her stateliness, could have told the exact moment in which she took her place, with cogs and wheels and screws, in the phantasmagoria of his dreams, and she had at first a mischievous delight in making him feel her power.

She was aware, certainly, that there was a charming quality in his gentle and deferential manner which assumed that she knew every thing of which she was ignorant—was aware, too, that beside her ignorance he was learning's self; but he seemed to her so dreamy and far away, seemed to live in such a remote region from every day, that she said to herself she would as soon think of falling in love, in return, with one of the town paupers as with Rodney Monteith, and, indeed, there would be no great difference between the two if she did, she said, for he was no more fit to take care of himself than a child; and under that conviction she immediately took his well-worn wardrobe under her protection, piece by piece, and in his absence, till she had it in complete order, and he never any the wiser. But as Rosy darned and patched in that superior manner of which her father was so proud, and which had taken so many prizes at so many fairs, she could not but feel that she was at work on the garments of a gentleman, and there dawned upon her a sense of her supreme silliness in laughing at the absent-minded ways of a man who stood as much above her as the hills that lift their heads among the stars of God are above the plains.

But for all that she was a woman, and could not help coquetting with him a little. She had to put on her new print, and make herself ravishing with apple blossoms; and then when she had completed the work of enchantment, go to walk with George Rives along the banks of the brook, where he lay studying out the faults of his design, and appear to forget his existence in her interest concerning George Rives's. Sometimes, though, she would walk over the fields to church with Mr. Monteith himself of a Sunday, and she could remember for years, as if it were yesterday, how softly the distant bells sounded, and how sweet the wind came across the grass, as they walked side by side; and when she heard his voice in the hymn, a deep and powerful bass, she forgot dress and lovers, and every thing else, and her soul seemed lost in that rich sound, like a leaf floating on a stream.

"You are a complex little being, Rosy," he said, one day. "Sometimes you seem to me a spirit just ready to take flight, and presently I see that you are a part of the earth itself."

"What did you think I was?" answered Rosy. "Did you suppose I wasn't as common clay as the rest? You thought I was of the earth earthy when I gave the rose to George Rives. But you knew before that I was a child of the soil!" And then she tossed a rose to him.

She found the rose years afterward shut away in an old analytical geometry, and he found her crying over it.

One day, at length, when Rosy, to the top of her bent, was playing her part as queen of hearts, and enjoying the tortures of her knaves, there came the great parish excursion to the Beach, some half dozen miles distant, an annual gathering of all the country-side; and mighty were the preparations for the lunch-baskets, and of course it was not to be thought of that Mrs. Mayne's hampers should not exceed all the rest. And when the appointed morning dawned in warmest sunshine, the hay-carts loaded with laughter and beauty, and the old wagons with age and sobriety and viands, all trundled down to the sands together, and the great sea was greeted with a free translation of the old Greek shout. "There she is!" said the senior Mr. Rives. "The tarnal critter! Lying out-doors all night, and singing to herself, and ready to crush the bones of the first man she lays hands on!" Then the parties dispersed themselves: the children tended the fires with drift-wood and dry weed; the matrons made the chowder; the lovers sat among the sand-hills. There were races and games and strollings on the shore, and when the half-tide came at sunset there was bathing.

Mr. Monteith sat some way out on a low ledge of rocks by himself, watching the tide play in and out among the purple fissures and turn a tiny wheel he had whittled from a chip and set up there; and he did not appear to take much interest in the human part of the scene till Rosy Mayne came dancing along among the lads and lasses who were going in, and with her bare white feet, her streaming hair, her laughing face, and her pretty bathing dress, looking lovelier than any sea-nymph that ever swam, he thought, joining hands and running boldly down to the edge of the creaming wave. "Rosy!" cried Mr. Monteith, "this under-tow is too strong for any of your daring pranks; there's nothing but a shark can swim in it." But Rosy did not choose to hear, and Mr. Monteith deliberately took off his shoes and coat, and watched her. And not a moment too soon, for all at once her head had disappeared; she had gone down, had risen again with a great cry, and then, as if a giant hand had reached and snatched her out to sea while the others scrambled up the shore, there was nothing of her to be seen but her floating hair away out on the farther crest of the surf.

But at the first cry there had been a bound through the air of the figure on the ledge of rocks, and Mr. Monteith was after her. So strong was the under-tow that it seemed but a moment to those who waited breathless on the beach before he had reached and grasped her. But then came the dreadful struggle for the shore. He had the girl on his shoulders, and he fought his best, but twice he was beaten off. The third time he caught the rope the others had waded far out to throw him, succeeded in getting it about them both, and was dragged to shore with her at last more dead than alive.

Of course they did not wait for any night fires or dancing on the beach after this; but as soon as the half-drowned people could be dried and warmed the horses were put in, George Rives cursing his luck as he buckled straps and girth, Mr. Mayne pushing him about as if he were a worthless little boy, and crying and swearing between whiles, crying for Rosy's sake and swearing for George's, and the whole party hurried on their homeward way. And it would be hard to say how badly Rosy behaved that night as they went along. Perhaps she felt a chain tightening round her, and rebelled. "If you want me to prevent your flinging yourself out of the hay-cart, Rosy," Mr. Monteith said at last, "you must come on this side." And then for the first time she saw that the great waves from which he had saved her, in their white and foaming onslaught on the sands and ledges, had broken his arm. But she did not say a word. She only began to sing the gayest and sweetest songs she could remember, though she knew he must be nearly fainting with the pain. But as soon as the hay-cart stopped at the lower gate she sprang out, and ran up the garden and round the yard to the barn, and had thrown the saddle on the filly in the moonlight, and without waiting for help, and was galloping for the doctor as fast as the filly could carry her. "Oh! oh!" said she that night, as her tired mother slept soundly in the arm-chair, and she herself sat wetting the cool bandages on the aching arm. "To think that it was hurt so for me!"

"Rosy," said Mr. Monteith, smiling through his pain, "that arm is always for you." And Rosy laid her face down beside it and cried.

"Is this the way you're keeping off fever, Rosy?" cried her mother, waking opportunely. "You go right away to bed this moment!" And Rosy went.

It was a strange accident, but it so happened that Rosy was not once again alone with the lover who had broken his arm for her until he was well enough to come down stairs. Mrs. Mayne, of course, was on the spot whenever she was wanted, and so was the hired girl, while Farmer Mayne developed the most surprising capability as a nurse. In vain Mr. Monteith assured him he needed nobody. You would have said, to see the farmer's assiduity, that he was in a hurry to get the man well again and out of the house. He read his weekly paper in the lodger's room, and he took his noonday siesta by the bedside, where he snored so fearfully as to drive away all the flies. But if Love laughs at locksmiths, why should he be less merry at Farmer Mayne's expense? The man was certainly ludicrous enough as he kept guard there, with his eyes shut and his mouth open, for Love or any one else to laugh at. But Mr. Monteith never thought of laughing at him; he was Rosy's father, and an awful and sacred being to him, for all his roughness and uncouthness—a sort of arbiter of fate.

But one day the jailer awoke to find that his bird had flown, and starting up, his first glance out of the window showed him Mr. Monteith sitting by Rosy on the brook-side—and the farmer knew that the mischief was done. For when you see arms intertwined and lips meeting, you may generally decide that your interference is of no further avail, all the more when, as in this case, one arm is in a sling, and Love has called in Pity.

It was nearly a month from that day, and now Mrs. Mayne had gone over to the enemy—not having a great distance to go, to be sure—and the farmer had been fighting a hard fight. "Not," said he, with more or less frequency, "that I have any objections to the man, if he didn't want to marry my Rosy. But my Rosy is for his betters! It beats all, the trouble such a girl can make. Now if she was one-eyed, and whopper-jawed, and lazy, and no good to any body, not a soul would want her; but being just a pearl, of course every body's after her! Before she grew up we were happy enough; and now, mother, we're all the time disputing. Give woe to man, and he has woman!" And so the farmer had turned off this morning, as always before, with something between a sigh and an oath, that relieved his feelings in every direction. But Mrs. Mayne had detained him in order that he might mend her ancient churn while she urged an argument for the lovers—an argument, as we have seen, pooh-poohed and silenced by the desired listener at the beginning. It was, nevertheless, an entering wedge, and the indulgent mother felt that so much might be followed by more, and had some potent points to bring forward at the time that the hammer came down with such withering effect on the farmer's forefinger, and we left him engaged in macerating the wound on primitive principles.

It was while he was occupied in this soothing manner that, glancing up ferociously, he saw Mr. Monteith and Rosy approaching hand in hand. It was like shaking a red rag before the old short horn: the farmer was infuriated. He waited till they were close upon him, and then, "Drop my girl's hand!" he roared, shaking his mashed finger threateningly in the air.

Instead of dropping it, the lover drew Rosy's hand all the more closely into his own. "Mr. Mayne," said he, "that is what I should be very foolish to do, when I came to ask you to give me the hand."

"Give you the hand!" cried the farmer. "Haven't you got it?" And he paused a moment, too indignant to find fit words to characterize his indignation, and forgetting all about his old threat concerning Gilderoy's kite; and Mr. Monteith took advantage of the opportunity.

"I know, Sir," said he, "that I don't deserve her, and that nobody can deserve her. But with my character you are acquainted. And as for my means, I have already a small capital, and I have confidence in my ability to take care of her suitably. For the rest, I am sure that I can make her happy—"

"You are sure that you can make her happy!" cried the wicked farmer, mimicking his tone, and letting his hammer fall on the refractory nail in the churn hoop as if he wished it were Rodney Monteith's head. "Look here, young man," he exclaimed, after a few moments of vicious hammering, and giving the finishing tap to the hoop, "when you can make a churn that will bring the butter in half the time that this churn does, you may have my Rosy, and not a minute before. And as I judge that's an impossibility, you may take it for your answer."

"Let me see," said Mr. Monteith, coolly, leaning against the corner of the veranda as he spoke, and still keeping Rosy's hand. "These are the terms, if I understand you: when I can make a churn that will bring the butter in half the time that this churn does, I may have your Rosy, and not a minute before. May I have her a minute after?"

"As many minutes as you please," said the farmer, with sardonic grimness, though a little puzzled by the cool reception of his presumably emphatic negative.

"Not many, then, Mr. Mayne. Rosy, this is our wedding-day!" And to the angry beholder's dismay, he drew the blushing, laughing girl within the clasp of his sound arm and kissed her before her father's face. "Shall not a man do as he will with his own?" he asked of the amazed parent. "You have given Rosy to me, Mr. Mayne!"

The farmer did not answer another syllable, but turned his broad back upon the pair, and to all appearance gave his whole soul to the starting nails in the lattice-work.

"Mrs. Mayne," said the lover, "how long does it take to bring the butter with this churn, may I ask?"

"Just thirty minutes, Sir."

"Very well; when you are ready, blow the horn, if you please. I shall be down at the brook. I will bring you as much butter in a quarter of the time. Let me have a gallon of cream in the stone crock."

"In the crock? Do you want to smash it?" cried the wondering woman.

"Not a bit. I want to fill it with butter."

"You shall have it, Mr. Monteith; as good sweet cream—"

"Mother!" cried the farmer.

"Now, Mr. Mayne!" said his wife. "I'm not one of those that want to call down a plague by copying the Egyptians, and I sha'n't set any body to making bricks without straw."

"In the fairy stories that I have read, Mr. Mayne," said Monteith, laughing, "although there was always a fairy godmother to step in in the nick of time, the victim was never set to spin gold without straw."

"And the man that's working for my daughter must have his tools!" declared Mrs. Mayne, as a finality.

"Oh, that's right," said the farmer. "Do all you can to help throw her away!"

"You'll be on hand to time us, Mr. Mayne?" said the determined lover.

"I'll time you with a vengeance!" cried the farmer, with a bitter sort of grin—for he already enjoyed the defeat of the rash man who was going to bring butter sooner than his wife could. And as for Rosy, she ran away to roll up the sleeves from her dimpled arms, to wash her hands, and to have a good cry.

But when the horn blew, Mr. Monteith was seen coming up from the brook with two old pieces of tin that he had been cleaning and polishing down there: one of these pieces was the bottom of a tin steamer that had been torn off long ago, and through whose centre he had punched a larger hole than any already there; the other was that spout and rose of a watering-pot which Rosy had been idly holding in her hand. The farmer, sitting on a high three-legged stool, looked on with a comfortable sense of satire. "He has come up like those old heathen who supposed they would frighten off their enemies by the flashing of tin-ware and the beating of stones," he thought. "That's no way to make butter, though, and the beggar ain't going to get my Rosy. You won't kill Goliath with a pebble this time, young Sir!"

Mrs. Mayne had set out the crock of cream, and Rosy stood by, grave and pale, having had her cry out; for though she knew her father was a man of his word, and would not attempt to gainsay it if Mr. Monteith were successful, yet for the life of her she could not see how butter was to be made with two old pieces of broken tin. She would have been glad to hang weights on her mother's arms, but Mrs. Mayne would certainly have shaken them off, for she knew there was some reason in her husband's objections, and having given the contestant fair play, she meant that he should earn his prize if he had it; and Mr. Mayne himself would as soon have looked for snow in August as for his wife to palter or deceive in any matter.

"Rosy, bring me the bellows from the best room," said Mr. Monteith, calmly. And when she came back with that implement he had passed the broken spout of the watering-pot through the hole punched in the centre of the torn steamer, had fitted a little rubber tube, which he produced from his pocket, on one end of the spout, and taking the bellows, he secured the other end of the rubber over the nozzle there. "Are you ready, Mrs. Mayne?' he said. "Your watch, Sir," to the farmer; and the latter solemnly took out his great silver dial that was almost big enough for a hall clock. And then as Mrs. Mayne lifted her dasher, Mr. Monteith gently put the inverted rose of the watering-pot's spout down through his cream to the bottom of the crock, fitted the piece of the old steamer to the top of the crock, and with the first movement of Mrs. Mayne's arms he opened and closed his bellows, sent the outer air into the cream through the spout and its rose, and out again through the holes of the broken steamer, and continued to open and close the bellows so, without a word, for the space of seven minutes. "Has your butter come, Mrs. Mayne?" he asked then.

"My butter come!" she cried. "What should make you ask such a ridiculous question? It never came in its life under thirty minutes, I told you!"

"Mine has," said Mr. Monteith. And Mrs. Mayne dropped her dasher in amazement, and despite of her wishes and expectations, as he opened the crock, and Rosy lifted out great handfuls of the firm, sweet butter, ready to be worked and salted.

"I'll be—" But on second thoughts I will not repeat what the farmer said. It made Mrs. Mayne's hair stand on end, as that sort of conversation usually did, notwithstanding the twenty years she had been exposed to it. But Rosy only laughed. "Very well, Sir," said the farmer, in conclusion. "I never go back on my word. And you can take her. I dare say she isn't so much of a girl as I thought she was." But Rosy's arms were round her father's neck, butter and all, and she was kissing him to the point of strangulation. "You silly thing!" she said. "I do believe you're crying! Don't you know that the man that can fetch butter with two old bits of tin in seven minutes can take care of a better girl than I am?"

"He can't get a better girl!" said the farmer. "But I declare to man, I should like to know how 'twas done!"

"Only by aerating the cream, Sir," said Mr. Monteith. "A speedy way of carrying out the first and last principles of the common churn."

"I'll have my lawyer patent that churn to-day, and it shall be Rosy's wedding portion!" said the farmer. "You're not such a bad fellow, after all, Mr. Monteith."

The farmer did as he said. And though up to the present day Mr. Monteith can get nobody else to see the merits of his great improved lifting lock, he has a father-in-law who believes in it, who believes he could make the sun stand still in the heavens, if he tried, and he is the possessor—in his wife's name, to be sure—of a goodly fortune already realized from his royalties upon the little patent churn which was her wedding portion.

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

IT would be easier to say what is not than what is worn this year. We will first establish the fact that the polonaise has triumphed over all the assaults that have been made on it, that long skirts are more in disfavor than ever, and that the few that have been attempted are packed away in trunks to wait and see what can be done with them next winter.

Now that we are quite certain of retaining the polonaise, which for a moment was doubtful, there is a perfect furor in its behalf; it is made of all sizes and shapes—short, long, full, scanty, open, and close; but the essential point is that it is worn always and every where, of all fabrics and colors, and for evening toilettes as well as walking suits.

Laces have regained immense popularity, and every article of lace is put in use; but as the permanence of this favor is not assured, people take care to use their laces without cutting them. I will give a few examples of the way in which this is done.

A point of black Chantilly lace can be made into a mantelet or a tunic; for the first, take the point in the middle of the upper edge, slip it down to the bottom of the waist (I must not forget to say that this arrangement can only be done on the person herself or a lay figure), and then, at the bottom of the waist, make several pleats, which are fastened to the belt; put three lappets underneath, make two pleats on the sides and two in the middle, and the mantelet is finished.

To transform the point into a tunic, reverse it in such a manner that the lower point comes at the top; fold this point back on itself, and pleat it so as to form of the part thus folded a pleated basque. The front ends of the lace point are then draped and trimmed with bows. A lace fichu worn on the corsage completes the toilette. I specify these two styles, but there are a hundred different ways of transforming points either into mantelets or tunics. The simplest as well as the least expensive and most convenient of all is to take the point with both hands in the middle of the back and gather it up until it is of the size of a large fichu, then to put it on the waist, cross the ends in front, and tie them carelessly behind, either at the waist or lower down on the dress if the point is large enough. The pleats are fastened on the top, at the back of the neck, with a large pin, which is concealed by a bow of black ribbon with long ends.

Ribbons are worn more than ever: in front, behind, on both shoulders, and on one shoulder alone. Madame Émile de Girardin used to say that ribbons were the emblem and most beautiful ornament of woman, and that she could not wear too many of them. I do not agree with her, at least as to the second part of her opinion, and think that just now almost too many of them are worn. They are made of all imaginable and hitherto unimaginable kinds—half moiré and half faille, or half faille and half gauze, rather thick, with fine satin stripes that look like streaks of lightning traversing the color; of two shades on dresses of the same tints, dark violet or dark blue on one side, and light violet or light blue on the other; of two different colors, to suspend a medallion or cross from the neck, black on one side and the color of the dress on the other—that is, gray, blue, or green; in short, ribbons are made even of écru coutil with white stripes, or else with écru and white squares.

Children's dresses are extremely fanciful, judging from the following type of a dress lately made for a girl of from ten to twelve years old: Black boots and blue stockings. Half-short dress, showing the stockings, of black taffetas with high waist and long, almost tight sleeves. The skirt is trimmed with a single pleated flounce. Polonaise of white muslin de laine, open in front over the black waist and skirt, and trimmed on the edge with a narrow blue velvet ribbon set between two similar ribbons of black velvet, and a fringe of alternate blue and white tassels. Black straw hat, trimmed with a torsade of blue and white ribbon, and a cluster of three feathers on the side, the first black, the second blue, and the third white.

English embroidery is very much used for trimming dresses for children of all ages, seldom, however, of the color of the material, except on white; for instance, écru and dark blue are used on white; écru is also used on red or blue.

Every day literally we see new fabrics appear; there are lace grenadines with lace designs running over the grenadine ground, brocaded grenadines, and grenadines with tufted stripes. This last fabric is one of the prettiest and most original of this rich season. It is generally made of two shades; the darker shade is reserved for the satin stripe, and forms small tufts which are separated by a small space. In light and dark brown the effect of this fabric is charming. There are also new challies, with wide stripes alternately satin and rough-surfaced, and of a pale écru tint; these challies, which never fray, are made into polonaises, which are worn over silk skirts of all kinds, even black, and also black velvet.

As to bonnets, alas! they are no longer bonnets, or even shakos, but church spires, higher and more overloaded than ever. There is no perceptible difference between bonnets and round hats; their height and even shape are the same. In general they match the dress with which they are worn, and are made, like it, of two shades or colors like those used for the dress. The veil is rather long and square, and falls in front over the bust.

Jet and, in general, glass beads of all colors are much used for the embroidery which trims very rich dresses. Écru fabrics are embroidered with garnet or blue turquoise beads; and gray fabrics with violet, garnet, or blue beads. This kind of embroidery, of course, is executed only on summer silks, with the exception of black grenadine, which is richly embroidered with jet.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

A TRIP TO THE PYRENEES.

THE length of the portion of the Pyrenees running between the Mediterranean and the Bay of Biscay, and forming the boundary line between France and Spain, is estimated at about 270 miles. The highest parts of the chain are near the centre, but only one summit within the French frontier attains an elevation of 11,000 feet. Though inferior in height to the Alps, and on the whole in grandeur of scenery, number of snowy peaks, and extent of glaciers, yet the Pyrenees possess peculiar beauties of their own. Their lower latitude gives a glow to the landscape which will in vain be sought farther north; nearly every rock is clothed with verdure, while their vast forests, not merely of monotonous fir, but also of oak and beech, afford to the eye a sea of undulating foliage. Lakes are almost entirely wanting, and here the inferiority of the Pyrenean mountains to those of Switzerland is most decided.

The Pyrenees are not nearly so well known to English and American tourists as they ought to be, although every year, no doubt, tends to bring this district into closer competition with its great rival, Switzerland. The great objection to the trip is the wearisome railway journey from Paris to Bordeaux. The most comfortable plan is to go by one of the fine Pacific Steam Navigation Company's steamers, which make the run from Liverpool to Bordeaux, en route to South America. Steamers also start once a week from the Thames for Bordeaux. The fare is forty-two shillings, exclusive of provisions, and the passage occupies about four days. We started from Pau, says a late tourist, where we get our first glimpse of the Pyrenees, stretched out in a long line before us, with vague notions of the perils of our voyage, but were quite unprepared for the splendid, broad, macadamized roads, the numerous towns and villages, comfortable hotels, capital saddle-horses, and handsome carriages which we saw en route. Some of the diligences seemed by their appearance to be the old friends of our boyhood, which used to take two days and a night from Boulogne to Paris, but they are well horsed, go at a fine rate, and are cheap. We admit the cheerful feeling caused by being on the box-seat of a well-driven English four-in-hand, but the downright intoxication of good spirits is to sit—no, you can't sit—to stand up in the banquette of a diligence, crane your neck over the driver, hold on tightly, and watch the process of going down the fag-end of a hill and half-way up the opposite one. Our coachman was the proprietor of all the saddle-horses that he wishes to let to his fare sitting behind him, so he took especial pride in showing what his cattle can do. Scorning to use whip, he stoops forward, as if imploring his seven little nags, and screams one long-drawn hee——! Away they go, all as hard as they can split; loose reins, ends of rope, flowing manes, and tails and heels are all the beholder sees while clutching the seat, and as one glances at the sides of the road (a precipice of rocks with a torrent on one side and a wall of mountain rock on the other) one feels that no sensation like this can be obtained between Piccadilly and Dorking.

We should strongly recommend a party of four to do the regular round by hiring a carriage at Pau, and a pair of horses. Better still to walk, and send your luggage on before by diligence. A party of ladies might even take a walking tour here with perfect comfort, sure of meeting with civility from the country people, good roads, and a comfortable hotel at night.

All through the French Pyrenees the routine is much after this manner: You have about ten or twenty miles of railway, jogging along leisurely, winding about the fertile plain, skirting the mountains by a good coach-road blasted out of the rocks, which winds about, following the gave, or water-course; this for three or four hours, when you suddenly burst upon a little town, with its boulevard and its établissement and sulphurous baths. You rest here for a few days, making excursions by bridle-paths, on foot, or on horseback, then back again to the valley, a little more railway, another turn into the mountains, another Eaux-something or other, and so on; or should you be a good climber, you can take short-cuts across the mountains instead of going back to the plain.

The guide, when dressed in his best suit, with scarlet jacket over one shoulder, crimson sash, buff waistcoat, and dark velvet breeches, and heading a party of Parisian or British visitors, looks very picturesque as he strides along before the others, and turns now and then to see how they clamber over the little difficulties. Mr. Henry Blackburn, in his book of the Pyrenees, illustrated by Doré (we found it a very useful and pleasant companion), thus describes his first sight of Eaux Bonnes:

"In whichever direction we turn there are houses built into and often forming part of the mountain, resting on ledges of rock, like the eyries; but so cleverly contrived is the arrangement of the place, so admirably has space been economized, that there is a feeling of freedom about it, quite inconsistent with living in a bird's nest. Thus with the mountain several thousand feet above our heads, and the Val d'Ossau stretching away for many miles at our feet, with rocks overhanging and tree-tops waving below, through which we can see below the blue sky, with scarcely a foot of level ground any where (save the Promenade Horizontale), with cascades and water-falls almost at our windows, we find ourselves as comfortably and luxuriously housed as in any modern city. Looking down upon the place from our hotel window on this bright sunny afternoon, it is the gayest scene imaginable; and we scarcely know which to admire most, the costumes of the fair riders who about this hour (5 P.M.) come flocking in, dressed in white riding-habits and scarlet hats, or their cavaliers in buff and green, like members of the Ancient Order of Foresters, or their dandy guides, in embroidered Spanish costumes, silk sashes, and white stockings, or the gay trappings of their thin steeds, or the motley groups that stand about to see the arrivals."

The Val de Lys, which may be easily reached from Luchon, derives its name from an old word signifying the number of its streams and water-falls. After a pleasant ride through a wood of beeches and hazels, the gorge expands into a green valley, overlooked by lofty mountains, among which are the snowy peaks and glaciers of the Crabioules. The fir woods are streaked by the white lines of foaming cascades, the principal one of which dashes through a very narrow fissure called the "Trou d'Enfer."

The most interesting excursion from Cauterets is to the Lac de Gaube—one of the few mountain lakes in the Pyrenees. This lonely basin of green water is reached easily on horseback or on foot. On its edge one is startled to see an unmistakably English tombstone, commemorating the death of a young English barrister and his wife who were drowned there during their honeymoon. "The Lac de Gaube," says Mr. Blackburn, "is a perfect mountain basin, the water being prevented from escaping into the valley by a natural granite wall, which forms a sort of embankment at the northern end. From this point we obtain a grand view of the sand-covered Vignemale, reflected in the still water. The sides of the lake are steep and rugged, with black masses of fir-trees reaching almost to the water's edge."

SOCIAL BARRIERS.

FOR really easy intercourse something like a community of interests is requisite. In order to enjoy a man's society you must be capable at least of sympathizing with his favorite pursuits. If your whole knowledge, for example, of natural history is confined to recognizing an empirical distinction between a horse and a cow, how can you profitably talk upon such subjects to a man whose mind is a walking encyclopedia? The region in which he habitually dwells is for you closed by doors which it is impossible to pass. This difficulty is of course merely suggested by way of illustration. As a matter of fact, a tolerably intelligent person who has never got beyond the asses' bridge may converse profitably with a person whose mathematical speculations are so profound as to be intelligible to only half a dozen persons in America. But that is because mathematics, however deeply immersed a man may be in the study, fills only one division of his intellect. Even the deepest of mathematicians can take a keen interest in the cooking of a mutton-chop, to say nothing of such subjects as poetry, or politics, or theology, which may be said to have a universal human interest. Extend, however, the same principal to other departments of intellectual activity. Take a man who is thoroughly conversant with the great currents of thought, and place him in contact with an ordinary plowman, whose whole intellectual apparatus has been provided at a village school. How can they find real pleasure in each other's society? The plowman can, of course, traverse only an infinitesimal part of the philosopher's sphere of thought, and the philosopher, however amiable, will in time grow weary of talk about petty parish gossip, or even reflections upon agriculture from a purely bucolic point of view. The answer, indeed, may be easily given. Such a difference need not cause any sense of awkwardness. If the plowman is intelligent enough to admit the value of a philosophy which he can not understand, and therefore to pay due respect to philosophers, and if, on the other hand, the philosopher is not too pedantic to take an interest in simple human passions and troubles, they have a common ground upon which each may give and take some useful information. Unluckily it is just on this ground that the discord is likely to be most complete. The plowman probably takes an interest in the rate of wages, and attributes his bad pay to a certain inherent meanness on the part of the nearest farmer; the philosopher can only reply by statements about the wages fund and Malthus, which to his interlocutor are as consoling as a text in Hebrew. It is not merely that one man knows a certain list of facts of which the other has never heard, but that their whole methods of thought are jarring and mutually exclusive.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDITH B.—A correspondent informs us that the oft-quoted line, "Though lost to sight, to mem'ry dear," originated with Ruthven Jenkyns, and was first published in the Greenwich Magazine for Marines in 1701 or 1702. As a literary curiosity we quote the whole poem:

"Sweetheart, good-by! the flutt'ring sail
Is spread to waft me far from thee,
And soon before the fav'ring gale
My ship shall bound upon the sea.
Perchance, all desolate and forlorn,
These eyes shall miss thee many a year,
But unforgotten every charm,
Though lost to sight, to mem'ry dear.

"Sweetheart, good-by! one last embrace!
O cruel Fate! true souls to sever!
Yet in this heart's most sacred place
Thou, thou alone shalt dwell forever!
And still shall recollection trace
In Fancy's mirror, ever near,
Each smile, each tear, that form, that face,
Though lost to sight, to mem'ry dear."

CRESCENT CITY.—You will find numerous and explicit directions concerning tatting in the columns of the Bazar. There are several English books on the art, but we can not recommend any one in particular.

R. S. L.—"Titian" is pronounced as if spelled Tishan.—Get summer camel's-hair or else cashmere to wear as a polonaise over your brown silk. Thin batiste polonaises will also be worn over brown.

L. T.—Friz the short hair over curl-papers.

KATE NEWBERN.—Get réséda or else peacock blue camel's-hair for child's sacque, and braid it with the same color.

POOR ME.—Black silk suits are too old-womanish for little girls of six and eight years. Make your black silk in an over dress by pattern in Girl's Wardrobe; trim it with ruffles of the same, and add blue or pink Watteau bows, sash, and shoulder-knots to suit the various skirts worn with them. Trim white merino with bands of blue silk or velvet. First-class dressmakers do not spoil the soft drapery of over-skirts and polonaises by putting stiff lining in them. Read how to make black silks in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 13, Vol. VI.

MRS. C.—Get dark blue-purple violet to put with your light silk in the way mentioned. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 19, Vol. VI., for hints about black silks.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Get a white piqué polonaise with black velvet buttons, collar, cuffs, and sash to wear with your various skirts. Use the Châtelaine Polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. VI. Wear your hair in plaits wound around the top of your head with frizzed fringe on the forehead and short curls hanging behind. Get a Swiss muslin Normandy cap for your little girl. Make your black alpaca by the cut paper pattern of châtelaine suit mentioned above.

AN IGNORAMUS.—Read about imported suits in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 18, Vol. VI.—When dining out do not fold your napkin as if it were to be placed in a ring, but lay it on the table just as you leave it.

EDITH.—No such notice as you mention ever appeared in the Bazar. Satin is not used for dress trimming. Get pink Chambéry gauze for a bride-maid dress, though white gauze with garlands of rose-buds or convolvuli would be more appropriate. Use moiré instead of satin. Hints about stylish black silk suits are given in Bazar No. 19, Vol. VI.

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. Y.

GRAND UNION HOTEL.

BRESLIN, GARDNER, & CO., Proprietors.

THIS famous Hotel will re-open for the coming season on June 1st, refitted and improved throughout, and adapted in every way to the comfort of guests.

No expense has been spared to make it the most comfortable and elegant, as well as the coolest, Hotel at Saratoga Springs.

The Parlors and Dining-Rooms have been elaborately frescoed, and, as well as the principal Rooms, have been refurnished in the newest and latest style.

The Bath-Rooms and Water-Closets—heretofore objectionable—have been entirely removed; and, instead, they have been placed in convenient parts of the Hotel, trimmed with Black Walnut and Maple, amply drained, and altogether finished in a manner inferior to no city establishment.

The immense Dining Hall—two hundred feet by fifty-five—as also the extensive range of Parlors, have been fitted up with Crystal Chandeliers and Reflectors, and the famous Ball-Room, with three Crystal Sunlights, will produce a brilliancy of effect that can be more easily imagined than expressed.

Mr. James H. Breslin will throughout the season be present and give his personal attention to the care and reception of all who will favor the Hotel with their patronage.

With a desire to attract as many as possible during the months of June and September, which are by far the pleasantest months of the whole season, the proprietors have determined to fix the rate of Board for those months at very reasonable rates.

A plan of the various Rooms of this extensive establishment can be seen at the Metropolitan Hotel and Gilsey House, Broadway, New York, where Rooms or Parlors, with Board, can be engaged now and at any time throughout the season.

A new and spacious Dining Hall has also been added for the special convenience of children with their attendant nurses and servants, and accessible to parents at all times, thus supplying a want in this respect which has long been needed, and which can not fail to be appreciated.

Fashions for Summer.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1873, by A. BURDETTE SMITH, in the Office of the Librarian, at Washington, D. C.

As a Polonaise—As a Wrapper.

The above represents the MAGIC COSTUME in two entirely different toilets. It can be changed from one to the other in less than ONE minute, by simply adjusting ONE button. One view is a full-dress Polonaise in Batiste, trimmed with lace and insertion, though it is equally adapted to any kind of material, but especially favored for wash goods, because when unbuttoned it falls into a beautifully-shaped wrapper (see Cut) without pleat or gather, making it easy to laundry. It is also used for water-proof or ladies' cloth. Elevated, it is a Polonaise or Redingote; or, when let down, a water-proof cloak. The traveler and voyager will find it a necessary convenience. It is very simple to make. Complete instructions are printed upon each pattern, besides a Cloth Model. (See below). For linen, it requires 6⅓ yards of 36-inch. For water-proof, it requires 5 yards. All sizes. Price of pattern with cloth model, One Dollar. (See Premium below.) We furnish Linen or Batiste made by this pattern for $5, $8, $10, $15, $20, $30. In Waterproof, $10, $12, $15, $20, $25. We are putting in better materials and charging less price by the single suit than manufacturers are charging by the dozen for last summer styles. A sample card of goods will be mailed upon receipt of ten cents.

Send two stamps for Catalogue of Patterns.

We give a CLOTH MODEL with each pattern, which SHOWS every seam, pleat, gather, loop, &c., how to put the garment together by the pattern, and how it will look when completed. By the use of our Cloth Models any person who can sew can FINISH the most difficult garment as easy as the plainest. They are PERFECT GUIDES.

MM. VERDE DE LISLE FRERES, of the Compagnie des Indes, especially address themselves to ladies of America contemplating a voyage to Europe, inviting their attention to their productions of LACES AND CASHMERE SHAWLS exhibited at their warehouses,

No. 80 Rue Richelieu, Paris, and
N. 1 Rue de la Regence, Bruxelles.

Those who call either from interest and curiosity, or for the purpose of buying, will meet with equal courtesy. As this house pays no commissions under any circumstances to agents, the direct purchaser obtains all the advantages. All goods marked in plain figures. Prices invariable. English spoken throughout the house.

WEBSTER'S PATENT
Button-hole Worker.

Pat. June 27, 1871. Awarded first premium at the Am. Institute and Md. Institute Fairs, 1871.

It is one of the most important inventions of the age. The most perfect Button-hole Worker ever invented! So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Every stitch is taken with the most perfect mechanical accuracy. Is used entirely independent of the sewing machine, and will last a lifetime. Does away with pricking the fingers, straining the eyes and with imperfect and irregular worked button-holes. They give universal satisfaction. Ladies who use them say that they are worth their weight in gold. Over eleven thousand sold during the first week of their introduction. Local and traveling agents wanted everywhere. They sell at sight, and give over 100 per cent. profit. Sample Button-hole Worker and sample Button-hole Cutter packed in a neat case, with full directions for use, together with sample of our new and novel way of canvassing, sent to any address on receipt of 65 cents. Orders by mail receive prompt attention. Address WEBSTER M'F'G CO., Manufacturers, Ansonia, Ct. Please state in what paper you saw this.

The Standard Lotta Bustle.

A Diploma has been awarded by the American Institute to A. W. Thomas, Patentee and Manufacturer for the lightest, strongest, most durable, comfortable, elastic, and cheapest Bustle in the market. The wearer can sit in any position whatever without bending or injuring it in the slightest degree, it closing entirely up on sitting, and returning with precision to its original shape on arising. The heaviest dress will not cause it to diminish its size, or change its perfect form (as is generally the fault). No ladies' wardrobe complete without the Standard Lotta Bustle. For sale every where. Ask for Nos. 10, 11, 15, 18, 22, &c., comprising the various sizes and styles. Patentee and Wholesale Manufacturer, 91 White St., N.Y.; & 801 Race St., Phila.

Trade Mark. Patented.
Sold by all Druggists.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:
1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.
2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.
3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.
4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.
NOTICE.
Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

FACETIÆ.

IN Missouri, when a man kills another on Sunday, they prosecute him under the law against desecrating the Sabbath by shooting at a mark, and have him fined five dollars and costs.

What monarch was more than kingly?—King Lear.

An unimaginative individual on visiting the Falls of Niagara was greatly perplexed at the astonishment expressed by his companions, and on one of them exclaiming to him, "Is it not a most wonderful fall?" replied, "Wonderful! no; I see nothing wonderful in it. Why, what's to hinder the water from falling?"

A HINT TO TALKERS AT TABLE—Save your breath to blow your soup.

If Shakspeare's advice were generally acted upon, those of us who are so unfortunate as to have no taste either for opera or oratorio might find it difficult to get credit even for the commonest necessaries of life, for, speaking of "the man that has no music in himself," does he not recommend, "Let no such man be trusted?"

A young man's friends object to his being loose, but, somehow, they have an equal objection to his being tight.

An art critic says: "'A Lady of Modern Rome' (No. 23), carefully painted, and with a good interior, went for one hundred and twenty dollars to Mr. Williams."

We may as well quote a bit of obituary poetry which recently appeared in a Philadelphia paper, because nothing more wonderful in the way of rhyme was ever constructed. Here it is: "Our little Sallie did to heaven go, Baby life so fleet is; She was afflicted with the cerebro-Spinal meningitis. 'Tis hard to lose our Sallie so, But the reflection sweet is, That she's gone where there is no cerebro-Spinal meningitis." A lovelier little bit of elegiac poetry we do not remember to have read.

"Chicken on shell," said an Englishman, looking down the carte at a Boston hotel; "that must be a delicacy. Here, waiter, chicken on shell." The waiter shortly after produced the viand, which was in the shape of eggs. The Britisher was nonplused. Upon inquiring what it meant, the waiter replied that it was a bad time of year for fresh eggs. They advertised them as chickens that there might be no mistake.

Which travels at the greatest speed, heat or cold?—Heat, because you can easily catch cold.

It has been proved that, after kindling his fire, a miser stuck a cork in the end of the bellows to save the little wind that was left in them.

A Detroit negress allowed a gentleman of that city to name her baby the other day, in consideration of a two-dollar bill, and the poor little thing was christened William Henry Washington Colfax Grant Scipio Brutus Halifax Weed Joshua Lone Jack Madison Buffalo Bill Saunders.

"Looking forward to enjoyment," said an enthusiastic young lady to a city man, "is the charm of human existence; it enables us to bear our present burdens without repining, in the hope of a bright future."

The city man's reply was, "It don't pay. From what I know of it I would as soon chase butterflies for a living, or bottle up moonshine for cloudy nights."

There is a man who keeps a list of all the banks in the country, so as to be able to say that he keeps a bank account.

RATHER AWKWARD.

"Well, and how's the Beauty, Mrs. Jessamy? As Lovely as ever?"
"Oh, Lovelier, if possible, Mr. Polkington! She's just been Short-Coated, poor Darling, and—"
"Just—been—Short—Coated, Mrs. Jessamy!"
"Yes, of course! My Baby you mean, don't you?"
"Oh—er—no! I—I—I meant your opposite Neighbor—Miss Belsize!"

RATHER MIXED.—A farmer, not accustomed to literary composition or letter-writing, having lost a new hat at a meeting, and inquired into its possible mistaking, addressed the following note to its supposed possessor: "Mr. A presents his compliments to Mr. B; I have got a hat which is not his; if he have got a hat which is not yours, no doubt they are the missing one."

Mr. Brandytoddy's three reasons for not drinking are very characteristic of that gentleman.

"Take something to drink?" said his friend to him one day.

"No, thank you," replied Mr. B.

"No! why not?" inquired his friend, in great amazement.

"In the first place," returned Mr. Brandytoddy, "I am secretary to a temperance society that is to meet to-day, and I must show my temperance character. In the second place, this is the anniversary of my father's death, and out of respect for him I have promised never to drink on this day. And, in the third place, I have just taken something."

MURDEROUS PRACTICES.

"Will you want a bit o' meat, or 'll ye kill yersel' this spring?"

"I dinna ken," replied the farmer, "whether I's kill mysel' or tak' a side o' me fether."

A French gentleman, learning English to some purpose, replied thus to the salutations:

"How do you do, monsieur?"
"Do vat?"
"How do you find yourself?"
"I never loses myself."
"How do you feel?"
"Smooth: you just feel me."
"Good-morning, monsieur!"
"Good! No, it's a bad one; it's vet and nasty."

SIGHTS WHICH WE SHOULD LIKE TO SEE.

The sight of a large coal wagon unloading at our door, at the cost of a kind friend who wished to show us his affection.

The sight of a statue put up by public subscription, and proving not to be an eye-sore to the public.

The sight of a whole column of theatrical advertisements without one single puff in it.

The sight of our brand-new silk umbrella which was taken by mistake (of course) for a very old alpaca one we found left in exchange for it.

The sight of a pew door in a convenient position opened for us gratis when we desire to listen to a fashionable preacher.

The sight of some of the dollar bills which, on various sham pretexts, we have been constrained to lend to out-at-elbow acquaintances.

The sight of a photograph of Ourself which, in our own private opinion, really does us any justice.

The sight of an advertisement seeking for us as the next of kin of a rich Somebody or other, whom we have never heard of, who has left us all his property.

The sight of a new form of constitutional French government, founded on eternal principles, and capable of enduring for upward of a twelvemonth.

The sight of a new patent machine for washing shirts without knocking the buttons off.

And, finally, a "sight of money" paid by some good fairy of the future to free us all from the necessity of future sights such as some of those we have mentioned.

A juggler can not act well unless he is in the vein (the juggler vein, of course). This remark is made in a joc'lar vein.

SOCIAL DISTINCTION.—There are people in the world who esteem it so extremely vulgar to express emotion, that, if an earthquake were reported to have happened in their neighborhood, they would consider it a proof of their good-breeding not to have been moved by it.

HARVEY'S SAUCE.—The preceptor of Master Harvey asked that young gentleman what were round numbers. Harvey, with characteristic sauce, replied, "Naughts."

This is part of the report of a sulky critic at some private theatricals in humble life: "His Eminence was very perfect, but growled out his author, and snapped at his sentences like a surly dog disturbed at a bone. In time the fair Julia appeared in a magnificent get-up of pure white, the result of a day's search among the second-hand shops. François was represented by a little wheezing member with a chronic cough. He had played before, and had tights and a proper dress of his own. In the act where Richelieu upbraids him for losing the packet containing treasonable correspondence, the poor little fellow became so excited that a string snapped, and down fell his coat over his feet. In the third act De Mauprat, under the sting of supposed injuries, leagues with the conspirators to slay the Cardinal. He entered, and concealed himself to wait for his victim. The Cardinal also entered, vigil lamp in hand (a candle in this instance), and was seized by the indignant Adrian, who looked the embodiment of martial bravery as he stood there sword in hand, frock-coated, and with his head buried in the identical helmet borrowed from a policeman, and decorated with red and blue paper. He launched forth a catalogue of his wrongs, and instead of winding up with the text, 'Expect no mercy; behold De Mauprat,' he lost the words, and bleated out instead, 'Sure and I am De Mauprot, whome you long thowt dead, but I am aloive, my boy, to blast ye.' At this point he casts aside disguise; but our tragic hero gave the visor such a rough jerk that off flew his helmet on the stage, and out rolled a pile of newspaper padding. The Prime Minister's patience was even proof against that event, but was utterly crushed by the next; for that scene, at least, he had vindicated his conduct, and called for his ward to bear out his words; but the stentorian appeal, 'Julie, Julie de Mortimer,' remained unanswered. The next act brought with it Louis XIV., beautifully made up like a mute at a funeral. This gentleman had arrived by train, and brought with him two or three friends who applauded him manfully, and annoyed him so much that he held repeated aside solos, disapproving of their conduct, till the curtain fell amidst repeated calls for all the company."

In California they are so much annoyed with mosquitoes and fleas that a physician advises, first a bath in a solution of soft soap and treacle, then a sprinkle of sawdust on the head, after which the patient should take to his bed and maintain perfect repose.

Brogue Anns come from Ireland.

"India, my boy," said an Irish officer to a friend on his arrival at Calcutta, "is the finest climate under the sun; but a lot of young fellows come out here and they drink and they eat, and they drink and they die; and then they write home to their parents a pack of lies and say it's the climate as has killed them."

A dutiful son was recently brought up for a little matter before the legal powers, when it turned out he had been speculating on his ma's death, and had done this poetry: "In affectionate remembrance of Jane Ward, who died December 15, 1872, aged thirty-seven years.

"She's gone to her rest, her troubles are o'er,
She's done with her sorrows and pain;
The ills of this life, which she patiently bore,
Shall never distress her again."

The mother who was thus alleged to be freed from "her sorrows and pain" was actually in court when the prisoner was committed for trial.

MATRIMONIAL.—It is no good nowadays for a man to offer his hand if there's nothing in it.

"A SOUSED CHILD DREADS WATER."

"Now, Missy, you've seen me Shave, so you must just Skedaddle, please, as I'm going to take my Bath."
"I won't Tell if you don't take it, Uncle Rowland. Let me stay, please."
"Won't Tell? What do you mean, Missy?"
"Why, nobody wouldn't go into Cold Water, Uncle, if they wasn't made to, I suppose. Nobody don't make you, do they?"

ONLY A SAD MISTAKE.

ONLY a blunder, a sad mistake;
All my own fault, and mine alone;
The saddest error a heart can make—
I was so young, or I would have known.

Only his rare, sweet, winning smile;
Only a lingering touch of his hand:
I think I was dreaming all the while—
The reason I did not understand.

Yet somewhere I've read men woo this way;
That eyes speak sometimes before the tongue:
And I was sure he would speak some day—
Pardon the folly, I was so young.

Was, I say, for now I am old;
So old, it seems like a hundred years
Since I felt my heart growing hard and cold,
With a pain too bitter and deep for tears.

I saw him lean over the stranger's chair
With a warm new light in his beautiful eyes,
And I woke from my dreaming then and there,
And went out of my self-made Paradise.

He never loved me, I know, I see!
Such sad, sad blunders as young hearts make!
She did not win him away from me,
For he was not mine. It was my mistake.

A woman should wait for a man to speak
Before she dreams of his love, I own;
But I was a girl: girls' hearts are weak;
And the pain, like the fault, is mine alone.

Loose Front Double-breasted Polonaise Walking Suit, Figs. 1 and 2.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

See illustration on first page.

THIS pretty polonaise, of which a cut paper pattern is published, is one of the most popular garments of the season. It is usually of some light fabric, and is worn over a black silk or cashmere walking skirt, though the whole suit may be made of the same material. It is well suited to linen, lawn, or any kind of wash goods. The garment may be worn either belted or loose, both styles of which are shown in the illustrations. It is double-breasted, and may be worn either with or without a habit shirt, and has two rows of very large buttons down the front. The edge is hemmed or faced with silk. The walking skirt is flounced in the back, and has a tablier of upright double box-pleats.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS suit comprises two garments—loose front double-breasted polonaise and walking skirt.

LOOSE FRONT DOUBLE-BREASTED POLONAISE.—This pattern is in six pieces—front, back, sleeve, cuff, collar, and pocket. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting together. The perforations show where to baste the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, to take up the short seam on each front, to sew on the pockets, to place the buttons on the front, to turn back the lapel and collar, to tack the tape in the back of the skirt for draping, and the size and shape of the under part of the sleeve. The front is double-breasted, and though worn flowing, is slightly shaped to the figure by a front seam on each side, extending from the armhole down about six inches below the waist. The back is adjusted closely to the figure, and held in place by a belt underneath. A seam is down the middle of the back, in which extra fullness is added at the waist and laid in deep pleats underneath. There is no real side body, as the piece between the seam under the arm and the short front seam takes its place. The front closes with the right front overlapping the left, and a second row of buttons on the right side to correspond with the left. The neck is turned back in the line of perforations, forming a lapel, and met by a turn-over collar about one inch and a half wide. The tight-fitting coat sleeve is finished at the wrist by a deep cuff, and two buttons, placed one above the other, on the back part of the cuff. Place the longest seam of the sleeve to the notch in the back of the armhole, holding the sleeve a little full on the shoulder when sewing it in. Before joining the seams lay three deep side pleats, turning downward, in the back edge of the front, according to the notches; gather between the notches, on the front edge of the back in a space of about seven inches, to add fullness to the drapery. A strap ten inches long is sewed at the waist line on the middle seam; the two single perforations are tacked on the strap—the lower one at the end, the one nearest the top at the centre, giving the full panier in the back of the skirt. A pocket, lined with stiff foundation, is sewed on each side of the front, even with the perforations. An outside belt, to which the sash is attached, crosses the back, passes through slits in the seam under the arm, and is fastened under the loose front; when a loose front is objectionable, this belt may be worn outside, and fasten down the front also. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all others.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 7¾ yards.
Number of buttons, two dozen.

WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front gore, two side gores, and straight breadth for the back. Cut the front gore and straight breadth with the longest straight edges laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Cut two pieces each of the pattern given for the side gores. The front gore is trimmed its entire length with double box-pleating of the material, graduating in width at the top. The side gores and straight breadth are trimmed with four deep ruffles ten inches wide, cut the straight way of the goods, divided about two inches from the top by a bias band to form a heading, and finished at each end by a bow and ends. Put the pattern together by the notches, paying no attention to the grain of the paper.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 7 yards.
Extra for trimming, 14 yards.

HOST AND GUEST.

WE Americans are by no means such a visiting people as our cousins over the water. In those great feudal houses of England, each one of which is a stack of villages in itself, it is supposable that the dwellers might just fall short of death by loneliness without their circle of guests, while in our little houses we more frequently fall short of death by the guests. And whether it is the fault of the house or the fault of the guest is an open question among us still.

It is possible, however, that the difficulty may be quite equally distributed, for there are three things that make hospitality a burden—a little house, a churlish host, an exacting guest. And there are unbearable varieties of all these. There is the guest who comes days after the appointed time; the guest who encroaches on the time of the next guest; the wretched guest who dares to fall ill; the guest who demands all there is and more too. There is the host who welcomes the coming, but forgets to speed the parting guest; the host who vexes the patience of his visitors with his attentions; the host who cries, "Good Lord, here comes that terrible Queen of Sheba with her conundrums!—Ah, my dear Sheba, how glad I am to see you!"

Of late years a great disposition to adopt all the English ways in our power has been evincing itself among us, ranging from ecclesiology to ragged schools; and we have become quite unwilling to let the sea and the distance filter away such portions as it might be to our advantage to lose. Because our cousins use the word "nasty" for every variety of unpleasant thing, and the word "nice" for every variety of the pleasant thing, our whole conversational vocabulary bids fair to simmer itself down to those two adjectives. We hear of nice men and nice manners, and nice dogs and nice dainties, and we hear of a nasty day and a nasty sore and a nasty sermon. "Mrs. Mayfair," said a young lady who affected this style the other day, speaking of a person whose mouth was never soiled with any thing worse than the cutting repartee just given to the young lady—"Mrs. Mayfair does say the nastiest things!"

Among all these Anglican affectations there is one which is a way of receiving guests, and according to which we let them severely alone. Having heard that our foreign cousins, when their houses are full of people, pursue their previous avocations uninterruptedly, and leave their company to follow their own sweet wills, we at once think that nothing can be more elegant than a similar proceeding; and having invited our solitary guest, we leave her, as if it were honor and delight enough to be in our house at all, to take care of herself as she can. Our house consists of a drawing-room, a dining-room, and kitchen, and the sleeping apartments. Perhaps we live in the city, and have no grounds about the house; perhaps we live in the country, where people can stroll across the fields if they will, and if they are not afraid of the cattle there. We have a piano; we have a few books—not, it is probable, the very newest. Our pictures are soon exhausted; and when we coolly inform our friend that we are off to a committee meeting of the Society for Supplying the Tahitians with Parasols, and hope she will enjoy herself in our absence, or leisurely walk up stairs for our afternoon nap, or withdraw with our favorite book, we simply leave her in a condition where she might almost as well be in the Desert of Sahara.

The natural corollary of this demonstration is not that in order to have the pleasure of entertaining company one must have suites of rooms for various enjoyments, a library, a billiard-room, a music-room, a drawing-room, a retinue of servants, a half dozen horses, and a dozen guests at once; but that, having a guest at all, our house and we ourselves are hers as long as she stays; and if we have invited into our house a person accustomed to a richer and better order of things than that prevailing there, it is all the more imperative upon us to accord her the absolute devotion of ourselves.

But, on the other hand, we must admit that guests have some duties of their own as well, which, frequently as they are assured of it, it will do no harm to reiterate in a few words. And the first lesson is that it is a duty not to be guests at all unless they are very sure of their ground, always remembering when invited that any day means no day.

But, once guests, although their host may serve them with Oriental hospitality, and be at their feet with all that hosts should render, it is their place to remember that, when all is done, they still are not in a hotel; that it is a necessary politeness to ascertain the household hours if possible; that it is no property of their part to set up hours of their own for rising or retiring, feasting or fasting; and, of all things, that it is their rôle to so conduct themselves that every servant in the house shall not give warning on account of them—very simple directions on their face, but, judging from the general failure to follow them, very impossible to practice. Indeed, a guest can do nothing better than to understand that in receiving a cordial welcome the gates of the inner penetralium of another's home have been set open to them, and that so great a compliment deserves at least the acknowledgment of an attempt at assimilation with the family, and of a modest and unexacting behavior.

DESIRABLE CHANGES IN THE LAWS REGARDING A WIFE'S PROPERTY.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

NOTWITHSTANDING appearances, it may be safely assumed that the law means to be just and humane, and to secure the greatest good of the greatest number. The law giving the children's property into the widower father's hands was doubtless framed on the assumption that the father has more love for his children than any one else in the world, and that their interests are safer in his hands than in any other's. This is not a monstrous, but a natural assumption. It ought always to be true, and it often is true. When it is true, the law works admirably. I have seen a father in moderate circumstances carefully cherish the small fortune left to his daughters by their own mother. He supports and educates them and the children of his second wife out of his own means. He gives them an ample outfit at their marriage, not, as they had supposed, from their money, but from his own, and acquaints them that their portion still remains untouched and increasing. Herein the law works no harm. But when the miserly father unduly hoards, or the mean father squanders, or the weak father misappropriates, to the injury and perhaps ruin of the children, what then? What is the remedy? Shall we change the law, and if so, to what shall it be changed? I beg all women to consider this, for it involves the gravest consequences. It concerns not only their own comfort and happiness, but the character and fate of their children.

I do not advocate entire equality. I think the laws of inheritance should favor women more than men, not from any conventional or even sincere gallantry, but from the nature of things, from the organization of the individual and of society. It is the business of a man to earn his living and that of his wife and children; a woman's business prevents such earning. It is the right of a wife to be supported by her husband. If the husband can not support himself, he had better die. The world has no use for a man that can not earn his own living. But women are unfitted by nature for this object. Society is founded on the assumption that they will not, and its best interests are served when they do not maintain themselves. The law should recognize this, and should enforce the wife's right to be supported out of her husband's estate, and should discountenance and deny by non-recognition any right of the husband to be supported out of his wife's estate.

Shall, then, the law give the property of the husband wholly into the hands of the widow? Immediately you are beset by the spectacle of a woman who a year after her husband's death makes a ridiculous marriage—a marriage which is disgraceful to herself, and puts shame upon her dead husband and her living children. Under the influence of this new husband the money is speedily squandered, and the innocent children are left in poverty. Or the woman is impulsive, unreasoning, headstrong, and wastes her children's substance in wild investments and extravagant expenditure. Or she is benevolent, inaccurate, and "happy-go-easy," and their property slips through her amiable fingers with fatal facility. We have all seen these women. Disaster follows them. You can not frame a law to meet every case. You can only frame laws to meet the majority of cases. The law cares, as it ought to care, for the interests of children as well as of husbands and wives, by demanding their support of the father during his life, and taking it out of his estate after his death. It is possible that, on the whole, this is the best thing the law can do. It may be that family interests would be more endangered by leaving the children without legal claim than by leaving the wife with the smaller share. I am inclined to think otherwise. I am inclined to think that, take society through, at least American society, setting the mother's love over against the father's business knowledge, the children's interests are as safe in the mother's hands as in the father's. It seems to me more natural and reasonable that the mother should be invested with the power that inhered in both. When one eye is lost, the other increases in strength. When sight and hearing are gone, feeling becomes peculiarly acute. When the father dies, the mother must in many respects be father and mother both, and she ought to have the powers of both father and mother. Suffering would occur under this law, but no more, I believe, than under the existing law. Certainly a woman is less likely to become disaffected toward her children by the influence of their step-father, or to sacrifice their interests to his for the sake of peace, than a man is to be similarly influenced by a step-mother. American women are surely affectionate enough and intelligent enough, in the main, to be trusted with the education and support of their own children.

The very exigency would quicken the mother's often merely dormant business ability, and would furnish a substitute for experience.

While we fully admit that the law deals, and justly deals, not in particulars, but in generals, and that it is unsafe hastily to demand its repeal or modification because a special application of it is attended with severe hardship, we must not forget that it is safe to modify it in conformity to general principles.

For instance, it is meet and right that law should lean as far as possible toward the freedom of the individual. It should establish as firmly as possible the sacredness of ownership. It does this generously in case of men, but even in the case of men it does not establish absolute ownership. Even a man has not absolute right to his own property. The law, in the interest of his minor children, has control over enough of his estate to feed and clothe and educate them. In the interest of his wife it claims a certain portion for her use. In the interests of society it claims the whole after one life. A can not will his property to B, to go after B's death to C, and after C's death to E. It is for the interests of society that the world should be under the control of the living, not of the dead. Nor can a man give a deed without the co-operation of his wife. Beyond this a man holds right of control by virtue of ownership. A woman is far more limited. She not only receives an unequal share in the distribution of their joint property, but she is deprived of the power of directing the disposal of her own. She may make as many wills as she chooses, and they are legal—if her husband consents. But a will subject to her husband is no will at all. Her husband may be the very person against whom she wishes to guard, or for whom she wishes to provide. And by no will she may choose to make does her husband forfeit his life dower in her estate. In spite of herself, he will have the income of her property, and she can not divert it from him to the care, the education, or the support of her children, even though she knows him to be incapable. This "tenant by courtesy" steps in to the exclusion of every one else, and on the old nursery principle, "After me is manners," ensconces himself as snugly as a mouse in a cheese, and nibbles away with perfect security till death nips him.

This is wrong, not because it often brings suffering, but on general principles. It violates the freedom of the individual, the dignity of woman. No harm can come to the family or to society by a woman's imprudent disposal of her goods so great as the harm done to both by thus depriving her of the dignity which inheres in control. A woman ought not any more than a man to be able to dispose of their joint property without her husband's consent, but she ought to be able to dispose of her own. So far from his being entitled to the whole income from it, he has no right to any of it against her will. She has a right to a living out of his estate, because the very fact of her being his wife presumptively incapacitates her from earning a livelihood. He has no right to a support out of her estate, because it is presumptively a shame to a man to be supported by his wife. Society needs that women should be freed from the necessity of money-earning. It needs that men should be impelled by that necessity.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE LOOSE FRONT DOUBLE-BREASTED POLONAISE.

ONE of the most fashionable garments of the season is the loose front double-breasted polonaise, which forms part of the suit illustrated on our first page, and of which a cut paper pattern is published. This is sometimes called the blouse-polonaise, and has lately been given the name of Alexandra, but was introduced in the Bazar Supplement a year ago as a redingote, and was really the first original great-coat polonaise worn in this country. It was not successful at first, but at present is the favorite over dress for all suits except those designed for full-dress. It is a graceful and comfortable garment of very simple construction; is adapted to thick and thin materials alike; may be used as part of a suit or else as an independent garment; is worn appropriately by young, middle-aged, and old, and is therefore popular on the score of availability as well as beauty. To be comme il faut it must be very long, with ample fullness in the skirt and abundant soft drapery; after the collar, cuffs, buttons, pockets, and sash are added, all other trimming is superfluous, and detracts from its style. It may be worn flowing loosely in front, like a morning wrapper, in the manner shown in one illustration, or else it may be belted down, as seen in the second figure; the flowing unbelted front is in favor for the simple stylish costumes of spring woolen goods worn for morning and afternoon promenades, shopping, and traveling, and it is being used in profusion for summer wash goods, such as linen, batiste, percale, calicoes, and lawns: more dressy grenadines have the outside belt passed all around the waist, instead of being confined to the back only. The front is cut double-breasted, but with very close high revers and collar, so that a chemisette may be worn when a habit shirt or dress waist is objectionable. The shoulder seams are very short, and the waist is as long as nature will permit. The front has no dart near the edge, but is shaped by a short seam taken quite far back, beginning low down in the armhole, and extending below the waist to the spot where the pockets are set on. When the garment is on, this looks like the "under arm" seam, and is important, as the fronts will draw and wrinkle if it is omitted. The bottom of the front is made very wide, in order that it may be draped very far back—beyond the sides rather than on them. The back of the polonaise fits smoothly, without a wrinkle at the waist, and consists of two simple sacque-shaped pieces, with ample skirt fullness added in the middle seam at the smallest taper of the waist. This fullness is folded underneath the seam, pleat upon pleat, showing the reverse of a triple box-pleat, and is then draped over the tournure by tapes in the manner described elsewhere. It is important that a string should be placed low down in the side seams of the skirt, and tied behind the person, to keep the drapery well toward the back and smooth on the sides. The waist and sleeves of all polonaises except those of wash goods should be lined with thin lining, silk or else soft Silesia. This lining extends two or three inches below the waist, and its edge is hemmed or bound separately from the waist. As we have said repeatedly, polonaise skirts should never be lined, as the drapery is spoiled thereby. To keep the back of the waist well adjusted, a belt (of tape, or else silk belt ribbon) is tacked on the under side to the three back seams and hooked in front. When the front is not belted, there is no necessity for an outside belt in the back, as the garment may have a button on the side seams to define the waist, but many ladies prefer an outside belt in the back, and this is passed under the front through slits in the side seams. Russia leather belts are worn with these garments, but the belt and sash are more usually made of the silk, velvet, or other material used for the collar, cuffs, etc. The sash consists of two long loops and two ends of uneven length cut diagonally. The sleeves are very close coat shape. The bottom of the polonaise is often finished by lace, a ruffle, or fringe, but is far more stylish if simply finished with a two-inch hem sewed in blind stitches that do not show on the outside, or else a two-inch facing with a tiny piping fold in the edge. We must not omit to add that loose front polonaises are often made single-breasted and closed in the neck. This pattern may be made so by turning in the extra part in front used for lapping. Only one row of buttons is then necessary, and a round turned-over collar is substituted for the revers collar.

MATERIALS, ETC.

The materials most used for loose front polonaises at present are summer camel's-hair and cashmere in the stylish colors, with silk skirts of a darker shade, or else black; entire suits are made of de baize and alpaca. Thick repped silk like the lower skirt is used for the collar, cuffs, sash, and pockets of woolen polonaises; these are lined with thin silk, and interlined with stiff foundation muslin to keep them in shape; velvet and watered silk are also used for trimming, and will be worn all summer. The buttons are large round wooden moulds two inches in diameter, covered with the trimming silk; they are placed in two rows straight down the front; from six to twelve buttons are in each row, according to fancy. Button-holes for them may be overcast, or else bound with silk in a substantial way now much admired. Two or three of the lower buttons are usually left unfastened. Two buttons are set on the elongated square pockets and two on each cuff. Oxidized silver buttons are appropriate for these woolen garments, but the real metal is expensive, and the imitation is soon defaced.

Costumes of the pretty striped summer silks are also made by this design. The trimmings are usually of a solid color, and the dress skirt is trimmed with two bias ten-inch flounces. Black taffeta silks with a double line stripe of white are very stylish when made in this way.

Correspondents who ask directions for making summer wash dresses will find all their wants supplied by this pattern, as its looseness makes it cool and pleasant for midsummer, and it is so simple that it can be easily washed. Gray undressed linen suits of this kind will be very popular, and Napoleon blue linen will be worn by stylish people. The edge of the whole polonaise and its small accessories should be faced and piped with a linen fold, either white, brown, or blue. Large pearl or imitation ivory buttons should be used, or else moulds covered with linen. The belt is of Russia leather. The dress skirt may have merely bias bands, or else two flounces either pleated or gathered. Striped batiste suits are similarly made, and trimmed with yak lace insertion of the same color. A velvet sash and velvet buttons add to the beauty of these. Black and brown silk skirts will be much worn under linen and batiste polonaises. White repped piqué suits are embroidered on the polonaise and flounce in thick close work, or else trimmed with English eyelet-hole needle-work. A new French fancy is to insert tucked bands with a row of hem-stitching between the tucks; this is not the real hem-stitching done with the needle, but is done by machinery, like Hamburg embroidery. Black velvet buttons and sash accompany white piqués. The neck of piqué polonaises is finished with a voluminous Medici fraise.

Percales, cambrics, lawns, and the plainest calicoes have this négligé polonaise and a short skirt with a single deep flounce cut straight and scant. A pretty lawn suit—white, with blue and rose-colored lines—had two narrow ruffles heading a deep Spanish flounce on the skirt; a four-inch ruffle edged the long polonaise, and was gathered as a ruff around the neck, with an inner ruffle of Valenciennes. The belt was four lapped folds of pale blue silk, and the pendent blue sash was lined with rose-colored silk. Cambrics and calicoes have bias bands stitched on the polonaise, or else a two-inch fold edges the garment, headed by a very narrow piping.

FRENCH FLOWERS.

Fresh importations of French flowers show quantities of mosses in their natural brownish-green shades, which are so much in favor under the name of olive tints. Tops of bonnets are covered with tiny beds of these fine mosses. Coronets are formed of them, or else they are mounted in clusters with blue forget-me-nots and tiny pink buds or slender fern leaves. Black Brussels net bonnets are effectively trimmed with moss coronets and ribbons of mossy green. Drooping bell-like fringes of oat husks are shown in the favorite olive hues, and tulles, crape, and Brussels net are used of the same shade. Among the novelties are beautiful "goffered leaves," with satin-like finish, that look as if they were made by embroidery. Quantities of wild roses are shown in clusters, branches, coronet wreaths, and trailing sprays; pink, crimson, and white wild brier roses are mounted together. Next there are many-petaled dwarf roses, English hedge-roses, and branches of thick pouting buds. Green rose-buds not yet bursted show the favorite olive and moss colors. These flowers are mounted so that they will serve either as a coronet or as a comb-like ornament on the back of the bonnet. Jet leaves have a lace foundation, in which fine jet beads are sewed, and are no longer heavy and cumbersome. Pompons are the favorite feather ornaments for summer hats. They are closely curled ostrich feathers at the base, with a long slender heron's feather erect in them; pompons made up of game feathers are also imported.

ENAMELED BUTTONS.

The latest novelty on imported dresses is enameled buttons of color on metal, and also of lacquered wood. The latter are Japanese, and are usually black, showing their favorite mountain-peak design in gilt. These are used on black silk dresses made at the best French houses.

FRENCH LINGERIE.

Pleated percale ruffs and under-sleeves of black or blue stripes on white have half-inch bands of linen stitched near the edge. Écru linen lingerie is in the regular English collar shape, with square cuffs fastened by three linen buttons. All-white sets are very sheer linen ruffles in side pleats, with an inch-wide hem turned up on the outside and hem-stitched. Frills and fraises grow fuller and longer gradually, until ladies are assuming what is ridiculed as the "pouter-pigeon" fashion. High standing linen collars have embroidered edges flaring outward in Medicis style, with a soft full box-pleated frill inside, made of muslin edged with Valenciennes lace. Almost all collars have the chemisette attached.

PERSONAL.

COMFORT, happiness, etc., etc., have been carried into a poor family in Brooklyn by a decision of the Court of Appeals. Nine years ago one CHARLES FOX made a will leaving all his property to the United States government to pay the national debt. It was not so much that FOX was personally troubled about the ultimate solvency of the government as that FOX didn't like his nephews and nieces. So when FOX "shuffled off," the United States claimed his property. The nephews and nieces contested. Surrogate HUTCHINGS, in his clear and concise way, decided that FOX was of sound mind, but that the United States could not take a land bequest of a deceased person in this State, but could accept personal property. Judge PIERREPONT conducted the case for the government; but ingenious and able as was his argument, it could not break the sound law and commonsense of the Surrogate, and the Court of Appeals unanimously sustains his opinion.

—Mr. CHARLES D. WARNER, author of My Summer in a Garden, is compared by the London Spectator to CHARLES LAMB and ARTHUR HELPS.

—Public men seem to be arriving at the conclusion that the pen is mightier than the politician. We perceive that Senator BUCKINGHAM and Congressmen STARKWEATHER and BARNUM, of Connecticut, have become proprietors of the Norwich Bulletin. Ten years ago that sort of thing was not looked upon as the chief end of man in Connecticut.

—"George Eliot," as a novelist, is placed by the British Quarterly above Sir WALTER SCOTT. "She paints with Miss AUSTEN'S unerring humor and accuracy, and with Sir WALTER'S masculine breadth." If the popular judgment is to be gathered from the number of intelligent readers of a novel, Middlemarch must be reckoned one of the most remarkable fictions of the present century.

—The Vocal Society of New York paid a graceful and well-deserved tribute to their founder, the late Dr. JAMES L. BROWN, by their recent memorial concert at Steinway Hall for the benefit of his family, which netted over five thousand dollars. This testimonial was peculiarly fitting, inasmuch as the society owed much of its success to Dr. BROWN'S unwearied efforts, for which he had steadily refused all pecuniary compensation during his lifetime. Dr. BROWN was a graduate of Columbia College, and attended the twentieth anniversary of his college class only two months before his death; and of the dozen members around the festive board no one seemed so hale and hearty as he. He died in February last, at the age of forty-two, on the very threshold of a brilliant success both in his profession and in the musical world, which he had earned by industry and perseverance, for he was essentially a self-made man. He was accounted one of the best choir leaders in the country, and was among the first to revive the now wide-spreading taste for chamber music. He was beloved in all the relations of life, and the society which he founded will keep his memory green by its charming glees and madrigals.

—A pleasant incident in the history of Chief Justice CHASE and Hon. SAMUEL HOOPER, M.C. from Boston, appears in the Tribune: "In 1861 Mr. CHASE, then Secretary of the Treasury, advertised for a loan of $14,900,000. The proposals were to be opened April 11. Next day the rebel batteries opened fire. No time could be more unpropitious to the negotiation of a loan. Mr. HOOPER happened to be in Washington, and was a subscriber for $100,000. The proposals fell short of the desired amount by about a million of dollars. Mr. CHASE sent for Mr. HOOPER, then almost a stranger, and asked him to take that sum in addition to what he had before subscribed, assuring him he should be protected against loss if unable to distribute the amount in Boston. He complied without hesitation, and paid in the whole sum without any aid from the Treasury. The sum may seem small now; it was large then, and the act was alike prompt, graceful, and patriotic."

—Mrs. MARY MAPES DODGE has resigned the editorial chair in Hearth and Home, which she has filled so admirably for the last four years, and gone to Europe for a brief term to recuperate her health. Rumors are afloat of her connection with a new magazine on her return. The notable article on the insanity of CAIN in the May number of Scribner's Monthly is attributed to her pen. We had always fallen back on CAIN as a genuine old-fashioned villain, but it seems that, like NERO, CALIGULA, HENRY VIII., and all the rest, he was no criminal after all; only an unfortunate victim of emotional insanity. Mrs. MARGARET E. SANGSTER succeeds Mrs. DODGE as editor of the boys' and girls' department in Hearth and Home.

—In this style does Miss E. STUART PHELPS write of Miss SMILEY, the Quakeress preacher: "She is a woman whose very name but a year or two since was strange to the ear of the general public; who has received neither a theological diploma, nor a ministerial ordination, nor even a license to preach; who has a voice as sweet as a robin's, and a face as serene as a Madonna's, and a courage as resolute as an apostle's, and a purpose as fixed as a Quaker's, and who wears her bonnet into the pulpit besides."

—What more "personal" than this? In an English church recently, after the publication of the bans of marriage by the minister, a grave elder, in a stentorian voice, forbade the bans between a certain couple. On being called on to explain, he said, pointing to the intended bride, "I had intended HANNAH for myself." HANNAH did not contemplate it by the same glasses.

—Musical folk think that M. GOUNOD is creating quite a desirable revolution in church music by his late compositions. He has gradually fallen into the style of the good old alla capella school, and may be considered as the modern PALESTRINA.

—ROBERT BRUCE, a converted Brahmin, has been spending some time in New England, addressing meetings in various towns.

—Parlor operas are now in fashion, and a very pleasant fashion it is, too. That was a successful entertainment of the kind which was lately given by Mr. W. F. WILLIAMS, the musical critic of the Evening Post, in his rooms in Fourth Avenue, wherein he was a whole orchestra in himself, playing on half a dozen instruments almost simultaneously, while the opera of Lucrezia Borgia was admirably sung by Mesdames CAIROLI and DE GEBELE and Messrs. ERRANI and COLETTI in the principal parts, followed by two acts of Norma, in which the soprano was Madame BELLINI-MAIRATTA, the niece of the great BELLINI. The new Mexican violinist, Señor DELGADO, also played for the first time in this country to an appreciative audience.

—On the occasion of Mr. EMERSON'S visit to Oxford, as the guest of Professor MAX MÜLLER, he was invited by the curators of the Taylor Institution at Oxford to deliver a course of lectures, but declined for want of time.

—Hon. E. B. MORGAN has made a second proposition to the trustees of Auburn Theological Seminary, viz., that if the citizens of Auburn will raise $225,000, he will add $75,000, and thus relieve the institution from the embarrassments it has labored under for many years, and place it on an enduring foundation.

—Dr. H. BENCE JONES, F.R.S., has recently deceased, after a long and severe illness. He was consulting physician at St. George's Hospital, was well known to the public as secretary to the Royal Institution, as the biographer of FARADAY, and by his many and valuable contributions to the advancement of science. He married some years since Lady MILLICENT, daughter of the Earl of Gosford.

—The Father of his Country is again the subject of honor, the University of Oxford having selected The Prince of Wales at the Grave of Washington as the NEWDEGATE poem.

—The late Dr. SIMPSON, of St. Louis, presented a fine practical specimen of the healthfulness of St. Louis and of his own professional skill. He was the oldest inhabitant of St. Louis, where he dwelt for sixty and four years, and died last week at the age of eighty-eight.

—Miss MARY LOW won the Sophomore prize for declamation over her male classmates last week at Colby University, Maine. Outtalked them all.

—Hon. CHARLES SUMNER obtained a divorce from his wife in Boston on the 10th inst., on the ground of desertion. Neither of the parties was present. After hearing one witness, and no opposition being made, a decree was granted. It seems to have been a little matter amicably arranged between all parties. Mrs. SUMNER has for some years resided in Europe.

—Bishop DOANE, of Albany, has gone to Europe, mainly to inspect the leading cathedrals in England and on the Continent, with a view to the erection of the new cathedral of All-Saints, in Albany.

—Two eminent clergymen, the Rev. Dr. EADIE and the Rev. Dr. CALDERWOOD, of Edinburgh, have arrived in this city as delegates from the United Presbyterians of Scotland to the Presbyterian General Assemblies in this country. Both are well-known scholars, Dr. EADIE by his commentaries, and Dr. CALDERWOOD as a professor in the university.

—By the recent death of the Rev. CYRIL PAGE, vicar of Christ Church, Westminster, one of the most curious relics of the past existing in a London church is likely to disappear, viz., the use of TATE and BRADY'S Psalter. Mr. PAGE was of opinion that the royal license formerly given to the doggerel versifications contained in this now almost forgotten volume constituted it the only legal hymn-book in the state Church, and therefore he consistently adhered to its use.

—The Rev. JOHN LOCKHART, now seventy-three years of age, has been pastor of the Presbyterian church at Russellville, Ohio, over forty years—a long time in a State so young, fussy, and impatient as Ohio—and, for that matter, all those young Western States are.

—Mr. JOHN A. ADAMS, of this city, was the guest of the Princess KUSIMESKOW, of Russia, and her niece, the Countess ORDA, last season at Rome, and an engagement is now announced between Mr. ADAMS and the Countess ORDA.

—Some two years ago Mr. WILLIAM WINTER, dramatic critic of the Tribune, was mainly instrumental in arranging a series of benefits for the family of the late GEORGE HOLLAND, by which some twelve thousand dollars were realized and invested in government securities. The example has been emulated by the Savage Club, of London, who have raised for the orphan children of the late J. C. BROUGH, dramatist, the sum of ten thousand dollars. The Savage Club is to London what the Lotos is to New York.

—Professor BAYNES, of St. Andrew's University, is editing a new edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica.

—The Rev. CHARLES KINGSLEY, whose clever novels have been published by the HARPERS, has been made a canon of Westminster. Short of a bishopric and some four or five deaneries, a canonry of Westminster is regarded as one of the most delicious plums that can come in the way of English ecclesiastics.

—DONALD M'KAY, commander of the Warm Spring Indians, is the son of a Scotch settler of the same name by an Indian woman. He is said to be an educated man, and during the rebellion was colonel of an Indian regiment in the Union service. He now holds a temporary commission from the government as captain.

—Madame DE HAZARD, the sculptress, has sent her three masterpieces, "L'Espérance," "Pace Generosa," and "L'Abbandonata," to Vienna. This accomplished lady is by birth a Russian. She has written many beautiful poems in French and Italian, speaks seven languages, and sings with great beauty and power.

—Prince BISMARCK is equally successful as paper-manufacturer and politician. His paper-mills at Varzin can not meet the English demand for the pasteboard which is manufactured from pine wood in them. His present mills work up 600 cords per annum. New ones now in construction will enable him to consume 1500 cords.

—Dr. WILLIAM H. HOLCOMBE, of New Orleans, owns a "Magdalen" painted by MURILLO. It is well preserved, very beautiful, and bears the painter's name. It was brought to New Orleans many years ago by a French family.

—When the Duke of Edinburgh and the daughter of the Czar are married they are to live half the year at least in Russia, and have one of the new houses on the quay in front of the Admiralty of St. Petersburg. The bride's fortune is to be a million of rubles. One of the chief causes of delay in the arrangement of the match has, it is said, been the wish on either side to stipulate for living the greater part of the year in England or Russia respectively. Hence the compromise of dividing the time equally between the two. A question of precedence in England is said to have contributed to this delay.

BORDER FOR COVERS, CURTAINS, ETC. VENETIAN EMBROIDERY.

Border for Covers, Curtains, etc.—Venetian Embroidery.

THIS border is suitable for trimming covers, curtains, etc, and also for ecclesiastical purposes, as, for instance, altar or pulpit covers, surplices, etc. It is worked on Swiss muslin, batiste, or fine linen with embroidery cotton, glazed cotton, or medium-sized thread. To work the border draw the design on the material or on a foundation of linen or paper, run the outlines of all the design figures, and then work the button-hole stitch bars, in doing which always carry the working thread along the outlines, in order to pass from one bar to another. Then cover the outlines with narrow and wide button-hole stitches. The knots which trim the outer edge, some of the design figures, and several circles of the foundation are worked in connection with the outlines. For each knot work at the corresponding point, close underneath the button-hole stitch last worked, two similar stitches, and then carry the working thread back to the point from which the work is to be continued. Work the lace stitches inside of the design figures as shown by the illustration. Cut away the foundation material underneath the lace stitches and the bars of the foundation.

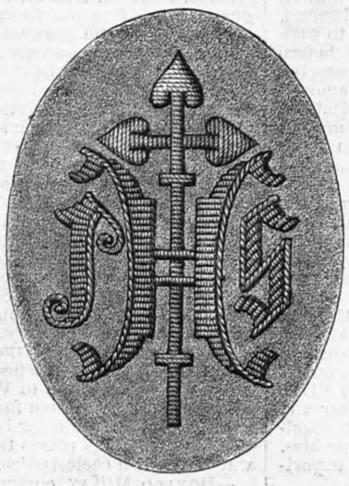

FIG. 2.—MEDALLION FOR COVER OF BIBLE OR PRAYER-BOOK.

Embroidery Design for Book-Mark for Bible or Prayer-Book.

FOR the foundation of this book-mark use light silk. Work the embroidery partly with saddler's silk and fine sewing silk in a darker shade of the color of the foundation in satin, chain, and half-polka stitch, and partly with gold cord. Silk lining of the same color, an edging of gold cord, and fine gold fringe complete the book-mark.

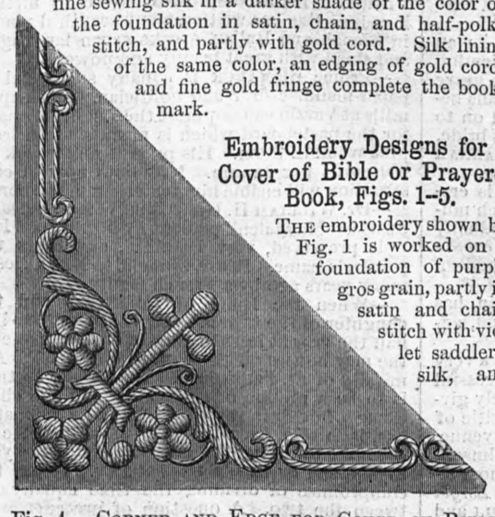

FIG. 4.—CORNER AND EDGE FOR COVER OF BIBLE OR PRAYER-BOOK.

Embroidery Designs for Cover of Bible or Prayer-Book, Figs. 1–5.

THE embroidery shown by Fig. 1 is worked on a foundation of purple gros grain, partly in satin and chain stitch with violet saddler's silk, and partly with gold braid and fine gold cord. The medallion and the cross are applied in violet velvet. Work the monogram and crown on the medallion with gold bullion, gold cord, and gold thread in satin and half-polka stitch. Instead of the monogram, the "In hoc signo" shown by Fig. 2 or the verse shown by Fig. 3 may be used for the upper side of the cover. The under side may then be ornamented with the monogram and with one of the corners and edges shown by Figs. 4 and 5. The corners are worked with saddler's silk in satin and half-polka stitch, and the edge of Fig. 5 with gold braid and gold cord. The cross in the corner of Fig. 4 may be worked with gold thread.

Lambrequin for Étagères, Baskets, etc.—Application and Raised Embroidery.

See illustration on page 357.

THIS lambrequin is suitable for trimming baskets, étagères, and corner brackets. In the original the foundation is of light gray cloth. The round flowers of the upper raised part are cut of violet and purple cloth, and the bell-shaped flowers of white cloth, and the leaves of green cloth in several shades. Embroider all the separate flowers and leaves with half-polka stitch veins of green silk, baste them on the foundation hollow, as shown by the illustration, and join them by means of stems and vines, which are worked with green and brown silk, partly in half-polka and partly in herring-bone stitch. The calyxes of the round flowers are simulated by knots of dark and light yellow silk. Work the remainder of the embroidery, as plainly shown by the illustration, partly with an applied strip of gray silk, partly with gray silk soutache, and partly in satin, half-polka, herring-bone, and knotted stitch, and point Russe with saddler's silk in several shades of gray. Button-hole stitch the scallops on the outer edge.

a wooden crochet needle, and on both sides of this foundation crochet one round of sc. (single crochet). Widen several st. at both ends in order to form the requisite rounding. After working this round fasten to the first st. with 1 sl. (slip stitch), crochet 1 ch. (chain stitch), and turn the work. Now work six rounds more of sc. (1 sc. on each sc. of the preceding round), but pass the needle always through the back veins of the stitches, and after the end of every round fasten to the first st. of the corresponding round, and turn the work. In doing this widen in such a manner that the work neither puckers nor draws. On this part crochet two rounds of sc. as shown by Fig. 2 between every two ribs. For the pocket piece make a foundation of 20 st., and on this crochet in a similar manner as in working the main piece, but at one end of the foundation neither widen nor fasten to a st., but, in order that the piece may finish off evenly there, crochet 1 ch. and turn the work. On this part work sc. also, and border the crosswise edge with two rounds of sc., working the first round with white, and the second with red zephyr worsted. Finally, join both parts, as shown by the illustration, with sc. of red worsted, and border the free edge of the soap-bag with one round of the same, in doing which at the same time work a loop, consisting of 9 ch., in the middle of the top, which serves to hang up or to close the soap-bag. On the middle of the pocket piece set a red button or a small ball made of red worsted.

A NEW METHOD FOR ORNAMENTING WINDOWS.

SOMETIMES we have windows which need a screen, and yet the use of a shade or curtain is undesirable. Ground glass is admirable for such purposes, or even a thin coat of white paint, but these are in no wise ornamental. Having experimented somewhat in this line, I give the following as a rather novel style of producing ornamental figures upon any clear glass, by covering it with a coat of crystals of much the same order as are seen upon a frosty morning before the sun has melted them away.

Dissolve sulphate of magnesia in hot ale so as to saturate it, or a solution of gum-acacia; when it is entirely dissolved, wash it over the window, and let it dry. This is the whole process, and if it is unsatisfactory the first time it is applied, wash it off by means of a rag and warm water, and try another coat. If nicely done, it will be very pretty for transom-windows or vestibule side lights.

MY MURIEL.

THE gloaming's reddening light lies low
Upon the woodland ways and seas,
And cool winds from the hill-side blow,
And, passing, whisper to the trees.
Yet is not this as other days—
My love, I will the meaning tell;
What say the seas and woodland ways
To thee, my Muriel?

Love's day is o'er, love's sun is set,
But us the sunset gleams infold,
For sweet love lingers with us yet,
Love's sunset changing all to gold;
For suns must set, and love must die,
And lips, not hearts, must say, "'Tis well,"
And hearts must bid a long good-by,
My sweet, sweet Muriel.

In golden after-time forget
The one who loved, staked all, and lost;
Forget me, love, sweet love, and yet
Canst thou forget how dear thou wast?
Farewell! farewell! it must be said,
Though my fond heart should break—farewell!
Forget me, think my love is dead,
As thine is, Muriel.

LADY ANNA.

BY ANTHONY TROLLOPE,

Author of "The Warden," "The Small House at Allington," "Barchester Towers," "The Golden Lion of Granpere," "Orley Farm," "The Eustace Diamonds," etc., etc.

CHAPTER IX.

IT ISN'T LAW.

ON the next morning Lady Anna was ill, and would not leave her bed. When her mother spoke to her, she declared that her head ached wretchedly, and she could not be persuaded to dress herself.

"Is it what I said to you last night?" asked the Countess.

"Oh, mamma, that is impossible," she said.

It seemed to the mother that the mention of the young lord's name had produced a horror in the daughter's mind which nothing could for the present subdue. Before the day was over, however, the girl had acknowledged that she was bound in duty, at any rate, to meet her cousin; and the Countess, forced to satisfy herself with so much of concession, and acting upon that, fixed herself in her purpose to go on with the project. The lawyers on both sides would assist her. It was for the advantage of them all that there should be such a marriage. She determined, therefore, that she would at once see Mr. Goffe, her own attorney, and give him to understand in general terms that the case might be proceeded with on this new matrimonial basis.

But there was a grievous doubt on her mind—a fear, a spark of suspicion, of which she had unintentionally given notice to Thomas Thwaite when she asked him whether he had as yet spoken of the proposed marriage to his son. He had understood what was passing in her mind when she exacted from him a promise that nothing should as yet be said to Daniel Thwaite upon the matter. And yet she assured herself over and over again that her girl could not be so weak, so vain, so foolish, so wicked, as that! It could not be that, after all the struggles of her life; when at last success, perfect success, was within their grasp; when all had been done, and all well done; when the great reward was then coming up to their very lips with a full tide—it could not be that in the very moment of victory all should be lost through the base weakness of a young girl! Was it possible that her daughter—the daughter of one who had spent the very marrow of her life in fighting for the position that was due to her—should spoil all by preferring a journeyman tailor to a young nobleman of high rank, of ancient lineage, and one, too, who by his marriage with herself would endow her with wealth sufficient to make that rank splendid as well as illustrious? But if it were not so, what had the girl meant by saying that it was impossible? That the word should have been used once or twice in maidenly scruple, the Countess could understand; but it had been repeated with a vehemence beyond that which such natural timidity might have produced. And now the girl professed herself to be ill in bed, and when the subject was broached would only weep, and repeat the one word with which she had expressed her repugnance to the match.

Hitherto she had not been like this. She had, in her own quiet way, shared her mother's aspirations, and had always sympathized with her mother's sufferings, and she had been dutiful through it all, carrying herself as one who was bound to special obedience by the peculiarity of her parent's position. She had been keenly alive to the wrongs that her mother endured, and had in every respect been a loving child. But now she protested that she would not do the one thing necessary to complete their triumph, and would give no reason for not doing so. As the Countess thought of all this, she swore to herself that she would prefer to divest her bosom of all soft motherly feeling than be vanquished in this matter by her own child. Her daughter should find that she could be stern and rough enough if she were really thwarted. What would her life be worth to her if her child, the Lady Anna Lovel, the heiress and only legitimate offspring of the late Earl Lovel, were to marry a—tailor?

And then, again, she told herself that there was no sufficient excuse for such alarm. Her daughter's demeanor had ever been modest. She had never been given to easy friendship, or to that propensity to men's acquaintance which the world calls flirting. It might be that the very absence of such propensity—the very fact that hitherto she had never been thrust into society among her equals—had produced that feeling almost of horror which she had expressed. But she had been driven, at any rate, to say that she would meet the young man; and the Countess, acting upon that, called on Mr. Goffe in his chambers, and explained to that gentleman that she proposed to settle the whole question in dispute by giving her daughter to the young earl in marriage. Mr. Goffe, who had been present at the conference among the lawyers, understood it all in a moment. The overture had been made from the other side to his client.

"Indeed, my lady!" said Mr. Goffe.

"Do you not think it will be an excellent arrangement?"

In his heart of hearts Mr. Goffe thought that it would be an excellent arrangement; but he could not commit himself to such an opinion. Sergeant Bluestone thought that the matter should be fought out, and Mr. Goffe was not prepared to separate himself from his legal adviser. As Sergeant Bluestone had said after the conference, with much argumentative vehemence—"If we were to agree to this, how would it be if the marriage should not come off? The court can't agree to a marriage. The court must direct to whom the property belongs. They profess that they can prove that our marriage was no marriage. They must do so, or else they must withdraw the allegation. Suppose the Italian woman were to come forward afterward with her claim as the widow, where then would be my client's position, and her title as dowager countess, and her claim upon her husband's personal estate? I never heard any thing more irregular in my life. It is just like Patterson, who always thinks he can make laws according to the light of his own reason." So Sergeant Bluestone had said to the lawyers who were acting with him; and Mr. Goffe, though he did himself think that this marriage would be the best thing in the world, could not differ from the Sergeant.

No doubt there might even yet be very great difficulties, even though the young Earl and Lady Anna Lovel should agree to be married. Mr. Goffe on that occasion said very little to the Countess, and she left him with a feeling that a certain quantity of cold water had been thrown upon the scheme. But she would not allow herself to be disturbed by that. The marriage could go on without any consent on the part of the lawyers, and the Countess was quite satisfied that, should the marriage be once completed, the money and the titles would all go as she desired. She had already begun to have more faith in the Solicitor-General than in Mr. Goffe or in Sergeant Bluestone.

But Sergeant Bluestone was not a man to bear such treatment and be quiet under it. He heard that very day from Mr. Goffe what had been done, and was loud in the expression of his displeasure. It was the most irregular thing that he had ever known. No other man except Patterson in the whole profession would have done it! The counsel on the other side—probably Patterson himself—had been to his client, and given advice to his client, and had done so after her own counsel had decided that no such advice should be given! He would see the Attorney-General, and ask the Attorney-General what he thought about it. Now it was supposed in legal circles, just at this period, that the Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General were not the best friends in the world; and the latter was wont to call the former an old fogy, and the former to say of the latter that he might be a very clever philosopher, but certainly was no lawyer. And so by degrees the thing got much talked about in the profession; and there was perhaps a balance of opinion that the Solicitor-General had done wrong.

But this was certain—that no one could be put into possession of the property till the court had decided to whom it belonged. If the Earl withdrew from his claim, the widow would simply be called on to prove her own marriage—which had in truth been proved more than once already—and the right of her legitimate child would follow as a matter of course. It was by no means probable that the woman over in Italy would make any claim on her own behalf—and even should she do so, she could not find the means of supporting it. "They must be asses," said the Solicitor-General, "not to see that I am fighting their battle for them, and that I am doing so because I can best secure my own client's interests by securing theirs also." But even he became nervous after a day or two, and was anxious to learn that the marriage scheme was progressing. He told his client, Lord Lovel, that it would be well that the marriage should take place before the court sat in November. "In that case settlements will, of course, have been made, and we shall simply withdraw. We shall state the fact of this new marriage, and assert ourselves to be convinced that the old marriage was good and valid. But you should lose no time in the wooing, my lord." At this time the Earl had not seen his cousin, and it had not yet been decided when they should meet.

"It is my duty to explain to you, Lady Lovel, as my client," said Sergeant Bluestone to the Countess, "that this arrangement can not afford a satisfactory mode to you of establishing your own position."

"It would be so happy for the whole family!"

"As to that I can know nothing, Lady Lovel. If your daughter and the Earl are attached to each other, there can be no reason on earth why they should not be married. But it should be a separate thing. Your position should not be made to depend upon hers."

"But they will withdraw, Sergeant Bluestone."

"How do you know that they will withdraw? Supposing at the last moment Lady Anna were to decline the alliance, would they withdraw then? Not a bit of it. The matter would be further delayed, and referred over to next year. You and your daughter would be kept out of your money, and there would still be danger."

"I should not care for that—if they were married."

"And they have set up this Italian countess—who never was a countess any more than I am. Now they have put her up, they are bound to dispose of her. If she came forward afterward on her own behalf, where would you all be then?"

"My daughter would, at any rate, be safe."

The Sergeant did not like it at all. He felt that he was being thrown over, not only by his client the Countess—as to which he might have been indifferent, knowing that the world at large, the laity as distinguished from the lawyers, the children of the world, as all who were not lawyers seemed to him to be, will do, and must be expected to do, foolish things continually. They can not be persuaded to subject themselves to lawyers in all their doings, and, of course, go wrong when they do not do so. The infinite simplicity and silliness of mankind and womankind at large were too well known to the Sergeant to cause him dismay, let them be shown in ever so egregious a fashion. But in this case the fault came from another lawyer, who had tampered with his clients, and who seemed to be himself as ignorant as though he belonged to the outside world. And this man had been made Solicitor-General—over the heads of half the profession—simply because he could make a speech in Parliament!

But the Solicitor-General was himself becoming uneasy when, at the end of a fortnight, he learned that the young people—as he had come to call them on all occasions—had not as yet seen each other. He would not like to have it said of him that he had thrown over his client. And there were some who still believed that the Italian marriage had been a real marriage, and the Italian wife alive at the time of the Cumberland marriage—though the Italian woman now living had never been the countess. Mr. Hardy so believed, and, in his private opinion, thought that the Solicitor-General had been very indiscreet.

"I don't think that we could ever dare to face a jury," said Sir William to Mr. Hardy, when they discussed the matter, about a fortnight after the proposition had been made.

"Why did the Earl always say that the Italian woman was his wife?"

"Because the Earl was a very devil."

"Mr. Flick does not think so."

"Yes, he does; but Mr. Flick, like all attorneys with a bad case, does not choose to say quite what he thinks, even to his own counsel. Mr. Flick does not like to throw his client over, nor do I, nor do you. But with such a case we have no right to create increased expenses, and all the agony of prolonged fallacious hope. The girl is her father's heir. Do you suppose I would not stick to my brief if I did not feel sure that it is so?"

"Then let the Earl be told, and let the girl have her rights."

"Ah! there you have me. It may be that such would be the juster course; but then, Hardy, can not you understand that though I am sure, I am not quite sure—that though the case is a bad one, it may not be quite bad enough to be thrown up? It is just the case in which a compromise is expedient. If but a quarter or but an eighth of a probability be with you, take your proportion of the thing at stake. But here is a compromise that gives all to each. Who would wish to rob the girl of her noble name and great inheritance if she be the heiress? Not I, though the Earl be my client. And yet how sad would it be to have to tell that young man that there was nothing for him but to submit to lose all the wealth belonging to the family of which he has been born the head! If we can bring them together, there will be nothing to make sore the hearts of any of us."

Mr. Hardy acknowledged to himself that the Solicitor-General pleaded his own case very well; but yet he felt that it wasn't law.

CHAPTER X.

THE FIRST INTERVIEW.

FOR some days after the intimation of her mother's purpose Lady Anna kept her bed. She begged that she might not see a doctor. She had a headache—nothing but a headache. But it was quite impossible that she should ever marry Earl Lovel. This she said whenever her mother would revert to that subject. "I have not seen him, mamma; I do not know him. I am sure it would be impossible." Then, when at last she was induced to dress herself, she was still unwilling to be forced to undergo the interview to which she had acknowledged that she must be subjected. At last she consented to spend a day in Bedford Square; to dine there, and to be brought home in the evening. The Countess was at this time not very full of trust in the Sergeant, having learned that he was opposed to the marriage scheme, but she was glad that her daughter should be induced to go out, even to the Sergeant's house, as after that visit the girl could have no ground on which to oppose the meeting which was to be arranged. She could hardly plead that she was too ill to see her cousin when she had dined with Mrs. Bluestone.

During this time many plans had been proposed for the meeting. The Solicitor-General, discussing the matter with the young lord, had thought it best that Lady Anna should at once be asked down to Yoxham—as the Lady Anna; and the young lord would have been quite satisfied with such an arrangement. He could have gone about his obligatory wooing among his own friends, in the house to which he had been accustomed, with much more ease than in a London lodging. But his uncle, who had corresponded on the subject with Mr. Hardy, still objected. "We should be giving up every thing," he said, "if we were once to call her Lady Anna; where should we be, then, if they didn't hit it off together? I don't believe, and I never shall believe, that she is really Lady Anna Lovel." The Solicitor-General, when he heard of this objection, shook his head, finding himself almost provoked to anger. What asses were these people, not to understand that he could see further into the matter than they could do, and that their best way out of their difficulty would be frankly to open their arms to the heiress! Should they continue to be pig-headed and prejudiced, every thing would soon be gone.

Then he had a scheme for inviting the girl to his own house, and to that scheme he obtained his wife's consent. But here his courage failed him; or it might be fairer to say that his prudence prevailed. He was very anxious, intensely eager, so to arrange this great family dispute that all should be benefited, believing, nay, feeling positively certain, that all concerned in the matter were honest; but he must not go so far as to do himself an absolute and grievous damage, should it at last turn out that he was wrong in any of his surmises. So that plan was abandoned.

There was nothing left for it but that the young Earl should himself face the difficulty, and be introduced to the girl at the lodging in Wyndham Street. But, as a prelude to this, a meeting was arranged at Mr. Flick's chambers between the Countess and her proposed son-in-law. That the Earl should go to his own attorney's chambers was all in rule. While he was there the Countess came—which was not in rule, and almost induced the Sergeant to declare, when he heard it, that he would have nothing more to do with the case. "My lord," said the Countess, "I am glad to meet you, and I hope that we may be friends." The young man was less collected, and stammered out a few words that were intended to be civil.

"It is a pity that you should have conflicting interests," said the attorney.

"I hope it need not continue to be so," said the Countess. "My heart, Lord Lovel, is all in the welfare of our joint family; we will begrudge you nothing if you will not begrudge us the names which are our own, and without which we can not live honorably before the world." Then some other few words were muttered, and the Earl promised to come to Wyndham Street at a certain hour. Not a word was then said about the marriage. Even the Countess, with all her resolution and all her courage, did not find herself able in set terms to ask the young man to marry her daughter.

"She is a very handsome woman," said the lord to the attorney, when the Countess had left them.

"Yes, indeed."

"And like a lady."

"Quite like a lady. She herself was of a good family."

"I suppose she certainly was the late Earl's wife, Mr. Flick?"

"Who can say, my lord? That is just the question. The Solicitor-General thinks that she would prove her right, and I do not know that I have ever found him to be wrong when he has had a steadfast opinion."

"Why should we not give it up to her at once?"

"I couldn't recommend that, my lord. Why should we give it up? The interests at stake are very great. I couldn't for a moment think of suggesting to you to give it up."

"I want nothing, Mr. Flick, that does not belong to me."

"Just so. But then perhaps it does belong to you. We can never be sure. No doubt the safest way will be for you to contract an alliance with this lady. Of course we shall give it up then, but the settlements would make the property all right." The young Earl did not quite like it. He would rather have commenced his wooing after the girl had been established in her own right, and when she would have had no obligation on her to accept him. But he had consented, and it was too late for him now to recede. It had been already arranged that he should call in Wyndham Street at noon on the following day, in order that he might be introduced to his cousin.

On that evening the Countess sat late with her daughter, purposing that on the morrow nothing should be said before the interview calculated to disturb the girl's mind. But as they sat together through the twilight and into the darkness of night, close by the open window, through which the heavily laden air of the metropolis came to them, hot with all the heat of a London July day, very many words were spoken by the Countess. "It will be for you to-morrow to make or to mar all that I have been doing since the day on which you were born."

"Oh! mamma, that is so terrible a thing to say!"

"But terrible things must be said if they are true. It is so. It is for you to decide whether we shall triumph, or be utterly and forever crushed."

"I can not understand it. Why should we be crushed? He would not wish to marry me if this fortune were not mine. He is not coming, mamma, because he loves me."

"You say that because you do not understand. Do you suppose that my name will be allowed to me if you should refuse your cousin's suit? If so, you are very much mistaken. The fight will go on, and as we have not money, we shall certainly go to the wall at last. Why should you not love him? There is no one else that you care for."

"No, mamma," she said, slowly.

"Then what more can you want?"

"I do not know him, mamma."

"But you will know him. According to that, no girl would ever get married. Is it not a great thing that you should be asked to assume and to enjoy the rank which has belonged to your mother, but which she has never been able to enjoy?"

"I do not think, mamma, that I care much about rank."

"Anna!" the mother's mind as she heard this flew off to the young tailor. Had misery so great as this overtaken her after all?

"I mean that I don't care so much about it. It has never done us any good."

"But if it is a thing that is your own, that you are born to, you must bear it, whether it be in sorrow or in joy; whether it be a blessing or a curse. If it be yours, you can not fling it away from you. You may disgrace it, but you must still have it. Though you were to throw yourself away upon a chimney-sweeper, you must still be Lady Anna, the daughter of Earl Lovel."

"I needn't call myself so."

"Others must call you so. It is your name, and you can not be rid of it. It is yours of right, as my name has been mine of right; and not to assert it, not to live up to it, not to be proud of it, would argue incredible baseness. 'Noblesse oblige.' You have heard that motto, and know what it means. And then, would you throw away from you in some childish phantasy all that I have been struggling to win for you during my whole life? Have you ever thought of what my life has been, Anna?"

"Yes, mamma."

"Would you have the heart to disappoint me, now that the victory is won—now that it may be made our own by your help? And what is it that I am asking you to do? If this man were bad; if he were such a one as your father, if he were drunken, cruel, ill-conditioned, or even heavy, foolish, or deformed; had you been told stories to set you against him, as that he had been false with other women—I could understand it. In that case we would, at any rate, find out the truth before we went on. But of this man we hear that he is good and pleasant; an excellent young man, who has endeared himself to all who know him: such a one that all the girls of his own standing in the world would give their eyes to win him."

"Let some girl win him, then, who cares for him."

"But he wishes to win you, dearest."

"Not because he loves me. How can he love me when he never saw me? How can I love him when I never saw him?"

"He wishes to win you because he has heard what you are, and because he knows that by doing so he can set things right which for many years have been wrong."

"It is because he would get all this money."

"You would both get it. He desires nothing unfair. Whatever he takes from you, so much he will give. And it is not only for this generation. Is it nothing to you that the chiefs of your own family who shall come after you shall be able to hold their heads up among other British peers? Would you not wish that your own son should come to be Earl Lovel, with wealth sufficient to support the dignity?"

"I don't think it would make him happy, mamma."

"There is something more in this, Anna, than I can understand. You used not to be so. When we talked of these things in past years you used not to be indifferent."

"I was not asked then to—to—marry a man I did not care for."

"There is something else, Anna."

"No, mamma."

"If there be nothing else, you will learn to care for him. You will see him to-morrow, and will be left alone with him. I will sit with you for a time, and then I will leave you. All that I ask of you is to receive him to-morrow without any prejudice against him. You must remember how much depends on you, and that you are not as other girls are." After that Lady Anna was allowed to go to her bed, and to weep in solitude over the wretchedness of her condition. It was not only that she loved Daniel Thwaite with all her heart—loved him with a love that had grown with every year of her growth—but that she feared him also. The man had become her master; and even could she have brought herself to be false, she would have lacked the courage to declare her falsehood to the man to whom she had vowed her love.

On the following morning Lady Anna did not come down to breakfast, and the Countess began to fear that she would be unable to induce her girl to rise in time to receive their visitor. But the poor child had resolved to receive the man's visit, and contemplated no such escape as that. At eleven o'clock she slowly dressed herself, and before twelve crept down into the one sitting-room which they occupied. The Countess glanced round at her, anxious to see that she was looking her best. Certain instructions had been given as to her dress, and the garniture of her hair, and the disposal of her ribbons. All these had been fairly well obeyed; but there was a fixed, determined hardness in her face which made the mother fear that the Earl might be dismayed. The mother knew that her child had never looked like that before.

Punctually at twelve the Earl was announced. The Countess received him very pleasantly, and with great composure. She shook hands with him as though they had known each other all their lives, and then introduced him to her daughter with a sweet smile. "I hope you will acknowledge her as your far-away cousin, my lord. Blood, they say, is thicker than water; and if so, you two ought to be friends."

"I am sure I hope we may be," said the Earl.

"I hope so too—my lord," said the girl, as she left her hand quite motionless in his.

"We heard of you down in Cumberland," said the Countess. "It is long since I have seen the old place, but I never shall forget it. There is not a bush among the mountains there that I shall not remember—ay, into the next world, if aught of our memories are left to us."

"I love the mountains; but the house is very gloomy."

"Gloomy indeed. If you found it sad, what must it have been to me? I hope that I may tell you some day of all that I suffered there. There are things to tell of which I have never yet spoken to human being. She, poor child, has been too young and too tender to be troubled by such a tale. I sometimes think that no tragedy ever written, no story of horrors ever told, can have exceeded in description the things which I endured in that one year of my married life." Then she went on at length, not telling the details of that terrible year, but speaking generally of the hardships of her life. "I have never wondered, Lord Lovel, that you and your nearest relations should have questioned my position. A bad man had surrounded me with such art in his wickedness that it has been almost beyond my strength to rid myself of his toils." All this she had planned beforehand, having resolved that she would rush into the midst of things at once, and if possible enlist his sympathies on her side.

"I hope it may be over now," he said.

"Yes," she replied, rising slowly from her seat, "I hope it may be over now." The moment had come in which she had to play the most difficult stroke of her whole game, and much might depend on the way in which she played it. She could not leave them together, walking abruptly out of the room, without giving some excuse for so unusual a proceeding. "Indeed, I hope it may be over now, both for us and for you, Lord Lovel. That wicked man, in leaving behind such cause of quarrel, has injured you almost as deeply as us. I pray God that you and that dear girl there may so look into each other's hearts and trust each other's purposes that you may be able to set right the ill which your predecessor did. If so, the family of Lovel for centuries to come may be able to bless your names." Then with slow steps she left the room.

Lady Anna had spoken one word, and that was all. It certainly was not for her now to speak. She sat leaning on the table, with her eyes fixed upon the ground, not daring to look at the man who had been brought to her as her future husband. A single glance she had taken as he entered the room, and she had seen at once that he was fair and handsome, that he still had that sweet, winsome boyishness of face which makes a girl feel that she need not fear a man—that the man has something of her own weakness, and need not be treated as one who is wise, grand, or heroic. And she saw, too, in one glance how different he was from Daniel Thwaite, the man to whom she had absolutely given herself; and she understood at the moment something of the charm of luxurious softness and aristocratic luxury. Daniel Thwaite was swarthy, hard-handed, black-bearded—with a noble fire in his eyes, but with an innate coarseness about his mouth which betokened roughness as well as strength. Had it been otherwise with her than it was, she might, she thought, have found it easy enough to love this young earl. As it was, there was nothing for her to do but to wait and answer him as best she might.

"Lady Anna," he said.

"My lord!"

"Will it not be well that we should be friends?"

"Oh—friends—yes, my lord."

"I will tell you all and every thing—that is, about myself. I was brought up to believe that you and your mother were just—impostors."

"My lord, we are not impostors."

"No; I believe it. I am sure you are not. Mistakes have been made, but it has not been of my doing. As a boy, what could I believe but what I was told? I know now that you are and always have been as you have called yourself. If nothing else comes of it, I will at any rate say so much. The estate which your father left is no doubt yours. If I could hinder it, there should be no more law."

"Thank you, my lord."

"Your mother says that she has suffered much. I am sure she has suffered. I trust that all that is over now. I have come here to-day more to say that on my own behalf than any thing else." A shadow of a shade of disappointment, the slightest semblance of a cloud, passed across her heart as she heard this. But it was well. She could not have married him, even if he had wished it, and now, as it seemed, that difficulty was over. Her mother and those lawyers had been mistaken, and it was well that he should tell her so at once.

"It is very good of you, my lord."

"I would not have you think of me that I could come to you hoping that you would promise me your love before I had shown you whether I had loved you or not."

"No, my lord." She hardly understood him now—whether he intended to propose himself as a suitor for her hand or not.

"You, Lady Anna, are your father's heir. I am your cousin, Earl Lovel, as poor a peer as there is in England. They tell me that we should marry because you are rich and I am an earl."

"So they tell me—but that will not make it right."

"I would not have it so, even if I dared to think that you would agree to it."

"Oh no, my lord; nor would I."

"But if you could learn to love me—"

"No, my lord; no."

"Do not answer me yet, my cousin. If I swore that I loved you—loved you so soon after seeing you—and loved you, too, knowing you to be so wealthy an heiress—"

"Ah, do not talk of that."

"Well—not of that. But if I said that I loved you, you would not believe me."

"It would not be true, my lord."

"But I know that I shall love you. You will let me try? You are very lovely, and they tell me you are sweet-humored. I can believe well that you are sweet and pleasant. You will let me try to love you, Anna?"

"No, my lord."

"Must it be so, so soon?"

"Yes, my lord."

"Why that? Is it because we are strangers to each other? That may be cured—if not quickly, as I would have it cured, slowly and by degrees; slowly as you can wish, if only I may come where you shall be. You have said that we may be friends."

"Oh yes—friends, I hope."

"Friends at least. We are born cousins."

"Yes, my lord."

"Can not you call me by my name? Cousins, you know, do so. And remember this, you will have and can have no nearer cousin than I am. I am bound at least to be a brother to you."

"Oh, be my brother!"

"That—or more than that. I would fain be more than that. But I will be that at least. As I came to you, before I saw you, I felt that whenever we knew each other I could not be less to you than that. If I am your friend, I must be your best friend—as being, though poor, the head of your family. The Lovels should at least love each other; and cousins may love, even though they should not love enough to be man and wife."

"I will love you so always."

"Enough to be my wife?"

"Enough to be your dear cousin—your loving sister."

"So it shall be—unless it can be more. I would not ask you for more now. I would not wish you to give more now. But think of me, and ask yourself whether you can dare to give yourself to me altogether."

"I can not dare, my lord."

"You would not call your brother, lord. My name is Frederic. But Anna, dear Anna"—and then he took her unresisting hand—"you shall not be asked for more now. But cousins, new-found cousins, who love each other, and will stand by each other for help and aid against the world, may surely kiss, as would a brother and a sister. You will not grudge me a kiss." Then she put up her cheek innocently, and he kissed it gently—hardly with a lover's kiss. "I will leave you now," he said, still holding her hand. "But tell your mother thus: that she shall no longer be troubled by lawyers at the suit of her cousin Frederic. She is to me the Countess Lovel, and she shall be treated by me with the honor suited to her rank." And so he left the house without seeing the Countess again.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

YEARS hence the fashionable summer trip will be, not to Niagara, the White Mountains, nor even to the Yosemite Valley, but to the Yellow Stone National Park. Situated near the head waters of the Yellow Stone River, in the Territories of Montana and Wyoming, and comprising nearly 2500 square miles, this tract of land contains the most wonderful and unique curiosities in the world. The Park is accessible only from Montana, the Wyoming side being bounded by a rugged mountain range, whose precipitous peaks, crowned with glittering snow, rise often to the height of four or five thousand feet. The region of the hot springs and geysers presents a most grand and novel scene. Through the misty, steaming atmosphere hundreds of geysers project water with terrific force to various heights—some twenty feet, some two or three hundred feet. The grand cañon of the Yellow Stone, from one to three thousand feet in depth and forty miles in length, is doubtless the most wonderful chasm in the world. The Yellow Stone Lake, lying nearly eight thousand feet above the level of the ocean, embosomed amidst mountains, surrounded by hot springs, and dotted with verdant islands, the great cataracts, the immense forests, and numerous other natural features, combine to make the scenery of this Park surpassingly grand and romantic. When convenient roads are laid out, the traveling community will examine for themselves.

Ladies' feet appear to grow in Western countries to a gigantic size, corresponding to other developments of nature—as trees, mountains, and garden products. We infer this from two statements in an Omaha journal. In one column it mentions, as a warning, that the sidewalks of the city are full of holes "the size of a lady's foot;" and a little farther on we read that a boy of six years old fell into one of these holes. We are sure they can not have specially small boys at the West, so we are forced to the above conclusion.

The French lady who has long been accustomed to seek nourishment in needles, recently found that in spite of a good supply daily taken, she did not thrive on her favorite fare. In fact, she died; and a post-mortem examination revealed quantities of needles imbedded in the flesh near the backbone.

An estimate has been made of the profits of the various persons interested in making a book, with the following result. Approximately, out of one dollar, which is paid, for example, for one copy of an ordinary book, the money goes thus:

To the author	$0 10
To the publisher	0 10
To the paper-maker	0 15
To the book-binder	0 15
To the printer and stereotyper	0 10
To the retail bookseller, or to him and his customer	0 40
	$1 00

It is gravely narrated in a journal of high scientific position that a citizen of New Brunswick, New Jersey, having long been tormented by a tooth in which the part apparently unsound was so small as not to admit the insertion of a fine needle, went to a dentist's office and ordered it to be pulled out. After it was out it was cracked with a hammer, and found to be a mere shell, in which resided a six-legged nondescript bug, which ran briskly about the table on being released. The gentleman is certain that the insect could not have made its way through the perforation from without. "Now what is the difference," queries a friend at our side, "between this story and that same tooth?" Ans. One is too thin, and the other is tooth out.

The city of Vienna has three specialties—the manufacture of pipes, leather goods, and embroidery of silk and linen.

A cheerful wedding was that which lately was celebrated in the stone parlor of a Chicago jail. John, the bridegroom, had been caught in a violent attempt to appropriate to his own use the earnings of an unoffending traveler, and after being lodged in the jail, was condemned to serve two years in the penitentiary. But in better days John had won the heart of Topsy, a faithful damsel, who scorned to desert her lover in his distress. When it came to be known that he must be incarcerated, she resolved to share his sufferings, so far as might be. A marriage was agreed upon, a justice summoned, the ceremony performed, and for a bridal tour they paced the stone corridor for several hours. Then John departed for Joliet, and Topsy was left to wait and watch for him a couple of years in lonely patience.

Recent writers on health urge the planting of shade trees in our large cities on the ground that they would be most valuable as disinfectants. It is well known that trees exert a powerful influence in preventing the spread of malaria. In addition to the comfortable shade they afford in the hot season, a constant evaporation is going on from their surface, producing a cooling and wholesome effect upon the surrounding atmosphere. It is, moreover, the special function of trees to absorb during the night the poisonous gases produced by the decay of animal and vegetable substances, and to return pure oxygen in the day.

A lecturer in Boston recently discussed the question whether the whale could have swallowed Jonah—skeptics having objected that the size of the whale's throat would not admit the passage of so large a body. The lecturer informed his audience that undoubtedly Jonah judiciously refrained from venturing into the whale's stomach, but took up his abode in the mouth of the monster, where his accommodations were really palatial. The whale's mouth, according to the learned professor, is large enough to comfortably accommodate a man like Jonah and half a dozen companions; the soft tongue would make a nice carpet, and the infusorial "clio" would serve as food!

The Japanese Gazette furnishes various items of news which indicate the progress of events in that country. The whole country is to be thrown open to foreigners, provided all who travel in the interior submit to the laws of Japan; but the government is endeavoring to perfect a suitable code of laws based on European models. It is proposed to hold a universal exhibition in Japan four years hence. A law prohibiting smoking in the streets is vigorously enforced throughout the empire. Doubtless the Japanese who visited America for the purpose of studying its governmental arrangements were seriously annoyed by being on some occasions in the rear of an inveterate street smoker, and they reported their sentiments on the subject; hence the above law, which is worthy of American consideration. A daily paper is now published in Jeddo by the "Society for the Dispersion of Darkness."

Wild beasts seem not to be free from the ills to which human flesh is heir. A couple of grizzly bears belonging to the London Zoological Gardens have been afflicted with cataract. An eminent English oculist was honored by being called in to see the patients, and was requested to perform the needful operations. Chloroform was administered, and all was successful until one of the bears, recovering too quickly, attacked his keeper. Some time afterward the oculist was requested to operate upon one of the tigers. He respectfully declined.

The Empress of Japan seems to be a sensible woman, and evidently thinks no good can result from a woman making herself needlessly hideous. It is reported that the Empress has resolved to depart from the long-established Japanese custom which compelled women, on their being married, or reaching a marriageable age, to shave their eyebrows and blacken their teeth. Certainly Japanese maidens are to be congratulated.

Cerebro-spinal meningitis is a disease not easily cured, and, in general, fatal. But the preventives to an epidemic of this disease are undoubtedly good drainage, pure water, cleanliness, and attention to common hygienic rules.

Perhaps some of our readers who highly esteem the delicate flavor of the sardine may not know that the sardine fishery is carried on from July to November all along the western coast of France, Douarnenez and Concarneau being two of the largest stations. They are caught in nets, and immediately washed, salted, and dipped in boiling oil. They are then placed in different-sized boxes, which are filled with the finest oil, and soldered down. If sardines are properly prepared, age improves them—the longer the boxes are kept unopened, the more mellow do the fish become.

A Massachusetts clergyman says that "school-teaching requires the whole manhood, the entire womanhood. It means the shaping of characters, the changing of careless, dull, or willing children into promising youth. It is a work much higher than scribbling articles for magazines."

The treasury of the Home Missionary Society of New Hampshire has been enriched by over twenty-five hundred dollars, which sum was last year contributed by the Women's One Cent Societies. This makes about six thousand dollars raised by these societies, the interest of which goes to aid needy congregations in the State.

FANCY-DRESS BALL OF THE LADY MAYORESS OF LONDON.

ONE of the most popular festivities of London is the Lady Mayoress's ball, which is graphically depicted by the accompanying illustration, and which this year took place on the anniversary of Shakspeare's birthday, April 23. Some six hundred guests were invited, to see the arrival of whom thousands of curious folk assembled before the civic palace. The guests first approached a barrier, where their invitation cards were examined by the City Marshal and his myrmidons; then they delivered to another set of functionaries cards bearing their names and the characters which they assumed; and then they passed through avenues of plants and flowers into the presence of the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, who enacted the characters of Louis XIV. and his queen. The Grand Monarque was surrounded by his court, composed chiefly of the members of the Lord Mayor's family, and attired with the most exact attention to historical accuracy. Each guest in succession was presented to their mock majesties, and met with a right royal reception. Thence they proceeded to the ball-room, held in the Egyptian Hall, where there were twelve masters of the ceremonies, attired as medieval jesters. Dancing soon began, and was carried on with increased vigor after supper, till the daylight mingled with the garish gas. The whole entertainment was a most thorough success, and will long be pleasantly remembered by the citizens of London and their friends. We can here mention but a few of the characters assumed. There was Britannia with her shield and trident, Mercury with his caduceus, Jaques without his customary melancholy, Mother Hubbard bereft of her dog. The notable characters of history temporarily laid aside their prejudices, for Mary of Scotland chatted affectionately with her cousin Queen Bess, and Charles I. and Oliver Cromwell were seen dancing in the same set of quadrilles. There was Romeo and Fra Diavolo; there was Henry VIII. and Sir Francis Drake; there was William, the sweetheart of Black-eyed Susan; there were Queens of Light and Queens of Night, and numberless Red Cross Knights, Turks, Japanese, Uhlans, Hussars, and Mandarins. To the male sex a fancy ball ought to be especially attractive, because it affords a chance of getting out of the sad-colored garments of ordinary life. A man with a taste for color must often wish when dressing for the evening that he could transport himself to the last century, and strut about, like the author of the Deserted Village, in a peach-bloom coat.

THE LADY MAYORESS'S FANCY-DRESS BALL AT THE MANSION-HOUSE, LONDON.

"YOU MUST KNOW BANKS!"

MY wife and I resolved to retire from the perplexities and publicity of a town life into the innocent ease and obscurity of a country village; and having made up our minds to the move, we tried to settle the whereabouts. After answering a hundred advertisements of small and singularly unobjectionable houses, and visiting some fifty of them, we fixed on one on the outskirts of the large village of Sefton. We imagine ourselves scientific, so we made our choice with a view to ferns, aquaria, flowers, mosses, and other roots of experimental philosophy. Of course our new neighbors looked on us as overlearned, seeing these symptoms of abstruseness, and complimented us by declaring we had quite a museum in-doors and horticultural gardens out. We had not succeeded in obtaining much celebrity before, but we soon became even more celebrated than we desired.

As one neighbor called after another, and all were introduced to our curiosities, natural and artificial, the general cry was, "Oh, you should know Banks! You must know Banks!"

"Who is Banks?" we ask.

"Such a clever man! quite a genius. Has been all over the world, and knows every thing. Lives alone in that lovely place the other side of the village, and has the most beautiful garden and fernery in the county."

"What is he like?" asks my wife, interested.

"Well, like clever people generally. Careless of his appearance, and peculiar-looking."

"Humph!" say I, glancing at my wife to see how she will take this; for, between ourselves, she considers herself clever, and is especially particular in her dress, and is any thing but peculiar-looking.

"That theory was exploded when Hannah More died. Clever people are no longer peculiar," she says, satirically.

"Every body is clever nowadays," I remark, sententiously.

At the end of each day, as our last visitor departed, my wife would say, "How strange that Banks has not called! We must know Banks."

We are naturally fond of society, and were soon admitted into the various coteries of the village and its neighborhood. We went to dinners, afternoon teas, suppers, wherever we were invited, and soon became quite popular people; but we never met Banks. Either he was not at home, or he had excused himself on this plea or that, or he had not been invited, for "it was no good to invite him; he always declined."

Even in this seventh heaven of country love and peace there was bitterness, and my wife's happiness was alloyed because she could not "know Banks."

"If they would not din his name into my ears forever, I should be indifferent," she said; "but we really must make his acquaintance."

"We have no daughters to marry, so why are you so anxious about a bachelor?" I ask, beginning to feel jealous. .

"He is evidently the only person in the place worth knowing," she replies. "Besides, he gives to every thing. I see his name down for every charity, and I want to ask for a subscription to my pet Dorcas."

"Write him a polite note in the third person."

"I will; then we must know Banks."

The sentence had become a proverb and joke between us.

My wife wrote, and in a week or so received a note and five pounds, with Mr. Banks's compliments. She composed so elaborate an acknowledgment that I accused her of writing a love-letter, and getting fast in her old age. I got a good snubbing in return.

We were celebrated for our little dinners; but even they were not as charming as they used to be, for lack of this unattainable element, and I now grew anxious to secure it. We passed and repassed his house—paused to look at his profusion of flowers and ferns—sought for him at church, where, we were told, he was to be seen twice each Sunday, but failed to see him. Once we were walking with a friend, who exclaimed, suddenly, "There is Banks! I want to speak to him," and we perceived a tallish man in the distance, whose only remarkable feature was a wide-awake. On another occasion a young lady was with us, and she said, with a blush and simper, "Here is Mr. Banks!" as somebody passed rapidly and raised his hat.

"He is nothing particular, after all," said my wife, glancing back.

"Oh, he is charming! Don't you know Mr. Banks?" said the young lady.

One day, however, when we were near his house, we saw a man working in the garden. My wife said, impulsively,

"There is the gardener! I must ask him for a bit of that curious fern."

She started across the road, and I followed humbly, as I am always compelled to do. I hear her make her requests in the most gracious and bland manner, and see the gardener turn and approach the railing.

"You have such a lovely garden. It does you so much honor," she says, while I examine the man.

"Will you walk in and look at it, and make choice of any specimens you fancy?" he said, politely but nervously, and with a slight impediment in his speech.

He went toward a small gate leading into the shrubbery at the bottom of the garden, my wife skirting the railing in the same direction, and I following with a chuckled "Now we shall know Banks."

"You may be sure he is not at home, or we should not be asked in," said she.

I always say that it is no wonder I am jealous, for my wife's manner is certainly frightfully attractive. It was quite as courteous to the gardener as it could have been to the enviable Banks himself.

"So much obliged to you. This is quite a paradise," she says, passing through the gate held open by the gardener, and adding, carelessly, "I suppose Mr. Banks is not at home?"

"I am Mr. Banks," was the curt reply.

Thus, at last, we knew Banks! My wife was confused for a moment, during which brief period I came to the rescue, with—

"You must excuse our intrusion; for having heard of your choice ferns, we could no more resist their attraction than a moth a candle's. My wife is the most resolute specimen-hunter in the world."

"And we have heard so much of you and your treasures that we have been dying to be acquainted with you ever since we have been here," said that lady, recovering herself.

"I intended to do myself the pleasure," began Banks, and paused.

"We have hoped and despaired so long that we have anticipated you," said my wife, laughing, and venturing to look at Banks for the first time.

He was a man of about forty, or perhaps less, young and yet old-looking—with that expression of mingled reserve, sweetness, and melancholy which women call "interesting." He had a broad forehead, well lined either with thought or care, and deep-set, expressive gray eyes. They were rather like my wife's, and I perceived that when they glanced at one another, a sort of understanding, one might almost say mesmeric sympathy, passed from one to the other.

We were soon all three engaged in conversation on topics of mutual interest. He had not been overrated, and was certainly an agreeable, clever, and in some sort scientific man. He showed us his garden, which was laid out with great taste, and which he said he cultivated mainly himself; his fernery, containing every specimen of fern capable of bearing the English climate; and a rockery covered with various species of parasitical plants, mosses, and lichens that must have cost him years of labor to collect and make flourish. But what pleased my wife and me most, in spite of our scientific proclivities, was a dell outside the garden, which held a rustic seat, and through which a tiny rivulet ran. Here was every wild flower that bounteous spring lavishes on ungrateful man, and every bird that sings in England's air. Crumbs were visible, for which Mr. Banks excused himself by saying that he had got into the habit of strewing them in winter, and continued it all the year round.

"The nightingale favors me sometimes," he said, "and some of the birds are quite tame."

As if in proof of his assertion, a thrush burst into song so near us that I turned in surprise, and saw the bird so close that I could have caught it. I was, in effect, about to make the attempt, but Banks arrested me, saying, quietly,

"I never molest them, and I have educated Flush to respect their privileges."

He pointed to a shaggy terrier following close at his heels.

"That was Mrs. Browning's dog!" said my wife, who was a devoted lover of that great poetess.

"Yes. I named this dear friend after him. Mrs. Browning understood that a dog was truly one's fastest friend. My Flush, like hers, has "'Watched within a curtained room,

Where no sunbeam broke the gloom
Round the sick and weary.'"

At the sound of his name Flush sprang upon his master, and licked his hand, while I remarked that Mrs. Browning's letters to Mr. Wedgewood concerning Flush were almost more delightfully earnest than her poem.

As we could not remain in this enchanted land forever, we prepared to leave it. My wife's hands, and arms even, were filled with floricultural treasures, so that she might easily have bowed herself off; but shake hands she would and did; so we all parted more as friends than strangers.

We expected a visit from Banks the next day—at least my wife did—but we were disappointed. The week passed, and he did not come.

"Your fascinations have failed for once," I say.

"I shall send him that lycopodium he was asking about, and then he must come," she replies.

"We will know Banks!" I cry, suspiciously.

The lycopodium went, and a note of thanks was returned; still he did not call. But he waylaid us as we again passed his house—we always were passing his house—and graciously acknowledged the gift. Down came a quick, pattering, unexpected April shower, and we had no umbrella. Politeness compelled him to offer shelter, and we went into his house.

"Well, we have succeeded at last, Mr. Banks," I say, when we are happily engaged in surveying his small aquarium and vaunting our own; Flush was at his side.

He looks inquisitive, my wife reproachful, for she knows me, and expects something disagreeable; but I continue provokingly:

"You will not come to the mountain, so the mountain has forced itself upon you. My wife thinks you the only person worth knowing in Sefton, and, woman-like, she has made your acquaintance."

I believe they both blushed as he muttered something about "too much honor." I know my wife looked indignantly at me.

"Will you waive ceremony and dine with us to-morrow?" I continue. "We have many pursuits in common, and we have some things that may interest you. We shall be quite alone, and have not even a marriageable daughter."

He smiled, and his smile was winning. I was conscious of being better dressed, even better looking, but I could not boast of such a smile as that; and I glanced at my wife to see if she had observed it. Of course she had, for nothing ever escapes her.

"I go little into society; but I shall be very happy," he said, to my great surprise and my wife's undisguised delight. She had compassed her end at last, and we should know Banks! No sooner did we reach home than she began preparations for the petit diner of the morrow.

"You never took half so much trouble for me!" I grumble.

"You were never half so interesting," she retorts.

Well, we triumphed in having Banks all to ourselves. We were trois têtes dans un bonnet; for as soon as he overcame a slight shyness at finding himself reversing the etiquette of society, he entered into all our pet theories with evident interest. He was a delightful companion; and I regarded my wife's pleasure in securing him with my usual cynical jealousy. I must not forget to say that he was accompanied by Flush, for whose presence he apologized by the assurance that they were inseparable.

By degrees we also grew to be nearly inseparable—that is to say, my wife tamed him so judiciously that he came to us whenever he liked, and our intimacy gradually ripened into friendship. We discovered that he had been a great traveler, an extensive reader, a wandering philanthropist; but of his private history we could glean nothing. He was known to be of good family and ample means, and there was no ascertained blight on his name or fame; but he lived alone, and seemed to have few personal friends. He was, however, a good deal from home, and my wife had no doubt but that he went to visit his relations.

As she was the most consummate and determined of match-makers, my jealousy was excited because she did not propose to find a wife for Banks. I mooted the subject cautiously one day, when she assured me she had been thinking of it, but that she intended him to supply my place when kindly Nature had finished her work with me.

"I am the tougher of the two," I say, grimly.

"Well, I have considered that side of the question also," she replied, reflectively; "so I mean to keep you both as long as I can, and be consoled by the survivor when one shall depart."

"What if you should go first?" I ask. "Then it will be for me to look out, and I shall at once propose for Addy."

"Addy would no more have you than the Great Mogul: but she would just suit Banks," says my wife, reflectively. "Let us ask her to come."

"With all my heart; but you know she will see no one but ourselves," I reply.

"That will suit very well; for then you and she can amuse one another, and I will improve the occasion with Banks. We do know Banks."

My wife always acts on the spur of the moment; for, like her sex generally, she is what has been delicately called "a creature of impulse." She wrote her invitation at once, talking to me the whole time.

"It will be rich fun to try and bring them together. He declines to meet our friends; she has given up society since her husband's death. I should have consoled myself long ago, for he was no better than a mummy or a jelly-fish! But I could not change my name for Banks! Adelaide Percy could never become Adelaide Banks!"

"I thought you intended us to remain as we are until you could marry Banks and I Addy," I suggest.

"I don't quite understand your position," she remarks, signing her name in letters that filled a line.

Neither did I; but I suggested that we should be like the Kilkenny cats—a story that puzzled me when I was young, and puzzles me still.

The Adelaide Percy to whom this suddenly improvised invitation was sent was the widow of Marmaduke Percy, Esq., M.P. for ——shire. We had been on a visit to her just before we had the happiness first "to know Banks," and shortly after her husband's death. Why she had married old Percy, and why she grieved for him now that he had been so considerate as to leave her rich, handsome, and still sufficiently young, nobody could guess; except, perhaps, my wife, who made even broader "Guesses at Truth" than the admirable brothers Hare. She said that she was convinced Addy had been forced into the match; for had she not been her schoolfellow and bosom-friend, and did she not know that she would never have married an old man if she could have helped it? What girl would?

Be this as it may, we had found Mrs. Percy a highly prosperous but somewhat reserved and sobered lady. Her handsome country-house was well appointed, and all her domestics appeared much devoted to her. We heard and saw that she was a good mistress and judicious friend to the poor neighbors who surrounded her. Really a friend, and not an inquisitor, as some ladies are reported to be who make a profession of the poor. But she saw no society beyond the ordinary morning callers who performed their daily duty-rounds in their various vehicles; and but for innate good-breeding, she would not have seen these. Still, we had a delightful time with her, for she was well-read, and had traveled before her marriage, making the most of her opportunities; moreover, she ciceroned us to all places where we fancied our coveted specimens might be obtained.

My wife, whose curiosity is as remarkable as her match-making and impulse, learned from one and another of her people that she had been a devoted wife to the most selfish and tiresome of husbands; nursing him, through illness and still worse irritability, with unswerving patience and sweetness; but she also learned that she had never been either more cheerful or less reserved than we found her.

"A model woman!" I exclaimed. "Calm, sober, reticent!"

"Tiresome! I hate people from whom one can not pump up a secret; and Addy won't tell even me what has changed her so!" said my wife, pressing a flower she was about to dry.

"Perhaps it was that railway accident abroad, in which her only brother was killed," I suggested, examining a piece of moss.

"More likely a tiresome husband. Nothing depresses the spirits like a husband," she replied, demurely.

"Yours are lively enough," I rejoined. "That speaks well for me."

We remained a month with Addy, and left her much as we found her—grave, thoughtful, and reserved, but truly affectionate and warm-hearted.

My wife seemed unable to exist through the two days that intervened between her invitation and Addy's answer. Happily for me, Addy was tractable, and promised to come, provided she were not expected to see people.

"Banks can not be called people. She must know Banks!" says my most unyielding of wives, pulling my hair with delight.

"You will get into hot water between them, like that leaf you are skeletoning," say I, ungrammatically, if scientifically.

Addy arrived; and whether it was change of air or the sense of once more visiting old friends, she greeted us cheerfully and with evident pleasure. Her pale cheeks flushed and her handsome eyes flashed as my wife welcomed her with all the effusion of a school-girl.

"You are quite alone? you will have no company?" were among her first questions.

"One can not be said to be alone, when one is two; and every body knows three are no company," said my wife, evasively.

Banks was invited for the very next day, also under the impression that we were alone; but, as my wife insisted again, "three's no company."

We were getting through the twilight ten minutes before dinner, when a distant but shrill bark announced Flush. Addy was almost animated at that moment; but my wife looked at me doubtfully.

"Oh, Addy, I am so sorry! I verily believe this is a tame friend of ours and his dog. We must ask him to dinner: indeed, I dare say he has come on purpose; for he has carte blanche here, and I forgot to give him carte noire on your account," said my wife, with shameless effrontery.

Addy seemed about to escape, when Banks entered unannounced.

"Only an old friend and school-fellow of mine," whispered my wife, as she rose to meet him, and muttered some sort of inaudible introduction.

He was taken in, but was too much of a gentleman to run away; so he seated himself near my wife, and began to talk at one end of our good-sized drawing-room, while I engaged Addy in conversation at the other. She was seated with her back to the conservatory, and her tall elegant figure was half in light, half in shadow. Her low voice must have been inaudible to our companions; but the echo of theirs reached us. Just as dinner was announced, she said, hastily,

"Who is he?"

And I replied, as I offered my arm,

"Oh, don't you know Banks? I thought every body knew Banks."

When our partie quarrée was formed, and I was mentally rubbing my hands at my gustatory prospects, I glanced at our guests to see how they had taken this infringement of our compact. Addy was gazing at her empty plate as if it were a mesmerist, and she a hapless medium. She was pale and motionless, and the color had gone from her lips. I could not have believed that the presence of a stranger could have produced such an effect, and began to think there was some obstinacy of temper at the bottom of her misanthropy. I looked from her to Banks. He was talking to my wife, and bowling out soup for her, looking rather "put out," it must be confessed.

"Do have some soup, Addy? You eat nothing," said that diplomatist, as Addy shook her head at our neat parlor-maid.

"Some fish, then? You are ill, dear?" she added, seeing how pale our guest was.

"No, no. Pray don't," said Addy, casting an incomprehensible glance of entreaty at my wife, and gulping down a large glass of water.

Banks started, dropped the soup-ladle, and looked at his vis-à-vis for the first time. I shall never forget his face as he saw that grand profile; for Addy was as handsome as a Cleopatra.

"Can this be love at first sight?" I asked myself.

His face grew crimson; his brows met as with an angry frown, his deep eyes flashed, and he half rose, as if about to leave the dinner-table. Flush rose also, with an inquiring bark; but, putting him down almost roughly, he recovered himself, and said, in a low, hoarse voice,

"I have had the honor of meeting Mrs. Percy before."

Addy, in turning her imploring eyes from my wife, had encountered those of Banks. She was red enough now, and there was an expression in her face of a pain so intense that my wife was alarmed. She made a slight movement, nevertheless, in return for a formal bow of grim civility from Banks; but her eyes again returned to the mesmeric plate, and her face to its rigid pallor. I could not resist a malicious glance at my wife, who was, I perceived, ashamed of her management. She was not to be beat, however. She dashed at once into her pet subjects, and engaged Banks in conversation on them, appealing now and then to Addy to confirm facts relative to the flora of her neighborhood, or some foreign incident. Addy replied in monosyllables; but I had never heard Banks so eloquent or agreeable. He and my wife kept up the conversational ball between them—tossing it from gardens to museums, from museums to picture-galleries, and finally letting it fall in Italy. I had time fully to enjoy my petit diner; for not a word could I get from Addy, and not one could I thrust in between this collision of tongues. Only once, when my wife suddenly mentioned Milan, did I remark any other sign of acquaintanceship between our friends. They appeared to look at one another involuntarily, but only for a moment; the mesmeric plate and my mesmeric wife drew them apart again irresistibly.

I never passed so uncomfortable a dinner. It was worse than cold soup and ill-cooked venison; but it was over at last, and the ladies withdrew. If women are hyperinquisitive, men are rationally inquisitive. I felt a reasonable curiosity concerning the previous meetings of Banks and Addy, so I put the former a few delicate questions.

"Strange that you two should have met before. How, when, and where?"

I thought my facetious introduction of this interesting game would excite a smile; but it produced a frown.

"In Italy — years ago. What excellent wine!" was the response.

"You do not appear to be well acquainted; but I hope you will improve on your slight intimacy while Mrs. Percy stays with us," I continued. "She is one of the most amiable and accomplished women I know, and I am sure you would like her."

"I scarcely think I should. I do not care for female society," he replied; and I could get no more out of him.

We found the ladies even more silent than we had been, and they did not, as is their rule, brighten up when we appeared. But Banks grew exceedingly lively, and was so devoted to my wife that I remarked aside to Addy that I began to feel jealous. It was strange how he lingered on—strange how he looked from time to time at immovable Addy, who sat with her elbow on the table, shrouding her face with a white hand, on which was the ring which had bound her to old Percy, and no other. She had left off her weeds, and was only in slight mourning—something black and white, I remember it was, which became her wonderfully.

When at last he and Flush rose to go, she rose also; and when he had wished my wife and me good-night, and was about to make her a distant bow, she walked toward him and held out her hand. The action must have been premeditated, for it had the calm dignity of a certain thoughtfulness, which was touching even to the by-standers, and overpowering to him who took the hand, held it a moment, then let it go without speaking.

What did it all mean? I resolved to find out with my rational inquisitiveness, my wife having failed with her hyperinquisitiveness.

"And you have had the advantage of us all these years, Addy?" I said; "you do know Banks!"

"Yes," said Addy, with a large tear in her eye.

"Do tell us all about it; we are dying to know."

"I met Mr. Banks abroad at the saddest time of my whole life," said Addy, in the same calm, premeditated sort of way as the previous outholding of her hand. "His mother and my brother were killed in that frightful railway accident at Milan, and he and I were left alone. He was very good to me. Do not ask me any more, dear, dear friends."

She sat down and burst into tears. It was our last attempt at curiosity, for we knew that the frightful catastrophe which had caused the death of a brother she loved with all her heart had been the precursor of a long illness and brain-fever. We had heard that she was alone at the time, and that, until her parents reached her, she had been indebted to strangers for care and aid. Still we could not account for her peculiar kind of emotion on meeting Banks, or for his strange manner.

"There is something under the rose," said my wife.

"Your match-making may as well be stowed away with it," quoth I.

"On the contrary, I shall invite Banks again every day and all day," said she.

But the following morning we ascertained that our restless friend had left home for an indefinite period, and his servants did not know where he was gone. It was my wife's pleasure that Addy should not be told this, and we prevailed on her to remain with us longer than she intended. Her manner grew fitful and excitable, and my wife declared that she started at every sound, and turned red and pale at every bell. I began to hint that she was not, after all, the piece of calm perfection I had imagined, but a mere woman; and my wife required to know what I could desire better.

More than a month passed thus, when we were suddenly informed that an old and favorite horse belonging to Banks was ill, and that he had been telegraphed for, and had returned immediately. He had often told us that he had two faithful friends, his horse and dog.

"We must go and see after him," said my wife. "If that stupid old horse dies, he will shoot himself, and leave orders that they shall be buried together. Addy, there are marvelous recipes for moribund quadrupeds in that huge folio over the dining-room window. Look them out while we are away. Chivers will bring you the steps; but take care you don't break your neck, or we shall have to add you to the hecatomb."

Addy was struggling with some emotion, but turned upon this into my piece of calm perfection again.

We found Banks in the stable in the utmost distress. The horse was apparently dying.

"How kind of you!" he said, wringing my hand.

"My father had a horse just in this state, and one of those old recipes cured him," said my sagacious wife.

"Where is it? How can I get it?" asked Banks. "May I go with you and procure it, and have it made up at the chemist's at once?"

He had great faith in my wife's judgment; so we all hurried off together, leaving the horse to the groom and farrier. He outstrode us in his excitement, and was in the hall while we were barely on the threshold. Addy came out of the dining-room, breathless, exclaiming, "I have found them. How is he—how is the horse?"

They met face to face, and we heard him say, "Good heavens! Adelaide again!" as he strove to hurry past her.

"Oh, this is cruel! Let us be friends!" she cried, desperately.

"Friends! with one who has been the ruin of my life!—never! I have but one friend, and he lies dying," he said, in a low hoarse voice.

Flush understood him, and barked a sharp protest.

"Ay, I forgot my poor Flush," he added, stooping over the dog, whose large eyes looked as reproachful as Adelaide's.

She hastened up stairs as he entered the hall, with the words, "Hard! unforgiving!" on her lips.

We found the folio open at the recipes, and two or three copied out in her clear large handwriting. My wife selected one, and gave it to Banks, who crumpled it up in his hand, but hurried with it to the chemist's. I accompanied him, and my wife ran up to Adelaide.

She recounted the scene to me afterward, and I said it should be dramatized as sensational, thereby giving great offense.

She found Addy on her knees, in an agony of weeping, her face buried in her bed, her arms outstretched over it. My calm piece of perfection! What anomalies these women are! Of course my wife threw her arms about her, mingled her tears, and so forth, calming her by degrees. I can just imagine the stately Addy, encircled by my blonde, impulsive, satirical little wife, and the diverse feelings of the pair. But violent emotion sometimes produces confidence, and Addy's ended in a spasmodic relation of some passages of her history connected with Banks.

It appeared that she and her brother were traveling in Italy at the same time that Banks and his mother were, and that they made a casual acquaintance as they met occasionally at different places. They chanced to be all in the same train at the time of a fearful railway collision, which caused the death of many passengers. Poor Addy was frantically calling on her dead brother, when Banks came to her, himself in the terrible agony of the sudden consciousness that his mother, whom he devotedly loved, was also killed. He promised to find her brother if she would but consent to withdraw from the horrible scene, and she, injured herself, fainted at his side. He carried her away, and gave her into the charge of some of the people who had gathered to the spot, while he returned to watch for the dead.

When she recovered consciousness she found herself in a small railway station, surrounded by strangers. She tried to rush back to the scene of the accident, but she could not; for, although not seriously injured, she was unable to move. Carriages came from Milan in course of time, and Banks returned to her and carried her to one, into which he also got. He had previously seen the dead bodies of those they each loved best conveyed toward that city. Even I can not think without intense pain of that journey; what must they have felt? My impression is that they must have been attracted to each other before this time, and that they therefore found some consolation in a growing mutual attachment; but Addy owned to no such feelings; she only spoke of the tender, respectful, unselfish sympathy of him afflicted like herself.

When they reached a hotel at Milan he confided her to the care of the landlady, having previously ascertained the address of her parents; then he gave way to his own grief.

Some time elapsed before her parents arrived, during part of which their dead were buried side by side in a cemetery at Milan, and she was delirious. She got better, however, and would leave her bed and go into a room where she could see and thank Banks. It is pretty evident that she must have loved him ere this. How could she have helped it? Still she did not confess to it.

Her father and mother arrived at last. My wife knew them well, and disliked them particularly. They were narrow-minded, ambitious people, whose one object in life seemed to be to amass money for their only son, and to make a grand match for their daughter. However, Addy only said that Mr. Banks did his best to console them for their loss, and to amuse them while she continued ill.

I take it for granted that the upshot of it all was that the young people fell over head and ears in love. It was apparent from Addy's disjointed account that Banks did not leave Milan until she did, and that they must have understood one another. She particularized their last meeting as having taken place in the cemetery where he had buried their beloved dead. She had resolved to see it, and he had taken her thither. My wife gathered with difficulty that a promise or engagement of some sort passed between them over the graves, on which they left emblematic flowers, and that love sprang out of death.

I am not sentimental, but even my imagination grows vivid when calling up the scene—the grief and beauty of Addy; the intensity of feeling of her remarkable lover; the cemetery; the deep blue of the Italian sky.

We could not discover whether Addy's parents were asked, and refused consent, at Milan, but it evolved that they left that place for England, while Banks pursued his travels alone. At any rate, he held the promise sacred; and so, doubtless, did Addy, until she had to endure the persecution of her father and mother. This, at least, was my indignant wife's version of the story, who knew those worthies, and declared that they had forced Addy into a marriage with old Percy about two years after her brother's death.

While these disclosures were being dragged to light at our house, I was nursing Banks's old horse in his stables with him. The potion, or mash, or whatever it might be called, had such wonderful effect—probably because Addy had turned out the recipe—that, to my unspeakable relief, the excellent quadruped revived, and his master's joy and gratitude were so great that I thought he would have kissed us both, as well as the doctor and groom. He certainly did embrace the horse, whose name I afterward discovered to be Milan—the groom having been wont to call him Millum, with a sort of interrogative doubt, as if ill informed of the orthography.

Banks accompanied me homeward, and was still pouring out his thanks when we met my wife. She greeted us with,

"We were so anxious about the horse that we could not rest. Addy was even more fussy than I; but I see by your faces that her recipe has been successful."

Banks stammered out something, while my wife came between us, and went on addressing him carelessly.

"I think you said that you met Mrs. Percy abroad?"

"Yes."

"Before her marriage?"

"Yes."

A pause, and I break in with, "She was wonderfully handsome."

"Was? Is, you mean. You men never think a woman good-looking after thirty-five," cries my wife.

"I should not dare to say that in your presence," I reply.

Banks smiled.

"It was too bad of them to marry her to that old Percy," she continued.

"Them? Whom?" asked Banks, involuntarily.

"Her parents. They were arbitrary and ambitious, and she was sacrificed like the rest of us," she replied, bowing to me.

"And he was got rid of, like the rest of us," I said, returning the mock salute.

Banks's face was aflame. I never saw any fellow change countenance so often in so short a space of time. At last he said, grimly,

"No woman ever marries against her will."

"I am sure I did, and you know what a victim I am," said my wife; and he smiled again.

"You will come to dinner," she continued. "I have a new moss, and my husband has made a discovery quite Darwinian."

"Not to-day—quite impossible," he said, hurrying off.

"We shall expect you," she cried, waving her hand.

It was nearly dinner-time when we got back, and we found Addy ready. She was calm, but the marks of her late emotion were visible enough. She told us that she had made arrangements to leave us the following morning, and that her maid was packing up. We combated this resolution in vain.

We were late for dinner, and I hurried Addy off, saying to my wife, "It is no good to wait."

"Provoking man!" she exclaimed.

"Who? which?" I asked.

"Both! all! every man I ever saw!" she replied.

We had begun, when there was a sharp bark and ring, and Banks actually appeared. He had dressed hastily, yet with even more than the French "four pins" of care.

"I could not resist the new moss and the Darwinian discovery," he said, glancing at Addy, and bowing nervously.

She made no movement, but looked at my wife reproachfully. She was, however, resolved to hide all emotion, and began to talk as naturally as she could. By degrees the conversation became sufficiently easy, and my hopes of a quiet dinner—faint, at first—were realized. I had not, at that time, heard Addy's story, so I hazarded a remark at dessert which savored more of the hyperinquisitive than the prudent.

"So odd you two should have met abroad! Were you long acquainted?"

I watched the effects of this venture. Addy's cheeks were crimson, and Banks's eyes flashed as he saw it.

"We met, as people do on the Continent, by chance; and parted by chance also, I suppose," he said, nonchalantly. "You remember our last encounter?"

A sudden pain must have struck at his heart, for his face turned deadly pale. He had said more than he intended.

"Yes, I remember," said Addy, with an entreating glance at my wife, who moved to leave the room.

When they were gone, Banks fell into a reverie, and I maliciously interrupted it by saying:

"You do not know what an intolerable matchmaker my wife is. I am charmed to see her circumvented for once. She was bent on bringing you two together, and you hate one another beforehand. It surprises me; for Addy is generally much beloved, and you are not altogether odious."

"Did she—did Adelaide—did Mrs. Percy say she hated me?" he asked, impetuously.

"Not in so many words; but her manner implies it, much as yours does."

He smiled sadly, and said his manner was terribly awkward.

Addy played and sang well—divinely, my wife said, who uses exaggerated terms, like the rest of her sex; so when we were again assembled, we asked her for some music. She consented at once, as she always does; for she is neither nervous nor silly. I know I am terribly provoking, as my wife says; but I can no more help it than another man can help being amiable; so when Addy asked me what I should like, I said,

"Moore's melodies are all the fashion again, Banks, and I rejoice, for I like the old songs. Mrs. Percy sings them so well. Let us have the one with the doubtful simile of the sunflower, Addy. You know which I mean. 'The heart that has truly loved never forgets;' though I have watched a hundred sunflowers, and have never yet seen one 'turn to her god when he sets.'"

"Nor have I," said Banks, watching Addy's tremulous fingers as they tried to strike the first chords.

She sang the desired song with difficulty, but perfect sweetness and expression. Toward the end her voice trembled slightly, but she commanded it.

"Did you ever hear her sing before?" I asked of Banks.

"Never," he replied, moving his chair so that we could not see his face.

Addy had what is called a sympathetic voice, and I was sure that it had reached his heart. When she ended, and was about to rise, my wife detained her at the piano.

"Why do poets invent fables to rouse our feelings?" said Banks, hoarsely. "You sing a song in which you can not believe."

"I am not answerable for my songs; yet I believe in this one, in spite of the sunflower," said Addy, half sadly, half lightly, beginning another at our request.

"That strain again; it had a dying fall," we all said, or implied by our significant silence, as she sang song after song.

Banks spoke never a word; but he quietly drew nearer and nearer the piano, until he was close to Addy. Was she conscious of the proximity? She gave no sign save in the tremolo of that voce simpatico: and that might have been according to the modern school of singing, which is a perpetual roulade.

However, it was very sweet and touching; and when at length the clock struck one sharp reproachful stroke, reminding us that the small hours had begun, we all started in amazement. Banks rose hastily to wish us good-night. He took Addy's offered hand and held it a moment, gazing into her pathetic face. There were tears in her eyes, and, I believe, moisture in his.

"Thank you. Music was invented to unman us," he said, and was gone.

To our surprise and annoyance, Addy kept to her resolution, and we accompanied her to the station the next morning. She was profuse in her gratitude to us, but she persisted in repeating, "It is best, it is best." We put her into a first-class carriage, in which was no other passenger, at her particular request, for she said she wished to be alone. We were making our last adieus through the window, and my wife was extracting a promise of return, when I saw Banks fuming up the platform. I nudged my wife, who mastered the occasion intuitively. I went to meet him, saying, in the elegant language of the period, "Where are you off to?"

"I am going abroad—I will write," he answered.

"Just in time; jump in here!" I exclaimed, pushing my wife aside, and opening the door of Addy's compartment.

He obeyed, not perceiving the lady.

"Take care of her, Mr. Banks. So glad you have an escort, Addy!" cried my wife, as the train steamed off instantly.

Addy looked after us with a pale, troubled, reproachful face; but there was no redress either for her or Banks.

"Suppose they leap out of the windows," suggested my wife. "A sentimental lover's leap!"

"The railway will be the best match-maker," said I.

And so it proved. A letter arrived by the next post from Addy, entreating us to go to her—for—for—she was engaged to Mr. Banks. She was so happy! and it was all due to us. The following day Banks reappeared. He actually called my wife "My dear," when he announced the fact that he was not going abroad after all, but—but—was going to be married instead.

"Then we shall not only know Banks, but Mrs. Banks!" said I.

And so "the curtain falls."

PARIS GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THOSE DREADFUL AMERICANS.

JUST now, when countless steamers, overflowing with the wealth and fashion of the United States, are plowing their way over the Atlantic from every port of America, it may not be amiss to say a few words again on a subject that you perhaps are all tired of, but on which there still remains much to be said, viz., how to manage in the cities of our Old World with regard to those necessary items of life, food and lodging. You will get plenty of sound and wise advice from friends in London, I dare say, for your guidance in that immense and hospitable metropolis, and you will be told, and I hope will believe it, that a cordial welcome awaits you in the hearts of the English people. Our legislators may squabble over their mutual bungles, and do their best to draw us into the fight, and set the peoples at loggerheads like their rulers; but on both sides we have proved to them, thank Heaven, that "we know a trick worth two of that." We are true to the primeval bond of brotherhood that joins our two races, and we respect one another; and when we come together, we don't as a rule find it very hard work to love one another a bit. If you have not yet found this out, please try it. Well, now, all the same, you will many of you be grievously disappointed, and I fear often very angry, at what you will call English coldness and exclusiveness. You will not find the salons of the court or of the English nobility open to you by the mere process of knocking at them, as you did in Paris in the empire days. If your aim is to gain admittance within these charmed circles, you must come furnished with good personal introductions, or you may as well stay quietly at home in New York or Boston. English people, as a nation, are decidedly exclusive among themselves: the rings that mark off the "sets" in society might be of fire, so impassable are they to outsiders, and this national characteristic is apt to strike strangers painfully and disagreeably. Americans must make up their minds to take us as they find us, and to accept our oddities for what they are worth—the growth of example, habit, and atmospheric influences of many kinds—and not be offended or hurt if the English show coldly, and to an external disadvantage, beside our gushing and expansive neighbors across the Channel. One thing I must mention, in case it should be overlooked by your English friends in council, if you want to get any entrée into society at all, you must live in a good neighborhood, and you must not go to a boarding-house. The boarding-houses in London are not disreputable, in the worst sense, as they are in Paris, but they are altogether infra dig. Ladies and gentlemen never frequent them. You may in a few sea-side ones meet retired navy and army officers and old maiden ladies, but this is the exception. You never meet any one in society there, and your chance of getting into that Valhalla yourself is null and void if you go to one. You will find the hotels enormously expensive, as much so, I understand, as those of New York; but I am glad to see our leading newspapers are taking up the side of hospitality and national repute in this case, and are fighting your battles beforehand to protect you against the Shylocks of those caravansaries. The most moderate and comfortable way of managing for families who are not millionaires will be to take furnished lodgings, where the service and cooking can be done for them by the servants of the landlord or landlady. These furnished apartments are often kept by widows of good position and reduced circumstances; and strangers, if they fall luckily, are very well cared for by the mistress of the house, and spared the endless fleecing and worries of servants hired for a few months, and among the least reliable ranks, for good ones are not to be picked up in London by foreigners.

But it was of Paris I meant to speak when I opened this subject. Paris is sure to come after London. For is it not said that all good Americans expect to go there when they die? Come, then, ye good ones, while still in the flesh, and enjoy the delights of your earthly paradise to your hearts' and your purses' content. But don't, for the sake of your fellow-creatures rooted in the happy land, make all necessaries of life more exorbitantly dear than you have already done by your extravagance. To you I would say, As far as possible steer clear of furnished apartments, and go to hotels. There are plenty of nice ones, not magnificent palaces like the Grand Hôtel and the Louvre, but quiet, comfortable, and well-situated houses, where you will be well off, and not certainly at greater expense than if you go to apartments (furnished) and take to your arms a brood of vipers and vampires in the shape of servants. There are thieves all over the world, and strangers are proverbially the prey of this particular race of thieves every where, but I defy you to match in Europe or America the Paris servants for squeezing money out of an employer's pocket in every conceivable way. Their skill in this direction would be amazingly entertaining if one could watch it from neutral ground; but, except Charles XII. of Sweden, who held his leg and whistled while the surgeons were cutting it off, we have few instances of the patients taking so stoical a view of the situation. Keep clear of the servants, whatever you do! If you must take a furnished apartment, then, instead of hiring a cook, take a friend's advice and make an agreement with the nearest restaurant or confectioner (but the latter most likely would be dearer, though I am not sure) to send you dinner every day for so many. You will find it infinitely more comfortable, and not a whit dearer, nor as dear as living at your own expense, with a cook to pay and to humor into the bargain. If you have an invalid to consider, and must have a certain amount of cooking done at home, and are therefore compelled nolens volens to hire a blood-sucker of the species, do not, in the name of justice and common-sense, pay her the monstrous sums she will ask you. If you give her fifty francs, without either wine or washing, you pay her well. No French family gives more to a good plain cook. She will ask you for sixty, or seventy, or eighty, and will tell you she has had it from others; and so, alas! she has. But now that you are coming over in a body, make a stand against this abominable practice, which has already done such immense mischief to all classes in Paris. It is entirely in your hands, and you may do a vast deal even now toward remedying the evil. Let it be known in the market that Americans are no longer ripe oranges only longing to be squeezed, and let them hold together and be firm in resisting the operation. In the same way hold out against the enormous rents that are asked of you. The cry still is, "The large apartments are less expensive than formerly, since so many Americans have left; but now they are looking up again, because those rich customers are returning." To those families who intend to remain for a year—if there be any enterprising enough to make the venture in the present state of France—I would suggest the advisability of hiring an unfurnished flat, and making an arrangement with an upholsterer for the use of furniture during that time, or else buying the necessary amount, and selling it off at their departure. This would most likely prove a satisfactory plan, and would at any rate be cheaper than taking a furnished apartment. There are such numbers of unfurnished houses going a-begging since the war that landlords are often glad enough to let a flat for a year to a nice tenant. You should get a list of unfurnished houses from an agent, but at the same time look about for yourself in the quarters you prefer. For servants, don't apply to agents, but to respectable trades-people. COMET.

PONGEE VISITING COSTUME.

See illustration on page 364.

THIS artistic costume is of écru pongee, wrought with reddish-maroon floss in the long loose stitches of Indian embroidery. The skirt has an embroidered flounce, headed by two wide puffs. The long apron polonaise is tied behind to form a slight pouf and sash ends. The waist has a vest front with long square basque back without pleats. Square Dolman sleeves. Embroidery and maroon yak lace edge the over-skirt and basque. Parasol of embroidered pongee. Écru chip Rabagas, with rose branch in front, and white gauze streamers and strings. Flesh-colored gloves.

YOUNG LADY'S SPRING SUIT.

See illustration on page 364.

THIS costume of pearl gray foulard is designed for a young lady. The three front breadths are formed of kilt pleats, and have a straight side sash edged with a gray-blue band and yak lace. The back breadths are covered with lapping flounces. Apron over-skirt with wide straight sashes; a narrow bias gray-blue band and yak lace edge the upper skirt and sashes. Round Josephine waist with wide belt. Half-flowing sleeves and reversed cuffs. Mantle of gray-blue cashmere with hood. Straw hat, with straw flowers on the brim, standing loops of blue ribbon resting against the crown, and a pompon with scarlet tips.

USEFUL RECIPES.

SPONGE-CAKE PUDDING.—Melt some butter, and grease very well with it the inside of a fluted cake-mould, using for the purpose a feather or brush. Then glaze the mould with powdered white sugar—that is to say, shake it about until the part greased is equally covered with the sugar, and looks white. Stone some raisins, and have ready a few currants, washed and picked. Place them according to fancy in the curvings of the mould. Take some sponge-cake, stale will do, and cut it up small, filling the mould with it, as you do so mixing lightly throughout currants and raisins rubbed in flour to prevent their falling. Beat up four eggs, the whites separately from the yolks, add four table-spoonfuls of sugar, one to each egg, and then pour gradually to them until well combined three half pints of cold new milk, which quantity should be enough to fill the mould. Set your pudding in a pan containing enough water to come a little more than half-way up the sides of the mould. Just as the water begins to boil see that the oven is so moderately heated as to insure the slow baking of the custard, else it might turn to whey. Do not let the pudding brown or burn: it should be done in about a quarter of an hour after the water has boiled around it. Sauce made thus: Four yolks of eggs beaten up with four table-spoonfuls of sugar, poured to a pint of milk allowed first to come to a boil. Return to the fire for about five minutes, stirring rapidly. Flavor with what you please; rose-water is good. Turn out the pudding in a pretty dessert dish; pour the sauce around it, and the work is done. The above recipe is especially adapted to meet the wants of small families, upon whose hands cake is apt to accumulate and turn stale. An elegant and economical dish is thus prepared out of materials that would otherwise be wasted.

CUTLETS OF VEAL, LAMB, OR SHOTE.—When the rack of veal is chosen, divide each bone separately, break an egg, and wet the pieces with it; then roll in bread-crumbs, afterward frying them in lard. Make a nice gravy with butter, pepper, and salt, mixed with the bread-crumbs. Any part of the veal almost, cut in small pieces, may be dressed in the same way. This dish must be thoroughly done to be good. Either a quarter of lamb or shote, cut up in small pieces—that is to say, the usual size for chops—may be dressed in the same way, and will be found very nice.

ORANGEADE.—Impregnate a few lumps of loaf-sugar with the oil of orange, by rubbing into them as much as you can readily from the rind of four oranges. Roll as many oranges as you design to use, squeeze the juice, allowing eight to one quart of water. Throw the skins into half a pint of water as you squeeze them, let them stand a short time, press them a little, and add this water to the other juice. The very highest-flavored oranges should be selected, and if not found sour enough to impart an agreeable acid, lemon juice may be added, with the caution that it must not be used freely enough to impair the distinct flavor of the orange, which is meant to predominate. The oil should only be slightly rubbed from the oranges. Allow half a pound of sugar to the quart of orangeade, but in this matter consult, if possible, the taste of some experienced dessert-maker. With all care to give an exact recipe, the proportions of both sugar and water may require modifying—a little more or a little less, as the case may be.

TOMATO SOUP.—In one gallon of water put two and a half pounds of lamb, boiling it until the water is reduced to one-half the quantity and the meat is in shreds; strain the liquor, put in two quarts of skinned tomatoes, stirring very often and well, that they may dissolve, and boil half an hour; again strain, add a table-spoonful of butter, and if the tomatoes are very acid, about half a table-spoonful of white sugar. In winter use tomatoes that have been canned with very little cooking, and are nearly whole.

VERTIGO.

VERTES, or vertigo, or whatever it may be called, becomes a veritable disease in certain temperaments. It may be compared to seasickness, and, like that malady, is insurmountable in some cases, despite any custom or practice. Where it has once taken firm hold, a mountaineer, no more than a sailor, can be made. A vague terror, even horror, will arise at the mere mention of a great height, just as the bare thought of a sea-voyage conjures up the feeling which the actual pitching and tossing produces. Give your novice, then, the best chance of escaping from a too-confirmed attack of this dire calamity. Train him gently to a comprehension of what he has to face; introduce him to your tall friends gradually; take him a quiet saunter or two, to begin with, over the merest hillocks, such, for instance, as those by the lake he thought so little of on first beholding, and do not whisk him rashly from a plain to a mountain height before he has had time to get accustomed to the change. No, nor even "ascend" him too suddenly by a well-parapeted broad highway, if it lie amid gloomy ravines topped by snow-peaks and based by roaring torrents.

Drop a naturally nervous man, without a warning, as it were, on to such a spot as the middle of the coach-road through the Simplon gorge of Gondo, or by the corner of a zigzag hard by the St. Gothard Devil's Bridge, and the chances are you will do for him forever. He will never face precipice or awkward ridge after that, any more than a timid child will face the water if you have thrown him ruthlessly headlong in by way of introduction to that element.

Climbers and swimmers will seldom be made from such beginnings. Nay, by thoughtless measures of this sort you may even put the enjoyment of our mode of sauntering, as you may the mildest kind of bathing, entirely out of the reach of hosts of people to whom both experiences should be welcome and wholesome.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

S. J.—Make a châtelaine redingote of your striped black grenadine, lining the waist with silk, and using watered sash ribbon. Have a black silk or foulard skirt, and trim with flounces of the grenadine headed by wide pleated puffs.

I. J. R.—Use black or brown velvet bias bands, large velvet buttons, velvet collar, cuffs, and sash on your écru twilled foulard.

A CONSTANT READER.—Use darker blue or else deep blue-gray with your blue silk for a street suit. To wear over a black silk skirt get gray or écru camel's-hair and make a châtelaine redingote by cut paper pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. VI. Read about wraps in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 18, Vol. VI.

A SUBSCRIBER TO BAZAR.—Get a water-proof suit for your ocean trip, and a simple black silk for Continental travel. Take as little baggage as possible, and depend on buying what you need abroad.

WEDDING TOUR.—A blue foulard made with polonaise and Spanish flounced skirt will be pretty for mornings. Bustles are still worn, as we have said in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 17, Vol. VI.

LILY.—Make your white nansook with a pleated blouse-waist, an apron over-skirt, and a lower skirt trimmed with one deep flounce; or else have a loose belted polonaise with a single skirt.

G. B. J.—The Medici fraise is part of the dress trimming, and is therefore made of the material of the trimming. It is simply doubled, leaving a plain edge without trimming. A side pleating of tulle, muslin, or, still better, of white crêpe lisse, is worn inside and above it.

M. S.—A châtelaine polonaise and skirt trimmed with side pleating of grenadine is what you want for an old lady. Any of the loose wrapper patterns made in white muslin, piqué, or else foulard silk, would be handsome. Get silk and wool reps of dark, quiet color for your furniture, with black-walnut frames.

MRS. H. T.—$4 to $6 will be asked for the china crape bows with lace.

IOWA CITY.—Get a black chip hat, and trim it with bias black repped silk in folds, with loops and ends at the left side. Put an oxidized silver buckle in the loops, and curl an ostrich tip across the crown. If you must have color, add blue pinks or else sweet-brier, but do not trim a traveling hat with color.

LITTLE MOTHER.—Cashmere and yak lace are not worn in the first year of mourning for a brother. Get a sacque or a polonaise of the dull black camel's-hair, and trim with bands of dull silk, if you like. Crape trimmings are worn here the first year, and after that bands of the dress material are mixed with crape. There is a heavy crimped tape fringe also worn in mourning.

MINTIE AND B.—Harper & Brothers furnish Tennyson's poems complete for $1 25.

IGNORANCE.—Sailor jackets are double-breasted, are slashed in the side, and have square pockets. A Dolman of black cashmere is a stylish wrap for any lady, young or old.

MRS. JOHN C.—A basque with over-skirt and flounced skirt below is the best design for your black silk. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 19, Vol. VI.

MRS. G. H. V.—Your brown striped poplin should be made with a châtelaine redingote, and trimmed with bias brown silk bands. Your polka-dotted percale is pretty, and should be made with box-pleated blouse and upper skirt.

OLD SUBSCRIBER.—You had better ask some lawyer. We can not tell you.

PUEBLA.—We do not furnish self-binders for the Bazar. You will find the address in our advertising columns.

EVERY mother who has a crying baby, or children subject to croup and stomach-complaints, can rely upon Castoria to keep the child well and give it rest. There are but few nurses in New York who do not use Castoria. It should be in every house.—[Com.]

WEBSTER'S PATENT
Button-hole Worker.

Pat. June 27, 1871. Awarded first premium at the Am. Institute and Md. Institute Fairs, 1871.

It is one of the most important inventions of the age. The most perfect Button-hole Worker ever invented! So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Every stitch is taken with the most perfect mechanical accuracy. Is used entirely independent of the sewing machine, and will last a lifetime. Does away with pricking the fingers, straining the eyes and with imperfect and irregular worked button-holes. They give universal satisfaction. Ladies who use them say that they are worth their weight in gold. Over eleven thousand sold during the first week of their introduction. Local and traveling agents wanted everywhere. They sell at sight, and give over 100 per cent. profit. Sample Button-hole Worker and sample Button-hole Cutter packed in a neat case, with full directions for use, together with sample of our new and novel way of canvassing, sent to any address on receipt of 55 cents. Orders by mail receive prompt attention. Address WEBSTER M'F'G CO., Manufacturers, Ansonia, Ct. Please state in what paper you saw this.

When you write please mention HARPER'S BAZAR.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

ADJUSTMENT.

BOOT-MAKER (who has a deal of trouble with this customer). "I think, Sir, if you were to Cut your Corns, I could more easily find you a Pair—"

CHOLERIC OLD GENTLEMAN. "Cut my Corns, Sir! I ask you to Fit me a Pair o' Boots to my Feet, Sir! I'm not going to Plane my Feet down to Fit your Boots!"

A COUSINLY HINT.

"How Tall our Shadows are, Claude!"
"Yes, aren't they?"
"Tall enough for us to be Married, I think!"

FACETIÆ.

A YOUNG fortune-hunter surprised his friends by announcing that he was going into agriculture, and should commence his husbandry by removing weeds—some rich and lovely widow's weeds.

Why is a whisper forbidden in polite society?—Because it isn't aloud.

The Philadelphia papers having exhausted the question, "Can fish hear?" are now laboring with the conundrum, "Are mice incendiaries?"

A Yale student writes a twelve-verse poem which is entitled, "We kissed each other by the sea." Well, what of it? The sea-side is no better for such practices than any other locality, say even the tow-path of a canal.

An Indiana Sunday-school man writes to a firm in New York: "Send me on some Sunday-school papers and books. Let the books be about pirates and Indians as far as possible."

Surely the genius who invented wooden nutmegs and oats made of deal chips can not yet be "played out." A Maine man is about to apply for a patent for an artificial oyster made out of flour paste, tapioca, salt, and water. The inventor places these in second-hand oyster-shells, which are carefully glued round the edges. There can be no dispute as to the success of this invention.

A HEAVY TRIAL.—Groaning beneath the weight of the good things placed upon it is clearly not one of the pleasures of the table.

At a coroner's inquest a witness was asked, "What was the last thing seen by the deceased?" "Kerosene," was the reply.

An Irish philosopher asks in his favorite journal the following momentous question: "Would you rather go through a giddy waltz with a pretty girl than go through a pretty waltz with a giddy girl?"

DARWINISM IN THE KITCHEN.

I was takin' oft my bonnet
One arternoon, at three,
When a hinseck jumped upon it
As proved to be a flea.

Then I takes it to the grate,
Between the bars to stick it;
But I hadn't long to wait
Ere it changed into a cricket.

Says I, "Sure*ly* my senses
Is a-gettin' in a fog!"
So to drownd it I commences,
When it halters to a frog.

Here my heart begun to thump,
And no wonder I felt funky;
For the frog, with one big jump,
Leaped hisself into a monkey.

Then I opened wide my eyes,
His features for to scan,
And observed, with great surprise,
That that monkey was a man.

But he vanished from my sight,
And I sunk upon the floor,
Jest as missus, with a light,
Come inside the kitching door.

Then beginnin' to abuse me,
She says, "Sarah, you've been drinkin'!"
I says, "No, mum, you'll excuse me,
But I've merely been a-thinkin'.

"But, as sure as I'm a cinder,
That party what you see
A-gettin' out o' winder,
Have developed from a flea."

A reporter last week, in recounting a death, said, "The deceased lady died suddenly, without medical assistance, which came too late." To die without medical assistance is hardly complimentary.

CURIOUS FACT.—Stout people are very soon fat-igued.

If you wanted to stop the mouth of a river, would you do it with a lock and quay (key)?

SUFFERERS AND SIGHT-SEERS.

There are at least ten distinct classes of obnoxious persons at art exhibitions who disturb one's comfort and tread on one's toes:

1. There are the civil people, who, when you are standing at just the proper distance to appreciate a picture, coolly plant themselves in front of you, and then back you from your place.

2. There are the pleasant people, who, by force of weight and muscle, calmly shoulder you aside, and turn a deaf ear to remonstrance if you think fit to give it vent.

3. There are the fashionable people, who come in all their finery, and cause you ceaseless fear of being tripped up by their trains.

4. There are the stingy people, who will not buy a catalogue, and continually plague you by peering into yours.

5. There are the snobbish people, who affect to claim acquaintance with half the fashionable people whose portraits are exhibited, and audibly proclaim their satisfaction with the likeness, or complain that "dear Mrs. So-and-So" has been "any thing but flattered" by the artist of the work.

6. There are the wall-eyed people, who stick their noses to each picture, as though they wished to smell it, and thus totally eclipse it from every body else.

7. There are the stupid people, who get puzzled by the catalogue, and read out wrong descriptions loudly to enlighten their deaf aunts.

8. There are the vulgar people, who, when a crowd is round a picture, tell their cronies, blatantly, "Ah, it ain't so good as mine!" or else, "I gave five hunder'd dollars for it, and wouldn't take a thousand."

9. There are the clever people, who make unkind comparisons of dead with living painters, and tempt you to believe that there is nothing now worth looking at in all the range of modern art.

10. And there are the gushing people (young ladies chiefly these), who go into small raptures at every other second, and scream, "How sweetly pretty!" or, "Oh, isn't that too charming!" when they see a scrap of millinery or a sentimental face.

Why is Easter no longer a movable feast?—Because it is kept still.

CHEMISTRY OF COMMON LIFE.

LADY CUSTOMER (to druggist). "Will you let me have a pint bottle of chloroform?"

DRUGGIST (amazed). "Pint bottle, m'm? Of chloroform, m'm? May I be allowed to ask for what purpose?"

LADY. "A disinfectant."

DRUGGIST (aghast). "Disinfectant, m'm! Surely you can not be aware, m'm, the use of such a quantity would cause paralysis. There must be some mistake, m'm, in naming chloroform. Allow me to suggest Eau de Cologne."

BY-STANDER. "Perhaps the lady means chloride of lime."

CONSOLATORY.—Some men go about the world with their hands in their pockets. That is better, though, than if they went about with their hands in other people's pockets.

Teetotalers who felicitate themselves on the progress of their cause will do well to digest the following: An old stager was compelled by his worthy spouse to "join the cold-water army," which he did, promising never to touch a drop of any thing else, except in sickness. So far the story is excellent. But now for the moral. The reformed individual has never been well since.

AS BROAD AS IT IS LONG.

SYMPATHIZING FRIEND. "How did you get home from Middletown last night, Bill? It's a long road when you've got the drop in you."

BILL. "Ah, lad, it's not the length o' the road, but the breadth o' it, that I cast out wi'."

A sailor, explaining a quadrille to his messmate, thus described the third figure: "You first heave ahead," said he, "and pass your adversary's yard-arm, regain your berth on the other tack in the same order, take your station with your partner in line, back and fill, and then fall on your keel, and bring up with your partner; she then manœuvres ahead, off alongside of you; then make sail in company with her until nearly astern of the other line, make a stern board, cast her off to shift for herself, regain your place the best way you can, and let go your anchor."

SENSE AND SENSIBILITY.

"You've heard about the poor dear Duchess? Isn't it too Awful?"
"It is indeed! Did you happen to Know her Grace?"
"Well—er—No!"
"No more did I! Happy Thought—Let us try and bear up!"

NICE DISTINCTION.

LADY. "Tommy Smith, what is meant by 'Sending Rain upon the Just and upon the Unjust?'"

TOMMY SMITH (promptly). "Sending it to Wet Good Boys and Naughty Girls."

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 24.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 14, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Ladies' House and Walking Suits, Figs. 1–5.

Figs. 1 and 4.—OLIVE FOULARD HOUSE DRESS. This dress consists of a skirt and polonaise, trimmed with bows and ruffles of the material bound with a lighter shade of gros grain.

Fig. 2.—GABRIELLE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN). This pretty walking suit is well adapted to summer fabrics, such as piqués, lawns, grenadines, foulards, etc. The polonaise is loosely fitted with one dart in front, and has a Gabrielle back with side bodies. It may be closed with cord and hooks and eyes, as seen in the illustration, or with buttons and button-holes. The edge of the polonaise is plain; the sleeve is finished with a triangular cuff, trimmed with a fold of the material, cords, and lace. The trimming, of course, can be varied to suit the taste. The skirt in the original has four pleated flounces, graduated in width.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS suit comprises two garments—Gabrielle polonaise and walking skirt.

GABRIELLE POLONAISE.—This pattern is in six pieces—front, side form, back, sleeve, cuff, and strap for looping the skirt. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting together, and to show where the pleats are taken. The perforations show where to baste the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, to take up the darts and cross basque seams on each side, to tack the strap, and the size and form of the under part of the sleeve. The garment is closely fitted to the figure. The fronts are rounded to the waist line and faced; they have one dart and a cross basque seam on each side. The back has side forms and a seam down the middle. Additional fullness is cut on at the waist line of each of the three seams in the back, and laid in a double box-pleat on the under side. pleats, turning upward, in the front ed skirt, bringing the first single notch up the second. Baste the seams of the g according to the notches and perforation ing the pleated edge of the side back und back edge of the front, which is shorter tha back, placing the single perforation in each p evenly together. Cut three pieces like the p tern given of the strap, tack one end of each the three seams at the waist line and at the si gle perforations in the skirt. Place the cuff over the upper side of the sleeve according to the notches, sewing the cuff in with the outside am. Tack the point of the cuff to the sleeve the single perforation. Place the longest seam the sleeve to the notch in the back part of the hole, holding the sleeve toward you when wing it in. Close the front to the waist line with hooks and loops. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all others. Baste up and try on wrong side out; if alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 7½ yards.

WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front gore, two side gores, and straight breadth for the back. Cut the front gore and straight breadth for the back with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the goods to avoid making seams. Cut two pieces each of the pattern given for the side gores. Put the pattern together by the notches, paying no attention to the grain of the paper.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 7 yards. Extra for trimming, 6 yards.

Fig. 3.—FAWN-COLORED POULT DE SOIE HOUSE DRESS. This dress is made of fawn-colored poult de soie, and consists of a skirt and polonaise. The skirt is trimmed with a wide gathered flounce and two box-pleated standing ruffles of the material. The seam of the flounce and ruffles is covered by a fold of the material. The trimming for the polonaise consists of folds [illegible]-colored velvet, gathered guipure lace, [illegible], and bows of the dress material.

[illegible]IS TREIZE HOUSE DRESS. This [illegible] polonaise and skirt of gray cashmere ned with gray gros grain folds edged [illegible]ag, guipure lace, cord, and passementons. Fine linen collar and cuffs.

Apples, pears, bananas, cherries, currants, gooseberries, June-berries, Southern peaches, pine-apples, raspberries, strawberries, apricots.

With the warm weather nature sends us plenty of green and fresh vegetables to cool our blood and keep our system in order. If the markets are not as well supplied in summer as in the fall and winter both in variety and quality of meat, it is the contrary with vegetables and fruits. The kinds of fish that are in season are also excellent, and although the warm weather affects them quickly, it is comparatively easy to keep them fresh in ice.

Purchasers must be careful in selecting fish. Their general appearance should be fresh; there are other indications of freshness, such as pinky-red gills firmly closed, clear and full eyes. As soon as tainted, fish gives forth a bad odor, which is easily detected, be it in or on ice. The head and the inside are the first parts affected, and when there is any doubt it is well to have the fish opened to ascertain its state of freshness. During the hot weather the eyes of fish kept on ice for some time may not be full, although the fish is fresh; in that case the freshness is only ascertained by opening and then smelling it. The belly of a fresh mackerel is white, and bluish when tainted. The gills of fishes turn paler and paler in exactly the same ratio as they lose their freshness. When fresh, the flesh is firm, and becomes soft as it becomes tainted. The more brilliant and shining are the scales, the fresher is the fish. Those that deal with a conscientious fish-monger need not examine the fish, for if any body knows if the fish is fresh, it is certainly the fish-monger.

People that buy tainted fish, tainted meat, or decayed vegetables because they are cheap make a great mistake; besides the danger of being made sick by partaking of them, the stomach refuses to receive them as soon as acquainted with their quality, and much, if not the greater part, has to be thrown away. Four ounces of fresh meat, fish, or vegetables, relished and digested, nourish the system more than two pounds of food against which the stomach rebels. It is not the amount consumed that nourishes, but the amount assimilated.

The Athenians were very careful in the selection of their food. In order to have fresh fish the fish-mongers were required by law to strike a kind of gong as soon as the fish arrived in the market, so that people could buy it fresh; they were not allowed to sit down until the whole of it was sold.

The Romans used to give prizes to the dealers that were successful in bringing fresh fish from long distances.

A French circular to market inspectors says: "Fresh-water fish should be without bad odor, the gills should be red, firm, and opened with some difficulty, the fins should be stiff, and the eyes clear and full. Salt-water fish is fresh when the eyes are clear, the fins stiff, the gills of a fine red hue, and are opened with some difficulty, the skin and scales are smooth and brilliant, and the whole body firm."

Soup with New Carrots.—Clean and slice half a dozen carrots, four onions, two turnips, a small plant of celery, and two leeks, which you put in a saucepan with a small piece of butter; set on a good fire, stir now and then until they begin to turn yellowish; add then broth or water enough to cover the whole well, and simmer for about two hours. Turn the whole into a colander, and mash it through; put back on the fire, add salt and pepper to taste, also broth or water if it be too thick; simmer for a few minutes; put a few slices of toasted bread in the soup-dish, turn the contents of the saucepan over, cover the dish for two or three minutes, and serve. It is called soupe à la Crécy.

Soupe or Potage Printanier.—Clean and cut in dice—or use a vegetable cutter—about six carrots, as many turnips and leeks, and blanch them ten minutes in boiling water and salt; take off and drain; put the whole in a saucepan with a dozen small onions whole, a dozen small red radishes, the eatable part of a dozen asparagus, half a pint of green pease, a head of lettuce, the leaves of which should be broken in pieces, and a handful of string-beans cut in pieces about half an inch long; cover the whole with broth or water (broth is better), add salt and pepper to taste, and about a table-spoonful of sugar; simmer until the whole is well cooked, and serve. A handful of chopped chervil may be added a minute or two before serving, if at hand. This is a most excellent soup, especially if made with broth. It is also called potage à la paysanne, or soupe à la jardinière.

Blue-fish broiled, maître d'hôtel sauce, is better than prepared in any other way, the action of the fire partly destroying the oily taste of the fish. It may also be stuffed and baked or boiled, and served with a port-wine sauce.

Spanish Mackerel.—This fish is one of the best kinds of fish found in any sea. When not too large, they are broiled; the larger ones are served with any of the following sauces: anchovy, caper, Génévoise, Génoise, lobster, oyster, Hollandais, etc.

Spanish mackerel must be boiled in a fish-kettle, or another having, like fish-kettles, a double bottom. When in the kettle cover it with cold water, salt, a little vinegar, an onion sliced, and a handful of fennel if handy; it is then simmered (not boiled) till done, and served with the following sauce: Blanch half a dozen sprigs of fennel for two minutes, and put them in a colander to drain; chop or mix them with two or three ounces of butter. Then put two ounces of butter in a saucepan, and when melted add a table-spoonful of flour; set on the fire, stir until turning rather brown, add then half a pint of broth or gravy, stir for two or three minutes, put the fennel and butter in, stir again, and mix the whole well; add salt and pepper to taste, and a pinch of cinnamon, if liked, and serve.

Spanish mackerel may also be served with a gooseberry sauce. Take about a pint of half-ripe gooseberries, cut them open, remove the seeds, and throw the berries into boiling water in which is a pinch of salt for two or three minutes; turn into a colander, and then mix them with the above sauce at the same time you mix the fennel and butter.

It is also in June that crabs, hard as well as soft shells, make their appearance. The amateurs of deviled crabs welcome the coming of those crustaceous animals. The soft-shells are considered a delicate eating fried (sauté) with butter.

Wild pigeons and squabs are sometime very plentiful, good, and cheap in June, but their migrations are not regular, and some years very few are sent to market.

Pigeon is one of the most warming articles of food, excellent for phlegmatic and bilious constitutions, but just the opposite for the sanguine. Taken to excess, it causes an irritation in the system.

Although the season is somewhat backward this year, still we can expect new fruits, berries, etc., during this month. By cooking new and unripe fruit, adding a little sugar to it, no effect will be felt after eating it. Many people are made sick by eating berries and milk or cream mixed together; they would avoid this by eating the berries with sugar only, or without any thing, if they are ripe. It is not because milk is not good, but because berries curdle it.

Strawberries are as good as milk, tomatoes, and grapes for dyspeptics, if taken without any thing, or merely with a little sugar; but if eaten with milk or cream, they are just the opposite. It is such habits that make so many dyspeptics in this country.

Drinking tumblers of ice-water to slake thirst in summer is, like eating berries and milk, an excellent promoter of diseases. After a long walk or an exhaustive labor the best way to slake thirst is to dip a towel in cold water, at the same time immersing both hands into it deep enough to cover the wrists, apply the towel to the forehead, and repeat the process two or three times; then drink cold water with a tea-spoon. A few drops of vinegar, lemon juice, or brandy may be put in the water drunk.

LAWS AND NO LAWS.

By GAIL HAMILTON.

IT is entirely safe for the law to leave individual liberty to woman, since what the law fails to give a husband, grace will always acquire. Women are so loyal to their husbands that a man need only be half decent toward his wife, and she will be too ready to relinquish every thing. Ninety-nine women out of a hundred would deed away their whole property to their husbands on their wedding-day, so far as inclination and confidence are concerned. The law as it stands is a wholly gratuitous insult to woman, unless men wish to take out a license to be rude and disagreeable to their wives with every possible impunity. But is it that men are afraid to trust women with their own money? Have American citizens so little belief in their power to secure the confidence and affection of their wives that they must secure their property by legal enactment and not by conjugal attachment? Have they so little trust in the intelligence and humanity of American women that they must deprive them of the right of ownership lest property deviate into unnatural and iniquitous channels? Do men in cold blood choose to extort by law rather than win by love? On the contrary. I am very sure that this feature of our statutes is but a remnant of barbarism, and that it needs only to be properly brought before the proper authorities to be promptly and wisely changed. It is not only more gallant, more generous, and more just, but also more in accordance with the well-known character of American men, to force women to take active measures to put their property out of their hands, rather than to take active measures to keep possession of it. Still less is it American to deprive women of their possessions altogether.

But whatever the law fails to do, and until the law is set right, it is in the power of every man to supply by his own act the deficiency. It is the duty of every man to make provision for the comfortable and dignified sustenance of his wife. If the whole of his property is needed to give her an income sufficient to support her in the style to which she has been accustomed, he ought by will to make her the recipient of that income. He has no right to keep her in danger of being suddenly stripped of half her revenue, and really reduced to poverty, while, moreover, incapacitated by years of devotion to him from helping herself. I would be far from saying that every woman should be made her husband's sole heir. As the present law leaves it to individual judgment, there may we leave it. A woman may be unable or unwilling to manage the details of a large property. She may be weak even in the management of her children. Cases which with a different law might require a special act, may be wisely left to the action of the present law. But no wife should ever be left dependent or even partially dependent upon her children for support. It is natural for the children to be dependent upon her. It is unnatural and humiliating for her to be dependent upon them. If there is only money enough for one, the wife is that one.

But suppose the law to be changed, and a woman be endowed with as much right in her own property as a man has in his—or even, as I think she should be, with a right less limited—it still remains, and it can never be too strongly inculcated, that happiness and misery depend upon individual character. This law is of broader application and deeper significance than any to be found in human code. If men and women choose to think that love is blind, and if, therefore, they marry on a caprice, no modification of statute law will prevail to secure their happiness or avert their wretchedness. If men and women choose to live and love on a low plane; if they hold narrow views, and cultivate mean tastes, and pursue petty aims; if they are not noble enough to be attracted by noble traits, or even to discern them; if they are not instinctively repelled by selfishness and coarseness; if they can not detect laziness and hardness, and silly pride and petulance, and shiftlessness and ill temper, and levity and self-indulgence, and falseness and feebleness, under a fine or fashionable exterior, or disguised by gallantry or arch and piquant ways, the law of the Lord is that they shall fret and worry and irritate and exasperate each other, whatever may be the law of the land. A bad wife will drag a good husband down, and a bad husband will drag a good wife down, and their children will suffer, whether the wife have or have not control of her income. Marriage involves a union of interests and a continuity of companionship and an intimacy of daily life that make a fearful draught on patience, good humor, and wisdom. It means constant, instinctive, spontaneous compromise, or various degrees of misery. With a general preparation of good sense, and with the special preparation of a sound and hearty love, it is the ideal and real happiness. Against such there is no law. Without sense, it has but vapid and vanishing joys, prolonged and devastating woes; without love, it is sacrilege; without either, it is—hell!

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE GABRIELLE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.

THE Gabrielle polonaise illustrated on our first page, and of which a cut paper pattern is published, has the square smooth sides and the flat fronts without a wrinkle that form conspicuous features of many imported garments this season. This polonaise is close-fitting, yet its construction is so perfect that it requires but one dart in each front, as sufficient fullness for the bust is given by extending the fronts and facing them. The back is of regular Gabrielle shape, with side forms, and a seam down the middle, and abundant fullness for the tournure added at the waist; the skirt is very long behind, and is caught up in deep upturned pleats on the side, and sewed to the plain front. A row of buttons is usually placed down this side seam. In the garment illustrated the front is merely fastened by hooks and loops, as buttons would interfere with the swinging cords on the breast; similar cords are sometimes used in the back of the garment to catch the skirt up in a panier pouf. These cords are now imported in écru linen for batistes, and in white for piqué dresses, as well as in black silk and jet passementerie cords; they have not, however, become as popular here as they are abroad, and many ladies omit them from this polonaise, and use buttons down the front instead. The Gabrielle polonaise is especially becoming to full figures, and will rival the loose front polonaise as a model for summer dresses, such as thin grenadines, piqués, batistes, and linens. A side sash of irregular long loops and ends is placed on the left of the back, and a belt may be worn, if preferred.

SWISS MUSLIN DOLMANS, ETC.

Among the latest importations for the summer are Swiss muslin Dolmans with over-skirts to match, to be worn with black or else colored silk dresses. The Dolman has very long side pieces, deeply pointed, and tied together underneath with ribbons in a pretty way that forms sleeves. The back is adjusted to the figure, and has one seam down the middle. Rows of Valenciennes insertion are let in the back and front, and the whole is trimmed with a puff of muslin, with lace-edged ruffles on each side, and a band of colored ribbon run in the puff and showing through its transparent texture. A high lace fraise stands around the neck. The over-skirt of muslin is very long behind, with a side gore formed of horizontal bands of insertion and muslin; while across the front are merely straps made of the puffs and lace, leaving wide vacant spaces between for showing the tablier trimming of the silk skirt beneath. Pelerines, fichus, and long scarfs of Swiss muslin are also imported with upper skirt. Tamboured embroidery is much used on the old-time scarfs and quaint pelerines, and the edge is finished with Mechlin lace. A set of Swiss or organdy muslin flounces of graduated widths, edged with lace below, and headed by a puff drawn on the cords, may be mounted on various silk skirts, and thus give variety to the toilette.

Puffs have at length found special favor as trimmings. They are much used on black grenadine dresses in the way just described for white muslin, with colored ribbon passed beneath them.

Medicis fraises or frills of pleated tulle or lace are used on low-necked evening dresses. They are made stiff to curve outward and stand in position by lining with fine crinoline net, or else a gauze with wire in it is added.

The skirts of many imported silk dresses are cut off at the knee, and a Spanish flounce with stiff net lining is added. Long demi-trained skirts for full dress have a pleating of foundation net across the back breadths to make the train sweep smoothly.

GENTLEMEN'S FASHIONS.

FULL AND SEMI DRESS SUITS.

Full-dress suits for gentlemen show no change in style, and remain black throughout—the claw-hammer coat, very low rolled vest, and easy-fitting pantaloons being made from one piece of broadcloth. The neck-tie is folded white lawn, the shirt front is slightly embroidered, boots are of finest calf-skin, and gloves are the faintest tints of pearl or flesh color. For summer fêtes, hops at watering-place hotels, and country festivals, where people profess to use less ceremony than in cities, this suit is abandoned for the simpler semi-dress toilette, such as is generally worn for visiting, church, and promenades. This consists of a double-breasted frock-coat of black or very dark blue "worsted suiting" in tiny armure figures, made with widely bound edges. The vest is of the coat material, and also has wide binding. The pantaloons are of light gray—not pure pearl-color, but with green or blue shading.

OVERCOATS.

The overcoat to be worn with demi-dress and other spring suits is a light gray worsted sack, cut to roll very low, and with a velvet collar. It is finished with "cord" seams, and is lined throughout with silk. Fifth Avenue tailors charge $65 for this garment.

BUSINESS SUITS.

The jaunty suits for business and morning wear are in excellent taste this season. The entire suit—coat, vest, and pantaloons—is made of what tailors call fancy plaid worsted—loosely woven cloth, usually black or very dark brown, wrought in almost invisible plaids and blocks, alternately smooth and glossy as satin, then roughened up like broché surfaces, with the merest thread of color, red, brown, or white, outlining the blocks. The coat of this suit is in the Newmarket shape, either double or single breasted, with widely bound edges, flaps, and pockets. The single-breasted vest has a notched collar, and is cut in points at the bottom. The pantaloons, slightly larger than those of last season, are made with corded sides or welt seams, and "spring" considerably over the ankle. Such suits cost from $80 to $85.

SUMMER SUITS.

Later in the season fanciful gray and brown English "coatings" in line plaids and checks will be made up in ample English sacks and pea-jackets. Pale gray Scotch serges, thin, light, and porous, will be worn for midsummer suits. White Cheviot and twilled flannel suits, made with reefing sacques and loose pantaloons, will again appear at the summer resorts. White duck vests, double-breasted, with broad lappets, two points below, and fastened by three or four very thick pearl buttons, are already worn with various suits, and will be very popular when warmer days come.

GENTLEMEN'S LINGERIE.

Gentlemen's shirt fronts remain plain and simple, of doubled linen, with two or three cords stitched near the edge outside the stud eyelets. To make these plain bosoms in good form, their lower sides slope narrower in what is technically and dismally called "coffin-shape," and a strap with a button-hole is added at the bottom to fasten it to the drawers button and hold it down smoothly. Cambric and percale shirts for morning and for traveling have colored grounds, gray, blue, and brown, with double lines of white in them, or else twills or polka dots of a darker shade than the ground. White cambric shirts with polka dots of black or blue are also shown in the shops, though they are not yet popular. A novelty is the Ascot shirting, an English fabric of mixed silk and linen, said to be very cool and pleasant. Tourists just returned from Europe have used it for traveling on the Continent, and for sea-voyages. It is brown, gray, and blue, with mixed line stripes.

The shirt collar for summer is the West Point, a standing collar of sheer linen, not so high above the cravat as the English collar now worn, and with the points in front very far apart, leaving the throat exposed. Turned-down collars will be worn very wide. The new St. Denis cuff is reversible, with sloped diagonal corners at one end and curved out at the other.

NECK-TIES.

Very light and very dark neck-ties will be worn; for the former the colors are gray and brown grounds with white lines and dots, while the popular fancy at present is Napoleon blue or plum, or else black grounds with white polka spots, or perhaps two rings linked together. Soft twilled silks, reps, and grenadines are the materials. Made-up ties are in the sailor-knot shape, called the Classic. An objection to the popular blue tie is that it is apt to "crock," or rub off. White Japanese figures on black, blue, and plum-colored ties are admired.

GLOVES AND HOSIERY.

Silk and lisle-thread gloves are bought by the dozen pairs by gentlemen preparing for summer gayeties out of town. They are finished like kid, and are in buff, lavender, gray, and brown shades. Driving gloves for summer are of lisle-thread, with leather inside the fingers. English gloves for amateur gardeners are made of the strong Cape skins brought from the Cape of Good Hope and manufactured in England. Striped silk and French thread half-hose are shown for gentlemen to wear with light pantaloons and low shoes. The startling novelty imported for full-dress is black silk socks; at present there is little danger that they will displace the fine Balbriggans.

HATS.

High crowns and narrow brims are the marked features of new hats for gentlemen. The dress hat for summer is of white felt in the pale grayish tint known as beaver-color. The crown is slightly bell-shape, and is six and a half inches deep; the curled brim is about two inches wide, and rolls slightly. The band is of the color of the hat. The hat is made on a willow body, with a cork ventilator inside, and costs $8. Black silk hats of the same shape are $9.

The undress hat for business is called the Byron. It is either white or black felt, with stiff three-quarter high crown four or five inches deep, and a brim like that described on dress hats. Price from $5 to $6. It is shown in various brown and gray shades. Another stylish shape much worn by young gentlemen is a very high, round-crowned Derby. Picturesque slouch hats of felt have their upturned brims bound with felt also. A new traveling hat, called the Reversible, is three hats in one. It is first a black silk gored crown with stitched brim in the English fashion; the black crown may be folded back to show a dark gray hat, which is folded in its turn to disclose a rain hat of tarpaulin. Price $5.

For midsummer, rough-looking Mackinaw straw hats will be worn in various shapes with high and square crowns, and both flat and rolled brims.

For information received thanks are due, for ladies' styles, to Miss SWITZER; and Madame BERNHEIM; and for gentlemen's fashions, to Messrs. W. R. BOWNE; D. D. YOUMANS; and UNION ADAMS & Co.

PERSONAL.

MRS. GEORGE GROTE, widow of the historian of Greece, although eighty years of age, has just published a life of her husband, which is said to be quite charming. "Our two lives," says the writer, "ran in one channel." And it is, indeed, impossible not to see how thoroughly Mrs. GROTE sympathized with and entered into all her husband's views and plans. There is a pretty tale in the preface of how, now some six years ago, Mr. GROTE found his wife sitting at her desk, and asked "what she was busy over." Told that the diligent and faithful partner of his labors was writing his own life, Mr. GROTE, with all his habitual modesty, objected that "there was absolutely nothing to tell." "Nothing in the way of adventures, I grant," was the reply; "but there is something nevertheless. Your life is the history of a mind." And so this "history of a mind" was written.

—The ladies of England have formed a committee to aid Mr. PLIMSOLL in his endeavors to get Parliament to prevent the sending of unseaworthy vessels to sea. The committee consists of the Duchess of Argyle, the Countess of Airlie, Mrs. COWPER TEMPLE, Baroness MEYER DE ROTHSCHILD, FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE, and others of high social position.

—With great pleasure do we give place to the following note from a lady:

"Accuracy of statement is at all times desirable even in so apparently unimportant a matter as chronicling a bonmot; therefore you will permit me to correct the mistakes of the paragraph appearing in your paper of May 24, recording the very clever jeu d'esprit of Mr. WILLIS. The occasion was a private dinner at the residence of Mr. GALES, the chief guest being General ROBERT CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, at that time a member of Congress, afterward the United States Consul-General at Havana, which post he also subsequently held at London. He died a number of years ago. The lady who called forth the witty repartee of the poet was not Miss SEATON, who was not present, but an intimate friend of Mr. WILLIS, who found greater attraction in her brilliant conversation than in that of the lady whom he had led to dinner. Observing this, the hostess penciled a playful command that they should each pay more attention to the guests to whom they had been respectively assigned, to which Mr. WILLIS jotted down the instant reply:

"'Pray cease, my dear aunt, our actions to trammel, Nor strain at my NAT, while you swallow your CAMPBELL.'"

—Mr. GLADSTONE'S versatility of talent is proverbial. As Prime Minister of Great Britain, as an orator, as a scholar, he is alike famous; but he has recently appeared in a new character. During a late visit at Inverary Castle, the seat of the Duke of Argyle, he proved himself a skilled vocalist by "raising the tune" to sing a Scotch psalm, at family worship, by request of the duke.

—The explorations of Mr. GEORGE SMITH, in Mesapotamia, on the banks of the Tigris and the Euphrates, have been singularly successful. Tablets, inscriptions, manuscripts, and relics, illustrative of the history of those ancient lands, have more than rewarded his expectations. He excavated at Nimrod for seventeen days, and explored there the Northwest Palace of Esarhaddon, the Temple of Nebo, and also some entirely untouched portions of the Southeast Palace. This latter is of greater extent and grander character than has been supposed. He found spacious halls and fine chambers, the walls of which were ornamented with bands of plain colors. Under the pavement of one of these halls he came upon six clay figures having the head of a lion joined to a human body.

—Speaking of the late ELIAS HOWE and his great invention, a gentleman who formerly resided in New Haven says he had for a neighbor a master mechanic who had done much toward perfecting the sewing-machine, and who from actual knowledge could give the cost of the different kinds now most in use. The HOWE machine, table included, cost $9; the WHEELER & WILSON, $7; the SINGER, about $7; the WILCOX & GIBBS, $5; from which it would seem that somebody must be making incredible profits from that indispensable little affair.

—The dowry of the Archduchess GISELA is 130,000 florins a year, and will be paid out of the Emperor's civil list. Her consort, the Prince LEOPOLD, has an income of only 15,000 florins a year.

—Mr. MACREADY leaves a widow (his second wife), two sons—one now walking the hospitals and the other at school—and a married daughter in Ceylon. A son of great promise died some years since. It is a curious fact that the house in which the eminent tragedian died was part of the house where Mrs. SIDDONS spent the declining years of her life.

—Marshal M'MAHON, the new President of the French republic, claims direct descent from BRIAN BORU, who was King of Ireland in 1014, and renowned as the conqueror of the Danes. The French M'MAHONS are descended from two brothers, MAURICE and JOHN, who followed the fortunes of the Pretender, and settled in France in 1760. The hero of the present hour, who rejoices in the names of MARIE-EDMONDE PATRICE MAURICE, was born at Autun, in 1808, and was educated in the military school of St. Cyr. He is a conservative in politics, and is reported to be divided in opinion between the Legitimists and Bonapartists. He is tall and handsome, and looks every inch a soldier. His wife, like himself, is of Irish extraction.

—Mrs. CARL SCHURZ has reason to be pleased that a certain opulent uncle of hers—a resident of Hamburg, Germany—was so thoughtful and good as to leave her a legacy of one hundred and seventy thousand dollars.

—"If this is a boy, where do you get your men?" is an old query that may well be repeated when speaking of WARREN STACKPOLE, of Raccoon Hill, in New Hampshire. WARREN is only twelve years old, yet weighs one hundred and ninety-eight pounds, is well put up, stands five feet four large, and carries a stout man's load. He appears as smart as boys of his age usually do, but has the physical proportions of a man. Some three years ago he lost his hair from a fever. It grew again and fell off, and this has been repeated. His head is now perfectly bare. His brother, fleshy like him when a boy, is now of a lean style. His father is an overseer in a Lowell factory.

—The finest residence in Connecticut, if not in New England—that of the late LE GRAND LOCKWOOD, at Norwalk—has passed into the hands of the Michigan Southern and Lake Shore Railroad Company, who were holders of the first mortgage of $300,000. The place cost about $1,300,000, and is as nearly an earthly paradise as money, bricks, mortar, and such could make it.

—In 1810 one FRANCIS JAMES JACKSON was sent to this country as British minister. There has just been published in London, by BENTLEY, two volumes of letters, gossip, etc., of the JACKSON family, a book of exceeding dullness, of no earthly interest to any mortal save some descendant of those JACKSONS, and very tough reading for them. There is just one paragraph, however, in a letter dated Claremont, May 13, 1810, that is amusing as a reminiscence. Claremont (now a portion of Riverside Park), our city readers will remember, is situated just below Manhattanville, and commanded, as it does now, a beautiful view of the Hudson River. This is the paragraph:

"Having passed four months at New York, and been well stuffed with turkey and Madeira—their two staple articles in the eating and drinking way—I have accepted the offer of a gentleman, Mr. HOGAN, to lend me his country-house. The house is in a beautiful and elevated situation, commanding a river view of upward of forty miles in extent, with bold rocky shores, and innumerable craft passing to and fro. One of the curiosities that we daily see pass under our window is the steamboat, a passage vessel, with accommodation for near a hundred persons! It is moved by a steam-engine turning a wheel on either side of it, which acts like the main wheel of a mill, and propels the vessel against wind and tide at the rate of four miles an hour! As soon as it comes in sight there is a general rush of our household to watch and wonder until it disappears. They don't at all know what to make of the unnatural monster that goes steadily careering on, with the wind directly in its teeth as often as not. I doubt that I should be obeyed were I to desire any one of them to take passage in her. When first this vessel appeared it excited great consternation. Some of the simple country folk were pretty well frightened out of their wits, suspecting, I am told, that it was some diabolical conveyance that had brought his Satanic majesty from the lower realms to visit the United States. I am inclined to look with favor on this application of the propelling power of steam. Not improbably it is destined at no distant day to produce incalculably great and beneficial changes in our mode of voyaging."

Good for him!

—Professor WILSON, State Superintendent of Instruction in Minnesota, was recently applied to for a female teacher possessing certain qualifications, which were set forth with painful elaborateness. He replied, "I know of no lady who can fill your bill. A good-looking woman who can teach Greek and Latin, and run a high school of one hundred pupils, can not be found. Good-looking women never study Greek."

—The Servian authorities have expelled an Austrian subject named SASSON from Semendria "because he is a Jew." The Austrian Consul-General at Belgrade has taken the necessary diplomatic steps to enable him to return, and to secure him compensation.

—The Rev. GEORGE MACDONALD, lecturing about MILTON, says of his wife that, "between her and the marvelous splendor of MILTON'S mind there was a veil of ignorance. She never knew the honor that had been vouchsafed her. She would not even write to him. The philosopher began to examine the relations of the sexes, and wrote four books in favor of divorces. He might have written till doomsday; she would not have cared for or read his books; but when she heard that he was making love to a Miss DAVIS, by way of carrying his doctrine into practice, she hurried back to him. He took her to his heart, and her father to boot. He did every thing in a grand fashion. The poet lived very quietly. In patience he possessed his soul. So pure was his life that at college he was called 'the lady of Christ's College.'" —President WHITE is shrewd as well as sensible. He offers the college crew the best boat that can be built, on condition that liquor, tobacco, and betting be forsworn at the forthcoming regatta.

—Mr. WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT'S free library, presented to the people of Cumington, Massachusetts, where he was born, is now completed and ready for the books.

—Professor FAWCETT, M.P. (who is blind), and his wife (who isn't) propose to come hither and see what life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness amount to in the U. S.

—General NEAL DOW is having a great success in England as an advocate of total abstinence. He is against intemperance and rowdydows of every sort, and abandons himself utterly to cold water.

—One thing is settled—Governor WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, is opposed to religious fairs and lotteries. He has called the attention of the Legislature to the propriety of adopting some means for "breaking up the schools in which gamblers are made;" and the Rev. Dr. CORNWALL, of this city, read a paper a few days since in which he argued that not only are the raffling and lottery tables which are the usual features of such entertainments directly demoralizing, but that the whole system, by which money which should be voluntarily given to the church is raised by cajoling people into buying articles for their own benefit, is unworthy of the holy cause in which it is employed.

—A successful novelist, a lady, in speaking of literary method, says that in writing a novel she first sketched out her story in brief, then wrote it carefully as a short narrative, then divided the ideas into three parts or volumes, next developed the incidents in detail, and planned them into chapters, allotting to each chapter its own special incident. "And then I write so many hours every day until all is finished for the printer." The information is curious. It offers material for thought. The lady has written at least one successful story, and several others that have attained some popularity. On the other hand, Sir WALTER SCOTT said: "I doubt if men of method, who can lay aside or take up a pen just at the hours appointed, will ever be better than poor creatures. Lady LOUISA STUART used to tell of Mr. HOOLE, the translator of Tasso and Ariosto, that he was a clerk in the India House, with long ruffles and a snuff-colored suit of clothes, who occasionally visited her father, JOHN, Earl of Bute. She sometimes conversed with him, and was amused to find that he did exactly so many couplets day by day, neither more nor less, and habit had made it light to him, however heavy it seemed to the reader." The present age encourages this hack kind of literature. If a writer is to live, he must produce easily. The success of a novelist whenever he has made a name seems, unfortunately, to depend upon the rapidity with which he can turn out books.

—M. BARTHOLDI, who visited this country last summer, has received an order for a statue of LAFAYETTE, from the bureau of Beaux Arts, which is to be offered to the city of New York by the French government as a souvenir of the good offices rendered to it during the Franco-German war in a philanthropic point of view.

—LIEBIG was a good man for having given sensible people an appetite for oatmeal. He showed that it is almost as nutritious as beef, and richer than wheaten bread in the elements that go to form bone and muscle. Professor FORBES, of Edinburgh, during some twenty years, measured the breadth and height, and also tested the strength of both the arms and loins, of the students in the university—a very numerous class, and of various nationalities, drawn to Edinburgh by the fame of his teaching. He found that, in height, breadth of chest and shoulders, and strength of arms and loins, the Belgians were at the bottom of the list; a little above them, the French; very much higher, the English; and highest of all, the Scotch and Scotch-Irish, from Ulster, who, like the natives of Scotland, are fed in their early years with at least one meal a day of good milk and good oatmeal porridge.

—Miss EMILY FAITHFULL'S friends in this country—and they are many—will be glad to learn that she reached England safely, after a ten days' voyage in the steam-ship Oceanic. On the day before she sailed a pleasant party of sixty or seventy well-known literary men and women assembled at a lunch-party given on board the steamer to bid her adieu and wish her a prosperous journey homeward. Miss FAITHFULL had taken passage for the return voyage on the ill-fated steamer Atlantic, and her departure was delayed more than a month by the accident. On going down the bay the cylinder of the Oceanic broke, and the steamer was compelled to return and take a fresh departure, which led Miss FAITHFULL to remark that she should now have an opportunity to write her impressions on her second voyage to America.

—Queen VICTORIA lately celebrated her fifty-fourth birthday, on the 24th of May. According to years, she is only in her prime, and the Prince of Wales may wait long before coming to his kingdom after all. Perhaps ALBERT VICTOR'S chance of wearing the crown is almost as good as ALBERT EDWARD'S.

—1873 seems a fatal year for literary men. One of the last names on the death-roll is that of ALEXANDER MANZONI, the author of the renowned novel, I Promessi Sposi (The Betrothed), which has held its place in standard literature for half a century, and been translated into nearly every European language. MANZONI died at the age of eighty-nine, full of years, it would seem, but the Italians are a long-lived race, as one can see by reading over the list of cardinals. His mother was the daughter of the celebrated BECCARIA, whose treatise on crimes and punishments made a sensation in its day. In his youth MANZONI was a disciple of VOLTAIRE; but his wife, who was a Swiss woman, converted him to Catholicism, in which faith he continued to his dying day. He wrote many works, but will be remembered chiefly by the one we have named.

Corners of Borders for Covers, etc. Swiss Application on Lace. Figs. 1 and 2.

The outlines of these applied figures are overcast closely. The veins are worked in diagonal half-polka stitch, and the dots are worked raised. Instead of in white embroidery, these designs may be worked on colored velvet or silk in application or in satin stitch embroidery with gold or colored silk. When worked in this manner, they are suitable for trimming altar cushions, prayer-book covers, sofa-pillows, etc.

Fig. 1.—Traveling-Bag embroidered in Cross Stitch.—[See Fig. 2, Page 373.]

Traveling-Bag embroidered in Cross Stitch, Figs. 1 and 2.

This traveling-bag is made of dark brown leather, ornamented on the outside with cross stitch embroidery, which is worked in the design shown by Fig. 2, page 373, with zephyr worsted and filling silk. For the darkest shade of the foundation use dark red worsted; for the second darkest, light red worsted; for the dotted symbol of the design figures, gray worsted; and for the white, which forms the edge of the figures, maize silk. Leather handles and a metal lock complete the bag.

Crochet Edgings for Lingerie, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—For this edging first work a piece of gimp like that shown by Fig. 4, page 293, Harper's Bazar, No. 19, Vol. VI. For the under edge of the edging work on the side of the gimp furnished with the long loops one round of sc. (single crochet), ∗ laying the second of the next two loops side by side over the first loop, and crocheting on both together 10 sc.; repeat from ∗. For the upper edge of the edging crochet 1 sc. on each loop, after each sc. 2 ch. (chain stitch).

Fig. 2.—To make this edging work, first, a foundation with picots of the requisite length as follows: Work 2 ch., ∗ insert the needle, without dropping the loop, in the first of the 2 ch., and draw through the thread in a loop, then work 1 ch., drop both loops from the needle, take up the second loop again (the first is left standing for a picot), crochet one more ch., and repeat from ∗. 1st round.—On the other side of this foundation work 1 sc. on each st. (stitch). 2d round.—This round is crocheted on the wrong side of the preceding round. ∗ 1 sc. on the next st., 3 ch., one picot (like those of the foundation), 3 ch., 1 tc. (treble crochet) on the fifth following st. and 1 stc. (short treble crochet) at the foot of the tc.; work off both st. together (pay no attention for the present to the ch. loop on the needle), drawing the thread through once, then also work off the st. thus formed together with the loop on the needle, 7 ch., 1 sl. (slip stitch) at the foot of the tc.; this forms one leaflet. For the second leaflet crochet 7 ch., 1 stc. and 1 tc. on the first of the 7 ch., work off both st. together, drawing the thread through once, then also work off the st. thus formed together with the loop on the needle; 3 ch., 1 p. (picot), 3 ch., pass over 4 st. of the preceding round, and repeat from ∗. 3d round.—∗ 1 sl. on the point of the first of the next two leaflets, 3 ch., 1 p., 3 ch., 1 sl. on the point of the following leaflet, 1 ch., 5 p. separated each by 1 ch., 1 ch., and repeat from ∗.

Fig. 5.—Manner of making Cross Seam for Afghan.

Embroidered Java Canvas Afghan with Crochet Edging, Figs. 1–6.

To make this afghan a piece of Java canvas of the requisite size and coarse white knitting cotton (Estremadura, No. 3) are required. Begin with the squares in the middle of the afghan, but leave a space of the requisite width free for the border. The illustration Fig. 3 gives a quarter section of one of the close squares in full size, worked in Smyrna and in button-hole stitch. Between these squares work transposed foundation figures in Smyrna and button-hole stitch, as shown by Fig. 1. Fig. 6 shows a foundation figure of this kind in full size. For the border work, first, the trellis foundation which incloses the medallions (see Fig. 1). This foundation consists of cross seams side by side, which are worked as shown by Fig. 5. Inside of each medallion work one figure in point Russe and Smyrna stitch, as shown by Fig. 1, and observing the full-sized illustration Fig. 2. Edge the afghan with a row of button-hole stitches worked on four threads in height, and cut away the projecting material all around. For the edging bordering the outer edge crochet with knitting cotton as follows: 1st round.—Always alternately 1 dc. (double crochet) on one button-hole stitch loop on the outer edge of the afghan and 1 ch. (chain stitch), with which pass over the requisite number of button-hole stitch loops. Widen on the corners as much as may be required. At the end of the first round fasten to the first dc. with 1 sl. (slip stitch). Crochet 1 sl. on the next ch., and work the 2d round.—∗ 3 sc. (single crochet) on the next 3 st. (stitch) of the preceding round, 11 ch., with these pass over 5 st. of the preceding round, and repeat from ∗. At the end of this round fasten to the first sc. with 1 sl. 3d round.—3 ch., which count as first dc., 2 dc. on the following 2 st. of the round, 13 ch., ∗ 3 dc. on the next 3 sc. of the preceding round, 13 ch., and repeat from ∗. 4th, 5th, and 6th rounds.—Like the third round, but work the dc. always on the dc. of the preceding round. 7th round.—1 sc. on the middle of the next 3 dc. of the preceding round; ∗ now interloop the chain stitch scallops lying above each other of the second to the sixth rounds as shown by Fig. 4, drawing the ch. scallop of the third round through the scallop of the second round, the scallop of the fourth round through the scallop of the third round, and so on. On the next scallop of the scallops of the sixth round drawn through last work 13 dc., then 1 sc. on the middle of the next 3 dc., and repeat from ∗ to the end, join on the first sc., fasten the thread, and cut it off.

Fig. 1.—Tatted and Mignardise Insertion. For this insertion use two pieces of mignardise of the requisite length. On the loops at one side of each piece of mignardise work with tatting cotton, No. 80, one round as follows: ∗ Fasten the thread to the next loop, work one ring of 4 ds. (double stitch), 1 p. (picot) an eighth of an inch long, 2 ds., 1 p. a quarter of an inch long, 2 ds., fasten the thread to the next and then to the following loop, and repeat from ∗. In doing this fasten each following ring to the preceding one, as shown by the illustration. Now join the pieces of mignardise on the free sides with one round as follows: ∗ Fasten the thread to the next loop of the first piece of mignardise, one ring of 8 ds., fasten to the corresponding loop of the second piece of mignardise, 8 ds., fasten the thread to the same loop of the first piece of mignardise, pass over one loop, and repeat from ∗.

Fig. 2.—Tatted and Crochet Gimp Edging. For this edging work, first, with tatting cotton, No. 80, and two threads (shuttles) the scallops and three-leaved figures on the under edge as follows: Tie the foundation and working threads together, and ∗ with the working thread only work one ring of 6 ds., 1 p., 6 ds.; close to this work two similar rings. Turn the work, and on the foundation thread work one scallop of 15 ds., turn the work, and repeat from ∗. In the course of the work, instead of forming the p. in the first ring of every three-leaved figure, fasten the ring to the three-leaved figure last worked. Work a piece of gimp of the requisite length like that shown by Figs. 1 and 2, page 500, Harper's Bazar, No. 32, Vol. III. and on the loops at one side of the gimp work ∗ 4 sc. (single crochet) on the next loop, but in working the 4th sc. fasten on the p. of the middle ring in the next threeleaved figure, 4 sc. on the next loop, 1 sc. on the following loop, 5 ch. (chain stitch), fasten to the joining picot of two three-leaved figures, 5 ch., 1 sc. on the same loop on which the last sc. was worked, and repeat from *, observing the illustration. On the other side of the gimp crochet always alternately 1 sc. on the next loop, 2 ch.

Fig. 3.—TATTED AND CROCHET EDGING. This edging is worked with tatting cotton, No. 80, in tatting and crochet-work. First work the five-leaved figures with one thread (shuttle) as follows: One ring of 4 ds. (double stitch), 1 p. (picot), 8 ds., 1 p., 3 ds., 1 p., 11 ds.; close to this work one ring of 11 ds., 1 p., 3 ds., 1 p., 8 ds., 1 p., 4 ds.; close to this work one ring of 9 ds., 1 p., 9 ds.; close to this one ring of 8 ds., twice alternately 1 p., 3 ds.; then 1 p., 8 ds., and close to this one ring like the ring before the last. Tie the ends of the thread together and cut them off. For the four-leaved figures work * one ring of 6 ds., 1 p., 6 ds.; repeat three times from . Fasten the ends of the thread and cut them off. Fasten the figures together in the course of the work as shown by the illustration. For the upper edge of the edging crochet the 1st round.— 1 sc. (single crochet) on the p. of one ring in the next four-leaved figure, twice alternately 5 ch. (chain stitch), 2 sc. separated by 1 ch. on the following 2 p., 5 ch., and repeat from *. 2d round.—Always alternately 1 dc. (double crochet) on the following st. of the preceding round, 1 ch., with which always pass over 1 st. For the under edge of the edging work one round of ch. and sc. as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 2.—BUFF LINEN CAMBRIC DRESS. This dress is trimmed with bias strips of satin-striped cambric on the front breadth and on the hem at the bottom of the robe, which is draped in a puff in the back, and forming revers on the casaque. Sky blue gros grain bows complete the trimming of the dress, and large white pearl buttons finish the casaque. The basque of the latter is slashed in the back. White English straw hat, trimmed with sky blue gros grain ribbon and tea-roses.

Fig. 3.—LIGHT OLIVE POPLIN DRESS. Flounces, bound on both sides with rose saumon silk, cover the back and side breadths of the skirt. The front breadth is laid in Russian pleats. The basque-waist and tight sleeves are trimmed with similar flounces.

Figs. 4 and 5.—PEACOCK BLUE SILK DRESS. This dress is trimmed with kilt-pleated flounces, held in place by black velvet bands, and finished at the sides with velvet bows and white pearl buckles and a bias strip of silk; the latter at the same time forms a binding for the front breadth, which is also trimmed down the middle with black velvet bows fastened with pearl buckles. The basque-waist and half-flowing sleeves are trimmed with similar flounces and bows. Fig. 5 shows the trimming arranged on the back.

MALINGERING.

OF the art of simulating disease with a view to escape some irksome duty, which is familiarly known as "malingering," many curious examples are related. The principal qualities necessary in a good simulator are acute powers of observation, a talent for mimicry, some knowledge of human nature, and great tenacity of purpose. The last-named quality is usually the only one to which the common type of malingerer can lay claim. To assume a simple rôle, such as inability to hear, or articulate, or move a limb, and doggedly to stick to it, often in the face of the plainest exposure of the fraud, is all that he considers necessary.

The amount of fortitude—call it obstinacy, if you will—displayed by some of this class of impostors is something amazing. Day and night they will remain in the most constrained and irksome positions. For weeks, and even months, men have sat and walked with their bodies bent double. A man feigning palsy of the lower limbs was placed by himself in a room with food which he could reach only by walking to the place where it was laid, and at the end of two days he had not tasted it. Another, simulating paralysis of the arm, allowed the amputating knife to be placed beneath it, and would have submitted to the operation for its removal. A soldier counterfeiting blindness was placed on the steep bank of a river, and ordered to march forward, which he unhesitatingly did, and fell into the stream. The medical writer who relates this case queries whether the cheat would have gone forward had a precipice instead of a river been before him. No doubt these may be called exceptional instances of fortitude, as the great majority of malingerers are made of more commonplace stuff. A mere hint from a navy surgeon that an equivocal complaint would be benefited by a transference to an African climate, or the application of the actual cautery, has been the means of effecting a miraculously rapid cure. A French physician, after watching a spurious epileptic fit for some time, put his hand on the heart of the cheat, and turning to the attendants, said, "It is all over with him; carry him to the dead-house." Immediate resuscitation was the result, and the man never had another attack. A Shetland clergyman was greatly annoyed at the weekly occurrence of a kind of contagious convulsions which attacked many of his congregation in church. At length the good man hit on a plan which put a speedy termination to the infliction. He announced from the pulpit that he had learned that no treatment was so efficacious as an immediate ducking in cold water; and as his kirk was fortunately contiguous to a fresh-water lake, the proper hydropathic treatment could always be secured. It is a most unfortunate coincidence for the malingerer that the means which would be the most beneficial in the treatment of the real disease are often the most distasteful to him.

It is, however, a rare thing nowadays for a clinical artist to attain his end and enjoy the full fruition of his labors. In most cases he has no other reward than the pleasure received from the exercise of his art. This æsthetic satisfaction would need to be great to enable him to bear even the ordinary prosaic hardships and discomforts of his lot. But in addition to these, he is sometimes overtaken by a species of poetical justice in the shape of a penalty paid in kind. The feigned disease, in fact, occasionally becomes a real one.

IN THE BLOOM-TIME.

THE red flush was on the orchards;
The white snow was on the may;
The blackbird trilled his love-notes
To his dear mate on the spray.

The bright tears of dewy April
Glittered 'neath the sunbeams' kiss;
And pulse and heart leaped lightly,
For to live and love was this.

The soft gray tint of gloaming
Fell upon the western sky;
The faint breeze of coming even
Shook the springing blades of rye,

As two rustic figures loitered,
Leaning idly on the stile—
He a bashful love-tale telling,
While she listens with a smile.

From beneath her long dark lashes
Casts she archly up a glance;
And, with folded hands, demurely
At her shy swain looks askance.

She may love him: let him ask her—
Pretty, willful-eyed coquette!—
Let him speak out like a hero,
For she will not help him yet

By a single word of answer:
No! the man's part is to woo;
Let the tale be to the end told;
Let the maiden have her due!

Speak boldly, bashful lover;
Though the maid may not reply,
There is damask on her soft cheek,
There is love-light in her eye.

* * * * *

Sang the nightingale more loudly,
Shone more bright the evening-star,
And the scent of dew-steeped woodbine
That was wafted from afar

Seemed far sweeter, oh! far sweeter
Than but one brief hour ago;
For the Future dawned like Eden,
Flushed beneath life's rosy glow.

CHAPTER XI.

IT IS TOO LATE.

THE Countess had resolved that she would let their visitor depart without saying a word to him. Whatever might be the result of the interview, she was aware that she could not improve it by asking any question from the young lord, or by hearing any account of it from him. The ice had been broken, and it would now be her object to have her daughter invited down to Yoxham as soon as possible. If once the Earl's friends could be brought to be eager for the match on his account, as was she on her daughter's behalf, then probably the thing might be done. For herself, she expected no invitation, no immediate comfort, no tender treatment, no intimate, familiar cousinship. She had endured hitherto, and would be contented to endure, so that triumph might come at last. Nor did she question her daughter very closely, anxious as she was to learn the truth.

Could she have heard every word that had been spoken, she would have been sure of success. Could Daniel Thwaite have heard every word, he would have been sure that the girl was about to be false to him. But the girl herself believed herself to have been true. The man had been so soft with her, so tender, so pleasant, so loving with his sweet cousinly offers of affection, that she could not turn herself against him. He had been to her eyes beautiful, noble, almost divine. She knew of herself that she could not be his wife—that she was not fit to be his wife—because she had given her troth to the tailor's son. When her cousin touched her cheek with his lips she remembered that she had submitted to be kissed by one with whom her noble relative could hold no fellowship whatever. A feeling of degradation came upon her, as though by contact with this young man she was suddenly awakened to a sense of what her own rank demanded from her. When her mother had spoken to her of what she owed to her family, she had thought only of all the friendship that she and her mother had received from her lover and his father. But when Lord Lovel told her what she was—how she should ever be regarded by him as a dear cousin—how her mother should be accounted a countess, and receive from him the respect due to her rank—then she could understand how unfitting were a union between the Lady Anna Lovel and Daniel Thwaite, the journeyman tailor. Hitherto Daniel's face had been noble in her eyes—the face of a man who was manly, generous, and strong. But after looking into the eyes of the young Earl, seeing how soft was the down upon his lips, how ruddy the color upon his cheek, how beautiful was his mouth with its pearl-white teeth, how noble the curve of his nostrils—after feeling the softness of his hand, and catching the sweetness of his breath—she came to know what it might have been to be wooed by such a one as he.

But not on that account did she meditate falseness. It was settled firm as fate. The dominion of the tailor over her spirit had lasted, in truth, for years. The sweet, perfumed graces of the young nobleman had touched her senses but for a moment. Had she been false-minded, she had not courage to be false. But in truth she was not false-minded. It was to her, as that sunny moment passed across her, as to some hard-toiling youth who, while roaming listlessly among the houses of the wealthy, hears, as he lingers on the pavement of a summer night, the melodies which float upon the air from the open balconies above him. A vague sense of unknown sweetness comes upon him, mingled with an irritating feeling of envy that some favored son of Fortune should be able to stand over the shoulders of that singing siren, while he can only listen with intrusive ears from the street below. And so he lingers and is envious, and for a moment curses his fate—not knowing how weary may be the youth who stands, how false the girl who sings. But he does not dream that his life is to be altered for him because he has chanced to hear the daughter of a duchess warble through a window. And so it was with this girl. The youth was very sweet to her, intensely sweet when he told her that he would be a brother, perilously sweet when he bade her not to grudge him one kiss. But she knew that she was not as he was. That she had lost the right, could she ever have had the right, to live his life, to drink of his cup, and to lie on his breast. So she passed on, as the young man does in the street, and consoled herself with the consciousness that strength after all may be preferable to sweetness.

And she was an honest girl from her heart, and prone to truth, with a strong glimmer of common-sense in her character, of which her mother hitherto had been altogether unaware. What right had her mother to think that she could be fit to be this young lord's wife, having brought her up in the companionship of small traders in Cumberland? She never blamed her mother. She knew well that her mother had done all that was possible on her behalf. But for that small trader they would not even have had a roof to shelter them. But still there was the fact, and she understood it. She was as her bringing up had made her, and it was too late now to effect a change. Ah, yes; it was indeed too late. It was all very well that lawyers should look upon her as an instrument, as a piece of goods that might now, from the accident of her ascertained birth, be made of great service to the Lovel family. Let her be the lord's wife, and every thing would be right for every body. It had been very easy to say that! But she had a heart of her own—a heart to be touched and won and given away—and lost. The man who had been so good to them had sought for his reward, and had got it, and could not now be defrauded. Had she been dishonest, she would not have dared to defraud him; had she dared, she would not have been so dishonest.

"Did you like him?" asked the mother, not immediately after the interview, but when the evening came.

"Oh yes—how should one not like him?"

"How, indeed! He is the finest, noblest youth that ever my eyes rested on. And so like the Lovels!"

"Was my father like that?"

"Yes indeed, in the shape of his face, and the tone of his voice, and the movement of his eyes; though the sweetness of the countenance was all gone in the devil's training to which he had submitted himself. And you too are like him, though darker, and with something of the Murrays' greater breadth of face. But I can remember portraits at Lovel Grange—every one of them—and all of them were alike. There never was a Lovel but had that natural grace of appearance. You will gaze at those portraits, dear, oftener even than I have done; and you will be happy where I was—oh—so miserable!"

"I shall never see them, mamma."

"Why not?"

"I do not want to see them."

"You say you like him?"

"Yes; I like him."

"And why should you not love him well enough to make him your husband?"

"I am not fit to be his wife."

"You are fit; none could be fitter; none others so fit. You are as well born as he, and you have the wealth which he wants. You must have it, if, as you tell me, he says that he will cease to claim it as his own. There can be no question of fitness."

"Money will not make a girl fit, mamma."

"You have been brought up as a lady—and are a lady. I swear I do not know what you mean. If he thinks you fit, and you can like him—as you say you do—what more can be wanted? Does he not wish it?"

"I do not know. He said he did not, and then—I think he said he did."

"Is that it?"

"No, mamma. It is not that; not that only. It is too late."

"Too late! How too late? Anna, you must tell me what you mean. I insist upon it that you tell me what you mean. Why is it too late?" But Lady Anna was not prepared to tell her meaning. She had certainly not intended to say any thing to her mother of her solemn promise to Daniel Thwaite. It had been arranged between him and her that nothing was to be said of it till this law business should be all over. He had sworn to her that to him it made no difference whether she should be proclaimed to be the Lady Anna, the undoubted owner of thousands a year, or Anna Murray, the illegitimate daughter of the late Earl's mistress, a girl without a penny, and a nobody in the world's esteem. No doubt they must shape their life very differently in this event or in that. How he might demean himself should this fortune be adjudged to the Earl, as he thought would be the case when he first made the girl promise to be his wife, he knew well enough. He would do as his father had done before him, and, he did not doubt, with better result. What might be his fate should the wealth of the Lovels become the wealth of his intended wife, he did not yet quite foreshadow to himself. How he should face and fight the world when he came to be accused of having plotted to get all this wealth for himself, he did not know. He had dreams of distributing the greater part among the Lovels and the Countess, and taking himself and his wife with one-third of it to some new country in which they would not in derision call his wife the Lady Anna, and in which he would be as good a man as any earl. But let all that be as it might, the girl was to keep her secret till the thing should be settled. Now, in these latter days, it had come to be believed by him, as by nearly every body else, that the thing was well-nigh settled. The Solicitor-General had thrown up the sponge. So said the by-standers. And now there was beginning to be a rumor that every thing was to be set right by a family marriage. The Solicitor-General would not have thrown up the sponge—so said they who knew him best—without seeing a reason for doing so. Sergeant Bluestone was still indignant, and Mr. Hardy was silent and moody. But the world at large were beginning to observe that in this, as in all difficult cases, the Solicitor-General tempered the innocence of the dove with the wisdom of the serpent. In the mean time Lady Anna by no means intended to allow the secret to pass her lips. Whether she ever could tell her mother, she doubted; but she certainly would not do so an hour too soon. "Why is it too late?" demanded the Countess, repeating her question with stern severity of voice.

"I mean that I have not lived all my life as his wife should live."

"Trash! It is trash. What has there been in your life to disgrace you? We have been poor, and we have lived as poor people do live. We have not been disgraced."

"No, mamma."

"I will not hear such nonsense. It is a reproach to me."

"Oh, mamma, do not say that. I know how good you have been—how you have thought of me in every thing. Pray do not say that I reproach you." And she came and knelt at her mother's lap.

"I will not, darling; but do not vex me by saying that you are unfit. There is nothing else, dearest?"

"No, mamma," she said, in a low tone, pausing before she told the falsehood.

"I think it will be arranged that you shall go down to Yoxham. The people there even are beginning to know that we are right, and are willing to acknowledge us. The Earl, whom I can not but love already for his gracious goodness, has himself declared that he will not carry on the suit. Mr. Goffe has told me that they are anxious to see you there. Of course you must go—and will go as Lady Anna Lovel. Mr. Goffe says that some money can now be allowed from the estate, and you shall go as becomes the daughter of Earl Lovel when visiting among her cousins. You will see this young man there. If he means to love you and to be true to you, he will be much there. I do not doubt but that you will continue to like him. And remember this, Anna, that even though your name be acknowledged, even though all the wealth be adjudged to be your own, even though some judge on the bench shall say that I am the widowed Countess Lovel, it may be all undone some day, unless you become this young man's wife. That woman in Italy may be bolstered up at last, if you refuse him. But when you are once the wife of young Lord Lovel, no one then can harm us. There can be no going back after that." This the Countess said rather to promote the marriage than from any fear of the consequences which she described. Daniel Thwaite was the enemy that now she dreaded, and not the Italian woman or the Lovel family.

Lady Anna could only say that she would go to Yoxham, if she were invited there by Mrs. Lovel.

CHAPTER XII.

HAVE THEY SURRENDERED?

As all the world heard of what was going on, so did Daniel Thwaite hear it among others. He was a hard-working, conscientious, moody man, given much to silence among his fellow-workmen; one to whom life was serious enough; not a happy man, though he had before him a prospect of prosperity which would make most men happy. But he was essentially a tender-hearted, affectionate man, who could make a sacrifice of himself if he thought it needed for the happiness of one he loved. When he heard of this proposed marriage, he asked himself many questions as to his duty and as to the welfare of the girl. He did love her with all his heart, and he believed thoroughly in her affection for himself. He had, as yet, no sufficient reason to doubt that she would be true to him; but he knew well that an earl's coronet must be tempting to a girl so circumstanced as was Lady Anna. There were moments in which he thought that it was almost his duty to give her up, and bid her go and live among those of her own rank. But then he did not believe in rank. He utterly disbelieved in it; and in his heart of hearts he felt that he would make a better and a fitter husband to this girl than would an earl, with all an earl's temptation to vice. He was ever thinking of some better world to which he might take her, which had not been contaminated by empty names, and an impudent assumption of hereditary, and therefore false, dignity. As regarded the money, it would be hers whether she married him or the Earl. And if she loved him, as she had sworn that she did, why should he be false to her? Or why, as yet, should he think that she would prefer an empty, gilded lordling to the friend who had been her friend as far back as her memory could carry her? If she asked to be released, then, indeed, he would release her, but not without explaining to her, with such eloquence as he might be able to use, what it was she proposed to abandon, and what to take in place of that which she lost. He was a man, silent and under self-control, but self-confident also; and he did believe himself to be a better man than young Earl Lovel.

In making this resolution—that he would give her back her troth if she asked for it, but not without expressing to her his thoughts as he did so—he ignored the masterfulness of his own character. There are men who exercise dominion from the nature of their disposition, and who do so from their youth upward, without knowing, till advanced life comes upon them, that any power of dominion belongs to them. Men are persuasive, and imperious withal, who are unconscious that they use burning words to others, whose words to them are never even warm. So it was with this man when he spoke to himself in his solitude of his purpose of resigning the titled heiress. To the arguments, the entreaties, or the threats of others he would pay no heed. The Countess might bluster about her rank, and he would heed her not at all. He cared nothing for the whole tribe of Lovels. If Lady Anna asked for release, she should be released. But not till she had heard his words. How scalding these words might be, how powerful to prevent the girl from really choosing her own fate, he did not know himself.

Though he lived in the same house with her, he seldom saw her—unless when he would knock at the door of an evening, and say a few words to her mother rather than to her. Since Thomas Thwaite had left London for the last time the Countess had become almost cold to the young man. She would not have been so if she could have helped it; but she had begun to fear him, and she could not bring herself to be cordial to him either in word or manner. He perceived it at once, and became himself cold and constrained.

Once, and once only, he met Lady Anna alone after his father's departure, and before her interview with Lord Lovel. Then he met her on the stairs of the house while her mother was absent at the lawyer's chambers.

"Are you here, Daniel, at this hour?" she asked, going back to the sitting-room, whither he followed her.

"I wanted to see you, and I knew that your mother would be out. It is not often that I do a thing in secret, even though it be to see the girl that I love."

"No, indeed. I do not see you often now."

"Does that matter much to you, Lady Anna?"

"Lady Anna!"

"I have been instructed, you know, that I am to call you so."

"Not by me, Daniel."

"No; not by you—not as yet. Your mother's manners are much altered to me. Is it not so?"

"How can I tell? Mine are not."

"It is no question of manners, sweetheart, between you and me. It has not come to that, I hope. Do you wish for any change—as regards me?"

"Oh no.

"As to my love, there can be no change in that. If it suits your mother to be disdainful to me, I can bear it. I always thought that it would come to be so some day."

There was but little more said then. He asked her no further question—none at least that it was difficult for her to answer—and he soon took his leave. He was a passionate rather than a tender lover, and having once held her in his arms, and kissed her lips, and demanded from her a return of his caress, he was patient now to wait till he could claim them as his own. But, two days after the interview between Lord Lovel and his love, he a second time contrived to find her alone.

"I have come again," he said, "because I knew your mother is out. I would not trouble you with secret meetings but that just now I have much to say to you. And then, you may be gone from hence before I had even heard that you were going."

"I am always glad to see you, Daniel."

"Are you, my sweetheart? Is that true?"

"Indeed, indeed it is."

"I should be a traitor to doubt you—and I do not doubt. I will never doubt you if you tell me that you love me."

"You know I love you."

"Tell me, Anna—; or shall I say Lady Anna?"

"Lady Anna—if you wish to scorn me."

"Then never will I call you so, till it shall come to pass that I do wish to scorn you. But tell me. Is it true that Earl Lovel was with you the other day?"

"He was here the day before yesterday."

"And why did he come?"

"Why?"

"Why did he come? you know that, as far as I have yet heard, he is still your mother's enemy and yours, and is persecuting you to rob you of your name and of your property. Did he come as a friend?"

"Oh yes! certainly as a friend."

"But he still makes his claim."

"No; he says that he will make it no longer, that he acknowledges mamma as my father's widow, and me as my father's heir."

"That is generous—if that is all."

"Very generous."

"And he does this without condition? There is nothing to be given to him to pay him for this surrender?"

"There is nothing to give," she said, in that low, sweet, melancholy voice which was common to her always when she spoke of herself.

"You do not mean to deceive me, dear, I know; but there is a something to be given; and I am told that he has asked for it, or certainly will ask. And, indeed, I do not think that an earl, noble but poverty-stricken, would surrender every thing without making some counter claim which would lead him by another path to all that he has been seeking. Anna, you know what I mean."

"Yes; I know."

"Has he made no such claim?"

"I can not tell."

"You can not tell whether or no he has asked you to be his wife?"

"No; I can not tell. Do not look at me like that, Daniel. He came here, and mamma left us together, and he was kind to me. Oh! so kind! He said that he would be a cousin to me, and a brother."

"A brother!"

"That was what he said."

"And he meant nothing more than that—simply to be your brother?"

"I think he did mean more. I think he meant that he would try to love me so that he might be my husband."

"And what said you to that?"

"I told him that it could not be so."

"And then?"

"Why, then again he said that we were cousins, that I had no nearer cousin any where, and that he would be good to me and help me, and that the lawsuit should not go on. Oh, Daniel, he was so good!"

"Was that all?"

"He kissed me, saying that cousins might kiss."

"No, Anna; cousins such as you and he may not kiss. Do you hear me?"

"Yes, I hear you."

"If you mean to be true to me, there must be no more of that. Do you not know that all this means that he is to win you to be his wife? Did he not come to you with that object?"

"I think he did, Daniel."

"I think so too, my dear. Surrender! I'll tell you what that surrender means. They perceive at last that they have not a shadow of justice, or even a shadow of a chance of unjust success, in their claim: that, with all their command of money, which is to be spent, however, out of your property, they can do nothing; that their false witnesses will not come to aid them; that they have not another inch of ground on which to stand. Their great lawyer, Sir William Patterson, dare not show himself in court with a case so false and fraudulent. At last your mother's rights and yours are to be owned. Then they turn themselves about, and think in what other way the prize may be won. It is not likely that such a prize should be surrendered by a noble lord. The young man is made to understand that he can not have it all without a burden, and that he must combine his wealth with you. That is it, and at once he comes to you, asking you to be his wife, so that in that way he may lay his hands on the wealth of which he has striven to rob you."

"Daniel, I do not think that he is like that!"

"I tell you he is not only like it—but that itself. Is it not clear as noonday? He comes here to talk of love who had never seen you before. Is it thus that men love?"

"But, Daniel, he did not talk so."

"I wonder that he was so crafty, believing him as I do to be a fool. He talked of cousinship and brotherhood, and yet gave you to know that he meant you to be his wife. Was it not so?"

"I think it was so, in very truth."

"Of course it was so. Do brothers marry their sisters? Were it not for the money, which must be yours, and which he is kind enough to surrender, would he come to you then with his brotherhood, and his cousinship, and his mock love? Tell me that, my lady! Can it be real love—to which there has been no forerunning acquaintance?"

"I think not, indeed."

"And must it not be lust of wealth? That may come by hearsay well enough. It is a love which requires no great foreknowledge to burn with real strength. He is a gay-looking lad, no doubt."

"I do not know as to gay, but he is beautiful."

"Like enough, my girl; with soft hands, and curled hair, and a sweet smell, and a bright color, and a false heart. I have never seen the lad, but for the false heart I can answer."

"I do not think that he is false."

"Not false! and yet he comes to you asking you to be his wife, just at that nick of time in which he finds that you—the right owner—are to have the fortune of which he has vainly endeavored to defraud you! Is it not so?"

"He can not be wrong to wish to keep up the glory of the family."

"The glory of the family—yes, the fame of the late lord, who lived as though he were a fiend let loose from hell to devastate mankind. The glory of the family! And how will he maintain it? At race-courses, in betting clubs, among loose women, with luscious wines; never doing one stroke of work for man or God; consuming and never producing; either idle altogether or working the work of the devil. That will be the glory of the family. Anna Lovel, you shall give him his choice." Then he took her hand in his. "Ask him whether he will have that empty, or take all the wealth of the Lovels. You have my leave."

"And if he took the empty hand, what should I do?" she asked.

"My brave girl, no; though the chance be but one in a thousand against me, I would not run the risk. But I am putting it to yourself, to your reason, to judge of his motives. Can it be that his mind in this matter is not sordid and dishonest? As to you, the choice is open to you."

"No, Daniel; it is open no longer."

"The choice is open to you. If you will tell me that your heart is so set upon being the bride of a lord that truth and honesty and love, and all decent feeling from woman to man, can be thrown to the wind to make way for such an ambition, I will say not a word against it. You are free."

"Have I asked for freedom?"

"No, indeed! Had you done so, I should have made all this much shorter."

"Then why do you harass me by saying it?"

"Because it is my duty. Can I know that he comes here seeking you for his wife, can I hear it said on all sides that this family feud is to be settled by a happy family marriage, can I find that you yourself are willing to love him as a cousin or a brother, without finding myself compelled to speak? There are two men seeking you as their wife. One can make you a countess; the other simply an honest man's wife, and, so far as that can be low, lower than that title of your own which they will not allow you to put before your name. If I am still your choice, give me your hand." Of course she gave it him. "So be it; and now I shall fear nothing." Then she told him that it was intended that she should go to Yoxham as a visitor; but still he declared that he would fear nothing.

Early on the next morning he called on Mr. Goffe, the attorney, with the object of making some inquiry as to the condition of the lawsuit. Mr. Goffe did not much love the elder tailor, but he specially disliked the younger. He was not able to be altogether uncivil to them, because he knew all that they had done to succor his client; but he avoided them when it was possible, and was chary of giving them information. On this occasion Daniel asked whether it was true that the other side had abandoned their claim.

"Really, Mr. Thwaite, I can not say that they have," said Mr. Goffe.

"Can you say that they have not?"

"No; nor that either."

"Had any thing of that kind been decided, I suppose you would have known it, Mr. Goffe?"

"Really, Sir, I can not say. There are questions, Mr. Thwaite, which a professional gentleman can not answer, even to such friends as you and your father have been."

"When any real settlement is to be made, the Countess Lovel will, as a matter of course, be informed?"

"By all means."

"Because I think that some cheat is being practiced. The Earl has declared—I do not mean in public or to his lawyers—but still he has declared that he has abandoned the suit. Were it so, no doubt the Countess would be informed officially, and they who are pecuniarily concerned would know the condition of their interests."

"You, I know, have heavy claims on the Countess."

"My father has claims, which will never vex her, whether paid or not paid; but it is right that he should know the truth. I do not believe that the Countess herself knows, though she has been led to think that the claim has been surrendered."

Mr. Goffe was very sorry, but really he had nothing further to tell.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE training school for nurses in connection with Bellevue Hospital is an established fact. The necessary money for commencing the undertaking has been obtained, and systematic operations were begun early in May. An English lady of great and successful experience in hospital labor abroad has been secured as superintendent of this important department of charitable work. In addition to the excellent arrangements which have been made for thorough training of the nurses at the hospital, the thoughtful ladies of the committee considered it desirable that the nurses, while resting from their labors, should enjoy the happy influences of home life. They have therefore, with this purpose in view, leased a house in East Twenty-sixth Street, where they will live. This house will be under the management of an American lady, well known and highly esteemed for her labors among our soldiers during the late civil war. This opportunity for women to become skilled in the art of nursing the sick is invaluable. The profession of a nurse is a noble and important one, and one upon which not only the physical but the moral well-being of the community is greatly dependent. It is always a matter of extreme difficulty, even in cases of necessity, to obtain the services of a capable nurse. It is to be hoped that many of our unemployed women—those who are gifted with health, good sense, and good temper—will avail themselves of the opportunities of the Bellevue Hospital Training School.

The prices of admission to the Vienna Exhibition are announced: season tickets for gentlemen, 100 florins; for ladies, 50 florins, admitting to the opening ceremony; for the opening day, 25 florins; daily admission, 1 florin. A florin is about forty cents in American money, which certainly is not exorbitant, as compared with exhibitions of various kinds in this country. Yet we believe that in many cases the price of admission to national exhibitions has not been much more than half as much.

Arrangements are now being made to open Professor Agassiz's School for Naturalists about the first of July. Penekese Island is to be appropriately "fitted up" for the purpose.

The fact that there are 356 German newspapers published in the United States gives some idea of the number of the educated German residents.

It is said that the Dixon bridge, the falling of which resulted in the death of forty-five persons, had been examined by a city council, and that they were suspicious of its strength, and yet allowed it to remain. Undoubtedly the principle on which the bridge was constructed was wrong, or the material was poor. It was called a Truesdell bridge, from the inventor, who is now dead. In 1868 a structure of this same kind fell in Elgin, Illinois, and was afterward repaired and strengthened. But curiously enough, subsequently, as a traveling menagerie was passing that way, with strange sagacity, an elephant refused to venture his weight upon it. The next July, when two or three hundred spectators were gathered on this bridge to witness a race on the river, the structure fell, carrying down over a hundred persons, though, fortunately, killing but few. Thus the wisdom of the elephant was proved.

The wages paid to the captain and officers on the Anglo-American lines of steamers seems to be entirely disproportionate to the character and qualifications they should possess. From a recent article in Scribner's Monthly it appears that the salary of a captain on some of these lines is from $1500 to $2500 a year. The first officer in the service receives about $900 a year, the second officer $600, the third officer $360, and the fourth $300. Is it not true that men who could afford to be hired at such prices could not afford to be eminently qualified for their position, and should not be held so responsible for disasters that occur as their employers?

Long Branch bluff is gradually diminishing. It is asserted that about fifteen feet of it have been washed away within the last seven or eight months. At this rate the present site of the principal hotels will have vanished ten years hence. Moral: Go to Long Branch before it is destroyed.

People can quarrel over any thing if so disposed. Even astronomers, who of all men, by their familiarity with heavenly bodies, should be peace-loving, wrangle over stars. Whether one or two inter-Mercurial planets exist is not a matter of vital consequence, nor is the question who first discovered it, or them, worthy of so much astronomical bitterness as has been developed by the discussion which has attempted in vain to settle the matter.

It is said that the wife of Captain Hall first heard of his death as a newspaper was read aloud on a train between Boston and Dover.

About fifteen men were on board the missing Polaris when she broke from her moorings, and amidst storm and darkness disappeared from the sight of the eighteen who were on an ice-floe near the Labrador coast. The Polaris, which sailed from Brooklyn June 29, 1871, had reached a point farther north by 219 miles than the ship of Dr. Kane. It is the opinion of many that the remainder of the crew are yet alive, and that before long the Polaris will return.

New evidence of the painless nature of death by drowning is given in the narrative of one of the more fortunate victims of the bridge disaster at Dixon, Illinois. He states that while in the water he felt "at peace with every thing, and perfectly happy." The water pouring into throat and ears "gave him the most delightful sensation." It was only when he was pulled out of the water that he felt "wretched."

Evidently some of the little folks of the present day have been carefully instructed in regard to the sin of profanity, and this gives promise that the standard of morals in this particular may become higher.

"Oh, mamma, mamma," said a tow-headed little urchin, in a tone of mingled fright and penitence—"oh, mamma, I's been thwearing!"

"Been swearing, my child! What did you say?"

"Oh, mamma, I—I thed, Old Dan Tucker."

"Pretty well," remarked the doctor's daughter, who took an interest in her father's purse and profession: "plenty of colds, some bronchitis, and a little typhus fever; but, as father said yesterday, what we want to make things lively is a nice little epidemic!"

A new method of spelling, quite surpassing the phonetic, is illustrated as follows: "80 you be—a tub; 80 oh! pea—a top; be 80—bat; see 80—cat; pea 80—pat; are 80—rat; see oh! double you—cow; see you be—cub; see a bee—cab; bee you double tea—butt; see a double ell—call."

How delightful it is to be assured by scientific investigators that "dust is the cause of the lovely color of the azure firmament!" This statement surely ought to reconcile us to those clouds of disagreeable particles which dim our vision, penetrate our clothing, and soil our faces. We are grieved, indeed, that the pleasant delusion of childhood is thus roughly brushed away, and that the "pure blue arch" is dependent upon terrestrial débris. But we gravely reflect that "such is life," constantly to find the things we thought purest incapable of bearing investigation. But as to the dust itself, we trust our readers will look at it—so long as they can keep their eyes open—in a philosophic aspect, bravely enduring all minor discomforts for the sake of the "lovely" results; for doubtless the more dust, the bluer the sky!

Hints curious and comic, and designed for the special benefit of ocean travelers, appear in the columns of an exchange. The writer has evidently watched the ways of voyagers, and taken notes thereof. Perhaps he has himself been seriously puzzled by unexpected questions propounded by information-seekers. Be that as it may, he assures us that however skillful the captain and officers of a vessel may be, they really do not know every thing, nor should they be cross-questioned upon every topic in the world. He gives a long list of questions which he suggests be omitted during the present traveling season if ship officers must be the victims of the inquiries. A sample of these queries, as frequently propounded to captain, officers, quartermaster, ship doctor, and steward, may be amusing to our readers:

"How far is Queenstown from Sandy Hook? How long is this ship?—this is the most frequent inquiry. Who built her?—very common question. What did she cost?—merchant's inquiry. Shall we see any icebergs?—young bride's question. Is the ocean always blue here?—young lady's question. If two bells mean one o'clock, why not have twenty-four bells for twelve o'clock?—boy's question. Is this ship Clyde built?—banker's question. Do you like baked apples?—French bonne's question. How much is a dollar in sterling?—very general question. Do dogfish bark?—little boy's inquiry. Would this ship run over a whale?—little boy's inquiry. Are you a church member?—missionary's question. Is the captain married?—lady's-maid's question. When do the Mother Carey's chickens sleep?—old lady's question. How deep is the water here?—dyspeptic's question."

The ocean traveler is also assured that although the captain may be very powerful, he can not prevent the ship from rolling and pitching, and it is unjust to blame him when the dishes slide into one's lap.

It may surprise those who are intending to visit Vienna during the coming season to know that after reaching England they can make choice from about thirty different routes by which to gain the city wherein the Exposition is held.

An English journal tells of a young clergyman, more vain than wise, who went to minister in a country church one Sabbath. Entering the vestry, he doffed his coat and vest preparatory to donning the cassock and cloak, and looked round for the looking-glass which generally forms a part of the vestry furniture. He searched, however, in vain. At last, losing patience, he cried out, "Church offi*saw*, church offi*saw*!"

After calling out some time, the head of a gray-haired man peered in at the door, and a stentorian voice demanded, "What's yer wull!"

"Where's the mir*raw*?" demanded the minister.

"Sir?" said the other.

"The mir*raw*—the looking-glass," said the minister, impatiently.

"Oh, the lookin'-glass. Ye see, oor minister's sic a handsum man naterally that he doesna need a lookin'-glass; but a'll bring ye a pail o' watter if ye like."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A SUBSCRIBER.—For your black grenadine have a jockey basque lined with silk, an apron over-skirt edged with bias bands of grenadine, and put two wide flounces headed by enormous pleated puffs on the skirt. Do not use a color for binding, but roll the grenadine on top, and sew with blind stitches, or else edge with narrow French lace. Get a colored twilled silk sash—blue if you can wear it—and let it hang in great loops on the left side. The lower skirt should be of silk, or else foulard, with the flounces sewed on. Figured grenadines are more stylish than plain ones.

E. T.—We can not decide concerning the respective merits of sewing-machines. We believe that several claim the advantage you name.

E. P.—Braid your hair and let it hang in a queue behind, or else wind it around the crown of your head. Make your linen dress with a belted polonaise and skirt, trimmed with kilt pleating.

OLIVE J. M.—We do not reply by mail. The drawers with Highland suit may be open or gathered to a band according to fancy, but must be very short, and not visible below the kilt. Your polonaise and striped skirt will be very suitable. Get de baize for your "second best" and traveling suit. Read about it in New York Fashions.

M. J. H. A.—A lace or Swiss muslin turban is what you want for your boy baby. For hints about mourning read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 21, Vol. VI. Lace and a white Swiss sacque are not appropriate for the first year of mourning.

A SUBSCRIBER IN CHINA.—Separate enough of your front hair for frizzing, then part the remainder down the middle to the nape of the neck, comb it upward, and tie in two tresses on the crown. Braid each tress in a three plait, stuffing with topsies to make it thick, if necessary. Arrange the frizzes on the forehead, and then twine the braids in a crown coil that will cover the top of your head. Comb the back up smoothly from the nape of the neck so that it will join together and conceal the part down the middle. Small old-fashioned side-combs sometimes hold this back hair in place, and are concealed under the top braids. This is a cool, pleasant fashion of coiffure for your Chinese climate. Add a high Spanish tortoise-shell comb for ornament, if you like. The Chinese queue, or pigtail braid, is worn here in the house of mornings.

MAY R.—Your sample of striped poplin will look well made by the châtelaine redingote pattern.

A YOUNG MOTHER.—We can send you for 25 cents an entire set of cut paper patterns for an infant's wardrobe. Illustrations of these patterns are given in Bazar No. 35, Vol. IV.; the paper containing illustrations costs 10 cents.

A. M.—If you have not purchased leno for your traveling suit, we commend instead either wash poplin or de baize at 50 cents a yard, as they wear longer, and retain their freshness. Use the Châtelaine Redingote pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. VI. Make your blue foulard with a belted polonaise and single skirt with deep Spanish flounce. A bias band of the same piped with white is the heading for flounce and border for polonaise. Use large white pearl buttons on the polonaise.

S. M.—At a home wedding the bridal pair should stand with their faces to the company during the ceremony. The parlor is darkened, and lighted by gas, or else wax-candles, which are preferred for their soft, mellow light. The bride should write a note of thanks for her wedding present from the groom's relatives at a distance.

R. J. T.—Get two shades of pink or of blue silk for your evening dress. Make with low corsage and trained upper skirt. A demi-polonaise with flounced skirt is the prettiest design for your white piqué. Use open-worked Hamburg edging for trimming.

THE FLAG OF TRUCE.

THE FLAG OF TRUCE.

IN this beautiful picture the artist represents a Flemish town of the Middle Ages, which, after a long siege by a relentless enemy, has at last been constrained by famine to surrender. The brave burgomaster is just sallying from the town gates, accompanied by the young bearer of the flag of truce, sad, but self-respecting to the last, while another citizen carries the terms of capitulation in his hand, amidst the tears and blessings of the starving townsfolk. The scene, though laid in medieval times, finds its counterpart wherever war exists, and the sentiments that animate it are eminently human. Even among ourselves sieges and their attendant horrors were familiar household words at no very remote date, and flags of truce were hailed with delight by famished populations. The original painting, by J. Pettie, A.R.A., is now in the Royal Academy Exhibition, at London, where it is accounted both one of the artist's best works, and one of the most striking pictures in the exhibition.

PARIS FASHIONS.

[From our Own Correspondent.]

THE fashions are becoming more and more strongly defined, and may be regarded as settled for the rest of the fine season. The changes that will henceforth take place will be merely matters of detail. Figured fabrics, whether of a single color, cameo (several shades of one tint), brocaded, or damask, color on color, are in great favor, but are used for polonaises alone, with a plain skirt of the same color as the ground of the polonaise. White muslin polonaises are worn over a skirt of faille or foulard, either gray or of one of those neutral tints that are so much in vogue. All bright, decided colors are considered in bad taste, and have disappeared from the feminine toilette, which employs none but faded tints, apart from dark colors or black, which is worn so much as to be the uniform of the majority.

Crinoline also has disappeared; cut in two, it exists only in the form of a tournure. This is a pity; for it must be confessed that it was both convenient and economical, and rendered us great service; while it lasted we had not the trouble of holding up our dresses in the street, or the pain of seeing them frayed and soiled on the bottom by being trailed through the dust and mud. But regrets are in vain; crinoline is no more, and we can not bring it back again.

Most dresses are of two colors, mixed, or else of a dark color for the skirt and a lighter shade for the bindings and linings of the trimmings, which are lavishly employed. Scarcely any black dresses, except for mourning, are made without bindings and pipings of pale pink, blue, or gray.

For very dressy toilettes, two different colors are used; among others, olive bronze and pale blue. I lately saw at a large dinner-party a trained skirt of olive bronze faille, trimmed with three flounces with wide headings, lined with pale blue; these headings were turned back so as to show the lining. Large over-skirt likewise of olive bronze faille; the two front breadths of the over-skirt were lined with pale blue, and turned upward so as to form revers, and were caught together in the middle under a large pale blue bow. Low waist of olive bronze faille, finished on the neck with a pale blue piping. Short sleeves to match the waist. The same dress is made in écru and violet vineux, résédа green and pale pink, etc.

By dint of shrinking, to make room for voluminous chignons, tall coiffures, cascades of curls, high bandeaux, etc., bonnets will finally disappear altogether. I foretold this a long time ago, and my prediction has well-nigh come true. During the last few days, indeed, we have seen bonnets composed solely of a wreath of flowers, placed on the head like a crown, and sustaining a lace veil. These bonnets are nothing more or less than head-dresses; and as they are admirably suited to all styles of hair-dressing, crêpes, rings, and frizzes, there is reason to suppose that they will become general, though as yet they have been adopted only by a few sensational people. Now that we are on the subject of hair, I will give a little recipe which may be of use to your readers. False hair is apt to grow rusty with time; a darker color may be given it by the following simple process: Burn some paper in a porcelain or any other covered dish; take the ashes of this paper and brush them thoroughly through the hair.

The trimmings of dresses, while they are still composed of the same elements—flounces, bias folds, ruches, and puffs—are nevertheless infinitely diversified by the mixture of all these elements. Let us say, in the first place, that these trimmings are themselves trimmed, either with bright colored bindings, or with narrow laces, or with fringed ruches (made of the long threads of the stuff raveled out), or with thick rolls. The flounces are cut in scallops, points, triangles, leaves, etc. The puffs are made very large, and a design made of cord or soutache is applied thereon; moreover, puffs do not dispense with the necessity of flounces any more than flounces do with that of puffs. In short, all trimmings are very much overloaded this season, and when these colors, so different and hitherto considered hostile to each other, such as violet and blue, blue and green, etc., are not employed by an artistic dress-maker—when these flounces, ruches, and bows are not amalgamated by a modiste joining to the genius of a Delacroix that of an Ingres, at once a colorist and a designer, the effect is often grotesque instead of pleasing. This is a fact which it is important to point out to the women of all nations. See how the people laughed at the dress worn by the Princess Royal of Prussia at the opening of the Vienna Exhibition! This dress was composed of a blue skirt, a white over-skirt, and a pink hat—all colors which contrast more painfully in proportion as they are more decided. Slender and youthful married ladies, young girls, and misses wear this season pretty scarfs of white or printed muslins—in the latter case like the dress. White muslin scarfs bordered with insertion, under which the muslin is cut away, and edging to match—Valenciennes or Mechlin (the latter is even more in favor than the former)—will be worn even with dresses of different materials. We give the following type of this fashion:

Dress of dark blue faille, with trimmings bound with faille of a lighter shade; under all these bindings is set a narrow band of white muslin, pleated and edged with narrow Mechlin lace. High waist with small basques. White muslin scarf, bordered with a hem about four-fifths of an inch wide. This hem is edged with Mechlin lace set on flat, and surmounted with Mechlin insertion, under which the muslin is cut away. In the middle of the upper edge of the scarf, which is very long, a few pleats are laid, over which is set a bow of ribbon of the same color as the binding. The scarf is worn crossed in front, and tied behind in a single knot, consequently the ends of the scarf fall over the back breadth of the skirt, and take the place of a tunic, over-skirt, pouf, etc. Dresses of printed muslin are much worn with scarfs of the same material. In fact, these dresses are not suited either to over-skirts, polonaises, or poufs. They are made with a round skirt, trimmed in front with a deep flounce, and on the back breadths with several flounces. The corsage is a little jacket of the same muslin, not adjusted, but confined to the waist by a belt, and the scarf, likewise of printed muslin, is worn like that which I have just described. It will be readily understood that such a dress appears to advantage only on a very slender figure.

Misses from twelve to sixteen will wear over their dresses of fancy silk and wool fabrics small capes of the same material as the dress · these capes, which are rather short, veil the bust without concealing the figure, and take the place of any other wrapping. For cooler weather, which often comes even in summer, the same girls will have small mantelets of plain striped or spotted flannel. These mantelets are made with revers in front, and hoods, and are trimmed with woolen fringe. Of course they have no sleeves, and can be easily put on, or thrown off, and carried on the arm, according to the temperature.

The style of hair-dressing, while requiring, thanks to its bulk, a more or less considerable quantity of false hair, is nevertheless arranged in such a manner as to conceal this loan a little more carefully than was done a few years ago. A lady no longer confines herself to fastening a chignon on the back of her head. She brushes her own hair far up from the back, so as to leave the nape of the neck entirely free, then with the tresses of her own hair she composes the chignon, adding to it the tresses, braids, and curls to complete its bulk. Chignons, therefore, are still worn, although it is denied, but they are made on the head, instead of being kept in a pasteboard box ready to be pinned on, which gives them a less precise, and consequently a more natural, appearance. The front of the head is still very much exposed. The present style of hair-dressing leaves the ears and temples, and consequently the whole face, uncovered—a charming fashion for young fresh faces, but frightful for old and withered ones. Ear-rings and medallions are still much worn, and many tall shell combs of diverse fashions are seen.

Cheap light fabrics are represented by écru linon and batiste. The skirt is made of plain linon or batiste, and the polonaise of the same fabric, embroidered with large white polka dots, or else with open-work stripes. All dresses of this kind, whatever may be the material of which they are made, have the polonaise and skirt of the same color, only one is plain and the other figured or striped. Sometimes the polonaise or over-skirt is plain, while the skirt is striped or brocaded; but usually it is the skirt which is plain and the polonaise figured or striped. The reason of this preference is that all the new fabrics are damask, color on color, or brocaded, and are soft and pliable, so as to drape gracefully, which is a great advantage for polonaises and over-skirts, but a disadvantage for skirts, which need a firmer texture. The plain fabrics are more substantial, and are consequently better fitted for skirts.

Artistic jewelry is still much worn, and little else is seen in the daytime. Châtelaines, brooches, ear-rings, and bracelets are made of gilt, enameled and oxidized silver, set with rubies, sapphires, turquoises, and emeralds, employed simultaneously, and combined with exquisite taste. EMMELINE RAYMOND.

FANNY BRANDON'S VOCATION.

"I TELL you, Louise, it is my vocation," said Fanny Brandon, straightening herself to the full height of her stately figure. "I can never be happy but in a convent. I feel that I am every way fitted for that holy life; its calm and quiet are what I long for. You must not oppose me."

"I have said all I have to say against it, dear," said the elder sister, gently. "Now you must make up your own mind. Mamma will be sorry, but she is willing, if you think it really is your duty. Only reflect carefully before you decide."

The two girls were standing on the summit of one of the long lines of chalk cliffs that stretch along the French coast from Havre to Dieppe. A soft, smooth, elastic turf bent under their feet as they trod; the scent of gorse and new-mown hay came to them across the wide green stretches; below lay the peaceful little fishing-town of St. Valery, with its straight, narrow beach, its irregular houses, its long jetty running out into the water, with a light-house perched on the far end. They could see the flag flying on the Casino, and watch the bathers and loungers like ants moving upon the stony plage; and far away before them stretched the mottled Channel sea, gray and yellow and purple with the reflections of the heavy low-hanging clouds, and turbid with the mud and sand churned up from its shallow depths.

Louise sat herself down upon one of the fragrant bundles of grass, and began to sketch in water-colors. Fanny, thinking still of her grand vocation, walked up and down slowly between her sister and her mother, who was chatting with a Frenchwoman, who, like herself, had come up to the summit of the falaises for the air.

"Mademoiselle your daughter is very beautiful," said this lady, as Fanny's slow march took her beyond ear-shot. "Doubtless madame thinks already of marrying her to some desirable parti?"

"Dear me, no," said Mrs. Brandon, fussily; and, frankly, "I wish she would get married. But fancy, madame, she has set her heart upon going into a convent, and we can do nothing with her!"

"Par exemple!" said the Frenchwoman, in dismay; "and she so handsome, too. Well, well! how did that happen?"

"She was educated in a convent," said Mrs. Brandon. "One can have such advantages there at reasonable rates, and Frances had a great musical talent to be cultivated, and then—and then—you understand, madame—the child's imagination was dazzled, and this is the end of it. She thinks she has a vocation, and I, as you perhaps do not know, am a Protestant."

"Is it possible?" said the interested listener; "but then madame is English."

"Yes, we are all English," said Mrs. Brandon, bridling with consequence. "My lamented husband was major in the —— regiment. He was of very excellent family. He had a cousin who was a baronet. All the Brandons are of unexceptionable standing in England."

"Ah!" said the French lady, politely.

"My daughter is thought very like the Princess Alexandra," said Mrs. Brandon, importantly.

The girl turned toward them at that moment, and, in truth, she was strangely like the portraits that at that time were filling the shop windows—the fresh young girlish pictures of the bride of the Prince of Wales. Fanny Brandon was tall and stately, with a lovely swan-like neck, upon which a graceful little head swayed like a flower on its stem; her nut-brown hair swept back from a faultless face, somewhat too cold and haughty but for a flash of great dark eyes that now and then shot out from under drooping modest lids; and her mien, whose mingled shyness and loftiness looked much like pride, was very princess-like indeed.

"She is superb," said the flattering Parisian. "If it were not wicked, one would almost be sorry that the child has a vocation. Mon Dieu! how well she would wear a cachemire!"

"I never could do any thing with my children," sighed Mrs. Brandon; "they have always had their own way. I scold and scold, and it is of no use at all. Louise would be an artist in spite of me, and now Fanny will go into a convent."

"It is my duty, mamma," said Fanny, solemnly, her walk having brought her near enough to catch these last words. At this moment she turned and caught sight of a figure bending over Louise's sketching-block, the figure of a young man, with a straw hat in his hand, and a mass of tossed hair blowing in the wind. A scarlet flush swept her cheek.

"Who is that talking to Louise?" asked Mrs. Brandon, sharply, putting up her glass.

"Why, it is M. Chablis."

"What in the world has brought him here?"

"He is coming to speak with you, mamma," said Fanny, coldly; "do not rise. See, he is bowing already."

"Chère madame!" cried the young Frenchman, approaching. "Pardon me that I come back to you so soon. I am charmed to find you and your amiable daughters at St. Valery. Mademoiselle, I hope the sea-air does you good."

Fanny bowed haughtily, and moved away, while M. Chablis paid his respects to her mother; but as she paced along in her stately way she soon heard him behind her, and when, with flushing cheeks, she stood beside her sister, M. Chablis joined them, and flung himself lightly on the grass at their feet.

He was a spirited, ugly young fellow, with a great mass of dark hair growing straight up from a broad square forehead. His teeth were fine, and the plainness of his face was relieved by a pair of wonderful great dark eyes that gleamed like stars, and glared with the fire of an ardent soul.

"Ah, but I am happy," he said, looking up at Louise, "now that I am with my good professor once more. I hope you have missed your bad child, Professor Louise; I have walked two good leagues to see you all. Did I not play you a fine trick when I told you in Paris that I could not go to the Bains de St. Valery, because I must visit my dear old parents during my holidays? But I managed a surprise for you, mesdemoiselles, for I knew well our campagne at Veules-on-the-Sea was the very next town to St. Valery; and now, if you are not glad to see me, I will throw myself from the cliff."

"Victor, you are but a foolish fellow," said Louise Brandon, smiling kindly at him with a smile that lit a very plain face into a semblance of beauty. Fanny's older sister was neither young nor pretty; she had led a hard-working life, painting pictures and giving lessons in English, to eke out the scanty pension on which her mother lived, and her cares had left their traces upon her. Victor Chablis had been one of her pupils, and afterward her friend, pouring into her ears the tales of his worries and his mischiefs, and winning from her that ready sympathy which was her chief attraction. Louise always had friends; people loved and trusted her, and leaned upon her, and after the first forgot her dark skin and irregular features, and only remembered the lustre of her gentle eyes, the pleasant tones of her deep contralto voice.

Just now these tones jarred upon Fanny's ear, and she half turned away.

"Mademoiselle Fanny has no word of grace for me," said Chablis, marking the motion; "but you will not send me away," he continued, turning his eager glance upon Louise.

"Fanny is preoccupied," said Louise. "You must not bother her."

"I am glad to see you, M. Chablis," said Fanny, coldly, for she was sure he had not come to see her, and the thought gave her a strange little pang. Fanny, with her girlish enthusiasm, had been carried away in a not unusual manner by the fascinations that a conventual life exercises upon an excitable imagination, and had set her heart upon taking the veil. Louise and her mother had never opposed her in any thing, and they now allowed her to use her own discretion, thinking that course better than any violent opposition. Only before irrevocably committing herself Louise had stipulated that her sister should pass a couple of months with her and her mother, during which Fanny would have an opportunity of testing her own feelings more thoroughly. Therefore the girl had joined them in Paris, where she had been allowed such distractions as their humble means afforded, and now they had all come to this quiet watering-place on the French coast for a few weeks, when Fanny's serenity of mind was anew shaken by the sight of M. Victor Chablis, whom she thought she had given up forever. She had seen him for the two weeks before, in Paris, where he had frequently burst into their dingy little apartment like a ray of sunshine. He had talked and laughed with Louise and her mother, and now and then she had found him looking at her in a way which gave her a new sensation. What was there in those great black flashing eyes to disturb her peace? She was going back to her convent, where it would make no difference; but she had found herself wishing in a very worldly manner during the few days that she had seen him that she, too, could make herself agreeable like Louise, who was always charming, and feeling her own inadequacy to the occasion, had felt farther off from the world than ever. She had bidden Victor good-by very seriously, for she never expected to see him again, since the convent gates were to close forever upon her after six short weeks; but he had said adieu lightly, even laughing as he went away. Of course she knew their parting would make no difference to him; but his carelessness had given her some pain. She had fought against this mundane feeling bravely, and deemed that it was conquered; but now all of a sudden this youth flashes across her life again, smiling and making weighty speeches to Louise, and lo! it is all to do over. No wonder she turned away in perturbation.

But M. Chablis did not heed; he brought a bundle of hay for Mrs. Brandon, who now joined them, another for Miss Fanny, who was thus constrained to be seated, and then throwing himself at their feet he rattled away, pouring out all the wit and fire of his ardent and restless nature in a fascinating flood of anecdote and repartee, such as those gay young souls of the Quartier Latin delight in.

Fanny listened in a sort of daze to the stories of college life, to the torrent of republicanism, to the enthusiastic pictures of his ambitious future, which the youth drew with Gallic frankness. Finally a flood of regret seemed to sweep over him for the follies and wildness of his early youth.

"I have been a wild fellow," he said at last, in a low, sorrowful tone, "but that is all over now, Louise. I shall be steadier than steady for the rest of my days."

Fanny rose as he spoke, and walked a little apart from them, pulling the poppies that grew on the edge of a corn field near by. Mrs. Brandon had resumed her conversation with her French friend, and Victor stooped and said something low in Louise's ear as her sister moved away, and Fanny saw them smile and look content, and grew angry at the sinking in her heart, and scattered the red petals of the poppies on the ground unconsciously as she walked along. After a while she heard the two coming behind her.

Victor was pulling the blue corn-flowers and twining them into a wreath.

"'Les bleuets sont bleus, et les roses sont roses,'"

he sang, with a meaning glance at his companion, and Fanny knew what she was thinking, for she had been reading the song that very morning.

"'Les bleuets sont bleus, j'aime mes amours,'" chanted her heart softly in echo of the refrain.

"Will you wear my wreath, Miss Fanny?" asked the young man, humbly, as they approached her. "See how fresh the blossoms are!"

Louise had two in her hair, and Fanny guessed how they came there.

"Thank you," she said, coldly. "I like these scarlet flowers better; they are more becoming;" and she twisted a bunch of them in her dark plaits.

Then with a sudden, scornful change of mood she laughed and talked so gayly that Louise wondered. She bandied repartee with M. Chablis; she teased her sister. There was a singular restlessness in her aspect, and a feverish glitter in her eyes. She who was habitually gentle and grave showed herself capricious and willful, and a strange bitterness lurked in her caustic answers, veiled as it was by a semblance of trifling. By-and-by Victor went away, and she dismissed him with a careless nod.

"I suppose you will not come back," she laughed, "so take your keepsakes with you;" and she pulled the wreath of blue flowers from her sister's hand, and threw it after him with a scornful gesture.

"I will pick it up to-morrow," said Chablis, bowing gayly, "at the same hour. I like the gage. And then, mademoiselle, you ought to know that one returns always to—"

Without finishing his sentence, the young man waved his hat lightly, and strode away.

Fanny ended it for him in her thoughts: "His first love—that means Louise." And when her sister twined her arm around her, as they descended the steep path that led down to the village from the summit of the cliff, she did not return the caress. She was thinking in her heart all manner of unjust, cruel things. She felt out in the cold and alone. Louise loved Victor better than she loved her, and that tender pressure of her sister's arm was all a mockery. It was time that she went back to her chosen home, her peaceful, undisturbed life, where the chants and the orisons came in tranquil succession, and brought no jealousies and heart-beats with them. The sisters at the convent loved her, even if Louise did not care. And Victor? Victor never thought of her at all. It was only with him Louise, Louise. Whether he came or staid, her welcome or her disappointment was alike indifferent to him so long as Louise smiled and was glad. She might go back to the convent to-morrow, and he would never heed. Then for the first time a thrill of terror ran through the girl's heart as she thought what that going back would be. Did the sisters, after all, care for her as Louise cared—Louise, who had rocked her in her arms, and shielded her from every trouble all through her life? And would not the serious talk of the nuns be very tame after the brilliant nonsense of the young Frenchman, with his wonderful tales of his vie impossible? Perhaps, after all, what was to come would be "impossible life" for her. How strange it was! A week ago the arguments in favor of a worldly existence seemed so easy to answer. She almost wished Louise would urge them now, to give her a chance to argue cleverly with the adroit logic of the priests. But no: Louise was not thinking of that. She was talking now with her mother about the clothing that Fanny must take back with her, and in the girl's unreasonable state of mind it seemed to her as if they were already looking forward to her departure as something to be got through with.

When they came to the little whitewashed cottage nestled under the cliff, where they had their humble lodgings, Fanny pleaded a headache and escaped to her own room, where she sat dolefully by the window looking out upon the wide flat stretch of wet sand, where the ragged women and bare-legged boys were hunting for crabs in the dying light. The tide was ebbing, and a mist was drifting in from the north; and the sea, with its great roar and plash, broke drearily upon the beach. The girl brooded over her troubles till life looked very dark to her, and it seemed to her as if no one had ever been so unhappy before. By-and-by came Louise, with a smoking cup of tea, and bright words and smiles, and at last Fanny crept to bed, and listened to the rain and the wind which rattled the shaky casements, growing more dismal than ever, till at last she cried herself to sleep.

"It is pouring!" said Louise, waking Fanny the next morning; "we shall not be troubled with visitors." But in the afternoon a bright face peered in at the window, and, dripping but joyous, Victor shook himself like a water-dog in the little porch. He carried hung on his umbrella the draggled wreath of corn-flowers, which he laid at the girls' feet with many a merry jest at their want of promptness at the rendezvous. Then they chatted and played dominoes, and Victor read aloud to them, with his undulating Parisian accent, bits of French poetry, while the ladies worked deftly with their needles.

Fanny was grave and demure again, and scarcely raised her eyes from her embroidery, leaving the task of answering to Louise; but indeed M. Chablis did not need much response. Now and then, when there was a pause, he would fill it with some thrilling little poem from Alfred de Musset or Victor Hugo, and then Fanny felt as if Louise must blush at all the pointed sweetness of the strain; but when she stole a look at her, their eyes met, and she withdrew her own in such confusion at being discovered that she could not tell whether or no the shade had deepened on Louise's brown cheeks.

For many a day Victor's coming was the daily event, for always there was some excuse for his joining them in their excursions among the charming lanes and sunny orchards of the lovely Pays de Caux. Whether they drank milk with the picturesque old women in the thatched cottages, rode donkeys over the cliffs, lounged upon the beach, or gossiped in the Casino, Victor was always near to interpret the odd patois of the Norman peasants, or to bring his ready wit to cope with whatever situation the hour afforded. And always there seemed to be an excuse for his coming and lingering, and having little confidential talks in the doorway with Louise before he left, and Fanny struggled to maintain an indifferent mien; but many a night she cried softly, and woke with drooping lids and heavy eyes.

Louise seemed to take for granted that Fanny's gravity was the natural result of the step she was about to take, and often talked with her about her future life, though she no longer tried to dissuade her from it, but only said, earnestly, "Be sure you know your own mind." Of M. Chablis the two never spoke.

Mrs. Brandon and her two daughters were sitting in their little salon one afternoon when an odd little cab drew up before the door, from which descended a stout, bald-headed Frenchman, with a tuft of grizzled beard and an immense mustache, accompanied by a comely, dark-eyed woman, unmistakably of the shop-keeping class.

"My heavens, girls, it must be the Chablises!" cried Mrs. Brandon. "Fetch me my best cap, quick, Louise, and just help settle my gown." Fanny fled to her own room above, but the windows being wide open much of the conversation came to her ears, and before long the voices were pitched on so high a key that she heard every word.

When Mrs. Brandon made her best courtesy to M. Chablis, père, and Madame Chablis, mère, it was with the impression firmly fixed in her own mind that the couple had come to make a formal demand for her daughter in marriage after the most approved French fashion, and she had decided, after a due representation to them of the inequality of such a union, to bend from her state and give a condescending consent.

Great was her surprise, then, as the interview proceeded, to find that the good man and his wife were, on the contrary, come to deplore in their neat provincial French the entanglement of their son, and to beg Mrs. Brandon to help them to persuade the young man that to think of marrying a demoiselle without a dot would be utter folly and madness, as well as unprincipled disobedience. "Of course," they urged, "madame, being a sensible woman, would see how utterly out of the question it was for Victor, who had his career to make, to marry any but a rich wife."

"He has had great advantages," said the father; "our son's education has been of the best; he has had his cours in all branches, in literature, in science, in law; he has the ability to become a distinguished advocate; his examinations have been of the most brilliant. But to advance in our country, where every department is crowded, there is necessary, as madame well knows, wealth and connection—in short, a position must be made."

"And madame will understand," said Madame Chablis, taking up the thread of the argument, "that a union with a poor and undistinguished Englishwoman—though your daughter, I understand, is très bien—would be ruinous, utterly ruinous."

Mrs. Brandon, who, up to this point, had been too utterly taken aback by the turn that affairs had taken to do more than listen silently to her voluble visitors, here recovered her presence of mind sufficiently to take part in the conversation, into which she burst abruptly in her worst French, her agitation utterly confusing her idioms, and at length compelling her to resort to her vernacular, where she had her antagonists decidedly at a disadvantage.

"Do I understand," she burst forth, "that my daughter is considered too poor a match for a beggarly Frenchman without a farthing to call his own—my daughter, whose father was an officer in her Majesty's service, and is a lady born, and never had any thing to do with trade? She is very condescending to look at him at all," she went on, furiously. "And I have always told my girls they should be above associating with persons in trade, which, to be sure, he is not, and a very well-disposed and civil young gentleman he has always shown himself. But my daughter not good enough for him! Do you know, madame, that my blessed husband was colonel of the —— regiment, served in the Indian war, and always went into the very best society?"

Here she paused for breath, and M. Chablis, père, having dimly understood her meaning, pursued his own discourse gravely:

"Madame makes unpleasant hints with regard to our commerce," he said, politely; "but she should remember that it is that which has furnished our son with the means of rising above it."

"And he shall never have one sou if he marries your daughter," cried Madame Chablis, wrathfully. "Tiens, if madame will not hear reason, Victor must be compelled!"

Fanny could bear no more. She grasped her red capuchin and shawl, and ran away trembling from the house, rushing by the Casino and bathing-houses, away out upon the far end of the jetty, where she hid herself behind the light-house. The pier was nearly deserted, and no one remarked her as she stood gazing sorrowfully out over the heaving sea, which foamed and tossed, and hurled pebbles high in air as the tide thundered in, sprinkling her hot cheeks with salt spray.

A flood of grief and mortification swept over her. Now it was true, beyond all doubt, Victor loved Louise, and his parents opposed the match; and this was why they kept so quiet about it, and there was no declared engagement. How could she ever bear it? Suddenly the secret of her troubled soul was revealed to her. It was not as a brother that she loved Victor, and her wounded pride was forgotten in the sting of the discovery that she had given her heart unasked.

"How weak I am!" she thought; "and oh, how false to my vocation, which I have shamefully forgotten! I must go back, and at once. I can delay no longer; it is better so—better than to live here and see Louise Victor's wife. But oh, the free, beautiful life that might have been mine! I can not, can not bear it!" and she sobbed bitterly.

The poor child sat with weary eyes gazing out over the troubled sea, and the tossing waves seemed the symbol of the struggle in her heart. She had been very tenderly nurtured; sorrow had been kept from her in every way; burdens which she might have felt had been lifted from her shoulders by Louise's thoughtful care and love; and thus, unschooled as she was in the little disciplines of life, the waves of her distress seemed ready to engulf her.

"How selfish and wicked I am!" she thought. "Why can I not rejoice in my sister's happiness, and be sorry for her grief?" Then all her weakness was revealed to her, and standing there in the gray light, she did battle with her own soul; and after a long and strenuous fight with the evil passions that tormented her, her brave and tender nature won the victory, and her resolution grew strong once more.

"I can go now," she said at last, when the gray shadows of the gathering twilight warned her that her vigil must cease. "No one shall ever know what I have suffered."

But as she turned to go some one came round the light-house to where she stood with the great waves booming on either side of her, and she found suddenly that she was not alone upon the pier. M. Chablis's eyes were fixed upon her tear-stained cheeks, his own flushing hot in sympathy with her unknown trouble.

"Pardon me, mademoiselle, I came to look for you. One of the little children told me you were here, standing like a water-sprite among the waves. But you grieve, mademoiselle. What, then, has happened to vex you?"

His presence was so unexpected, his tone so tender, his sympathy so sweet, that before she knew what she was saying Fanny had stammered enough to show M. Chablis that his parents had been interfering. His eyes flashed angrily.

"I am a man, and not a boy," he cried. "I ask no permission to marry except from the woman I love. These threats make it hard for me only because they lengthen the time I must wait before I can dare to tell her my love and hear my fate. It is not easy to ask a girl to share a life of waiting and hard work; for work for her I will, and wait—forever, if I must, for I will marry no other."

"But if she loves you," burst forth Fanny, with noble forgetfulness of her own misery in sympathy for her sister, "and I think she does, she would far rather wait with you than not know you loved her; any thing would be better than that."

"You think she loves me?" cried Victor, ardently; "will you not say you know it? Oh, mademoiselle, you fill me with a new happiness."

"I dare not say," said Fanny, terrified at what she was doing; "I can not tell what my sister may think. I should not have ventured—"

"But Louise knows every thing," interrupted Victor; "we are one in our desires. Have I not talked with her, been encouraged by her, and yet trembled, as I now tremble, to ask the question that is on my lips?"

He bent toward her, a great light shining in his wide dark eyes, melting with a wonderful softness.

Fanny gave him one shy, quick, wondering glance, then broke away.

"What have I said?" she cried, hiding her face in her hands. "Oh, what a mistake I have made! Let me go; let me go; I must go home."

But M. Chablis did not let her pass. He took her little trembling hand in his with most tender respect.

"Mademoiselle, we must understand each other at last," he said. "It is you I love and have wished for my wife ever since the first day I saw you. May I dare to hope that you will let me work for you, and that you will wait?"

"But Louise," stammered Fanny, "my sister, does she not love you?"

"Dearly, I dare swear, but only as a brother, for she has been my friend and confidante through all. May I not now be answered?"

Fanny raised her shy eyes a moment, and Victor, with a self-command new to him, lifted the cold hand he held to his lips, and then drew it within his arm, where he held it tight.

"We shall not fear the future, love," he said. "I am strong, and shall do great things yet."

Then all at once Fanny remembered her vocation and the Chablis opposition and her mother's wrath, and there was much reasoning to be gone through with; but Victor's arguments were hard to answer, and her responses grew very feeble and illogical as they walked home through the gloaming, and he disposed of her objections one by one.

At last they reached the cottage, and Louise was waiting for them on the step.

"My darling," she said, as she took Fanny in her arms, "I am so glad, so glad! I hoped for this before ever you came from England, but perhaps you would not have learned to love Victor if you had not been jealous."

"Oh, Louise," said Fanny, frankly, in her sister's ear, "I wonder it did not kill me. I despised myself so utterly."

"And then you had a vocation," added Louise, mischievously.

Victor found means to appease Mrs. Brandon's indignation; and when his parents found that their displeasure was unavailing to turn their only son from his set purpose, they made the best of a bad matter and forgave him with true French adaptability. The clever young advocate and his beautiful wife are well known among the younger members of the French bar, and Fanny has never seen reason to regret her changed vocation.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Napoleon's Will.—The Exactions of royal Etiquette.—Macready.

THE attorneys employed by the Bonaparte family have made public the contents of the late Emperor's will. This has probably been done to silence the rumors that have been so long prevalent that, like the unjust steward, he had made an ample provision for himself in anticipation of some day losing his stewardship. The imperialists are accordingly very jubilant over what they term the Emperor's self-denial. He asked nothing of France except her love and the confidence which he never abused. He did not fill his private coffers at the expense of the people whom he governed, nor put by against a rainy day, as the Orleans king did, et cætera, et cætera. This sounds very fine, but where is the moral difference between lavishing other people's money upon one's private vices—and, unhappily, the "little bills" of S.M.I. have been discovered since this will was made—and putting it in the bank to one's private account? It may be granted that Napoleon did not hoard, but it is impossible to ascribe to him any nice sense of the sacredness of public money, or even of the simple laws of meum and tuum. Nor was it only that Louis Philippe was the more prudent "conveyancer" (to use a Shakspearean phrase) of the two. Napoleon believed implicitly in his star, and since he thought it would never set, made no provision for the night that was to come without it. "Je désire qu'à la majorité de mon fils, elle" (that is, l'Impératrice Eugénie) "habite l'Elysée et Biarritz." It did not enter into his mind on April 24, 1865 (the date of the will), that long before the next decade was over his wife would be the widow of an exiled ex-emperor. The terms of the will are very singular. "I recommend my son and my wife to the high constituted authorities of the state, first, and then to the people and the army." He wished to make use of the allegiance of the governing class above all things, and hoped all the rest would follow.

The examination of the claimant's fellow-countrymen during the present Tichborne trial—the Bishop of Orleans, who was the real Roger's tutor, Père Lefevre, his confessor, and others—has brought out some charming national characteristics. At one period one of the judges was compelled to interfere to prevent days being wasted over one witness with this bland interrogatory addressed to the counsel: "Is it not even yet borne in upon you, my learned brother, that it is useless to attempt to get a plain 'yes' or 'no' out of a French witness?" But their testimony is overpowering, for all that, and their shrugs and looks of contemptuous incredulity at the fat rogue whom they have come to unmask (who sits and laughs at them in court, like the rest of the audience, in the most unconcerned way) are as convincing as the best Queen's English.

I dare say you have often wondered, Mr. Editor, why I have not described to you an evening at Marlborough House, but the fact is, whenever I have been "commanded" to dine with the Prince of Wales I have always got off upon the only plea that is admitted in such cases, namely, that of being engaged to a lady. And the reason of this is that I can't sit up late at night. When H.R.H. gets into his smoking-room, he takes root there, and it is not etiquette to leave it until the heir-apparent retires for the—day. Unhappily he indulges in the same habit in the smoking-rooms of other people. When at the Duke of Devonshire's (at Chatsworth) lately he is said to have destroyed several members of the aristocracy, whose mature years did not admit of rising with the lark—in order to go to bed. On the second day he shot very ill, and ascribed his want of accuracy to having retired so early, namely, at three o'clock in the morning; and every other night he took great care to avoid this mistake. It would never do, you see, for the life and soul of the conversation to throw away his cigar at his usual hour (11 P.M.) with a, "You must excuse me, your royal highness, but I have to write a 'Gossip' for Harper's Bazar to-morrow, and it is expected that I should be in the freshest state of mental activity for that purpose."

The Duke of Devonshire, who is not a young man, is reported to have laid in bed ever since the visit of his royal guest, and to have besought his son, the marquis (Hartington), not to bring his young friend again to the paternal roof.

So Macready is gone at last. So long has he been absent from the public eye that many thought he had died years ago. It must have been at least ten years since Dickens told me that he took him, after they had dined together, to the Lyceum to see Fechter act (whom the elder tragedian had never seen), and not one single syllable of criticism could his host extract from him, favorable or otherwise. He seemed even thus early to have sunk into a state of torpor. He was, however, always reticent as to his opinions about members of his own profession, and this extended even to amateurs. Long after he had retired from the stage some country gentlemen in the neighborhood of Sherbourne (where he of late resided) were so injudicious as to ask him to witness some private theatricals. They doubtless bored him a great deal, but he said nothing, and only on being cruelly pressed to declare his preference for this actor or that, exclaimed, "Well, if you will have it, I prefer the prompter." "The prompter, Mr. Macready! Why the prompter?" "Because, my friend, I have seen least of him and heard most of him."

Of his talents as an actor you in America have had almost as many opportunities of judging as we in England; as a theatrical manager his name, like that of the younger Kean, deserves immortal honor as a purifier of the stage; unlike Kean, however, he was comparatively indifferent to popular applause. The latter was, as you are probably aware, brought up at Eton, and derived great advantages from that early connection with our aristocratic classes. An eminent lawyer, who had been his school-fellow, but whose way of life had led him far from the theatrical world, met him a few years before his death for the first time since their school-days at a private dinner-party. Wishing to say something civil, he recalled to his mind their old acquaintance in boyhood, and added, "I have heard much and often of your splendid acting." "Heard, Sir," replied Kean, in his deep notes, and with the bitterness of his own Shylock, "then have you not seen?"—a reply which, though not altogether unprovoked, Macready would certainly not have uttered.

Speaking of Shylock, here is a pretty Hebrew tale concerning an auction broker: A Jew and a Christian were shipwrecked and on a raft together. After great privations the Jew fell asleep, and was suddenly roused by his companion's ecstatic cries of "A sail! a sail!" "Vat dat? A sale, you say?" exclaimed the Hebrew, starting from his slumber; "and, mein Gott, I have not got a catalogue!"

R. KEMBLE, of London.

WATCHING.

ONE night I sat and listened for his coming,
Listened and waited long;
Then, like a summer bee, I fell to humming
Snatches of hopeful song.

But some caprice o'ertook me in the singing—
Some elf, with mocking whim,
Echoed my carol with a woful ringing
Of utterance crossed and grim.

My song became a sigh, as if a sorrow
Had fallen on my heart;
My song, "We meet, my love and I, to-morrow,"
Was now, "Dear love, we part."

And, though secure in joy, I turned to pond'ring
On mingled themes of pain;
Shaping to this in fearful, troubled wond'ring—
"If he comes not again?

"If this brief waiting were a life-long seeking;
If these mad fears were true;
And this unsummoned voice, within me speaking,
Into conviction grew?

"If, though this instant face to face expecting,
Never should he return;
What if that slight farewell, all unsuspecting,
Had been for Death's eterne?"

I could not think—my heart sank down in anguish—
Nor see, for Hope was blind;
He gone, I in the toiling race must languish,
The envied goal resigned.

"For who would care," so moaned I in my sadness,
"For such as I alone?
I borrow of his light, his sunny gladness,
Which goes when he is gone.

"Never return!"—But in that instant's pining
My weary grief had flown;
His eyes upon my moistened cheek were shining;
I was no more alone!

But in those hours of watching I descended
Chasms of prescient woe,
By his caressing arm alone defended
From griefs I yet may know.

GEORGE ELIOT'S SAYINGS.

SELECTED FROM "ADAM BEDE."

I HATE that talk o' people, as if there was a way o' making amends for every thing. They'd more need be brought to see as the wrong they do can never be altered. When a man's spoiled his fellow-creatur's life, he's no right to comfort himself with thinking good may come out of it: somebody else's good doesn't alter her shame and misery.

There's no slipping up hill again, and no standing still when once you've begun to slip down.

It's well we should feel as life's a reckoning we can't make twice over; there's no real making amends in this world, any more nor you can mend a wrong subtraction by doing your addition right.

We hand folks over to God's mercy, and show none ourselves.

"They that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of those that are weak, and not to please themselves." There's a text wants no candle to show't; it shines by its own light. It's plain enough you get into the wrong road i' this life if you run after this and that only for the sake o' making things easy and pleasant to yourself. A pig may poke his nose into the trough and think o' nothing outside it; but if you've got a man's heart and soul in you, you can't be easy a-making your own bed an' leaving the rest to lie on the stones. Nay, nay, I'll never slip my neck out o' the yoke, and leave the load to be drawn by the weak uns.

SELECTED FROM "THE MILL ON THE FLOSS."

Anger and jealousy can no more bear to lose sight of their objects than love.

Childhood has no forebodings, but then it is soothed by no memories of outlived sorrow.

It is a pathetic sight and a striking example of the complexity introduced into the emotions by a high state of civilization—the sight of a fashionably dressed female in grief. From the sorrow of a Hottentot to that of a woman in large buckram sleeves, with several bracelets on each arm, an architectural bonnet, and delicate ribbon strings—what a long series of gradations! In the enlightened child of civilization the abandonment characteristic of grief is checked and varied in the subtlest manner, so as to present an interesting problem to the analytic mind. If, with a crushed heart and eyes half-blinded by the mist of tears, she were to walk with a too devious step through a door-place, she might crush her buckram sleeves too, and the deep consciousness of this possibility produces a composition of forces by which she takes a line that just clears the door-post. Perceiving that the tears are hurrying fast, she unpins her strings and throws them languidly backward—a touching gesture, indicative, even in the deepest gloom, of the hope in future dry moments when cap strings will once more have a charm. As the tears subside a little, and with her head leaning backward at the angle that will not injure her bonnet, she endures that terrible moment when grief, which has made all things else a weariness, has itself become weary; she looks down pensively at her bracelets, and adjusts their clasps with that pretty studied fortuity which would be gratifying to her mind if it were once more in a calm and healthy state.

Among the various excesses to which human nature is subject, moralists have never numbered that of being too fond of the people who openly revile us.

MRS. FANNY STENHOUSE.

WE here present to our readers a portrait of Mrs. Fanny Stenhouse, of Salt Lake City, a lady whose lectures during the past winter on "Polygamy among the Mormons" have excited a more than ordinary interest among the ladies in the Eastern States. Mrs. Stenhouse is a native of St. Helier's, Jersey, one of a group of little islands in the English Channel, but spent the chief part of her early years in France, where she assisted as teacher in a Roman Catholic school, though she herself was a Protestant, her parents being members of the Baptist denomination. After some years' absence she returned on a visit to her relatives in Jersey, and then learned for the first time that many of them had joined the Church of Latter-Day Saints. At that time Mormonism was a new religion, the missionaries were very zealous, and polygamy was not only not practiced by the "Saints," but indignantly repudiated by them. Agitated by conflicting thoughts about religion, it is no wonder that when Mormonism was presented to her with all its claims to special gifts and miraculous powers, as in the first ages of Christianity, and in that deceptive garb of purity in which it was preached to the European converts, the young English girl accepted it as of Divine authority. Not long after she was admitted into the Mormon Church by baptism, and a few months subsequently was married to Elder T. B. H. Stenhouse, the youthful missionary, through the influence of whose zealous preaching she had been led to embrace the faith. Henceforth her lot was cast among the Saints, and for a brief time only she appears to have been happy in her new position. But her trials as a Mormon soon began. Four months after her marriage her husband was sent to preach in Italy, "without purse or scrip," and she was left in England unprovided for as a trial of their faith. The following year, with their infant child, she accompanied him on a similar mission to Switzerland. While in that country, where they passed through the severest trials of poverty for the sake of the faith, polygamy was first openly acknowledged as an essential doctrine of the Mormon creed, and, cruelly repugnant as the task was to her feelings, Mrs. Stenhouse was called upon to introduce the doctrine to the Swiss women. After three years' absence, during which they introduced Mormonism into seven cantons of the Confederacy, they returned to England, and subsequently left that country for the United States, or, as the Mormons termed it, "emigrated to Zion."

After a residence of a few years in this city, where Mr. Stenhouse employed his pen, first in connection with the Mormon newspaper, and then upon the staff of the Herald and other leading New York journals, they were called upon to break up their house and join a band of emigrants to Zion, where they arrived after a three months' journey with ox-teams across the plains.

Arrived in Salt Lake City, the immigrants were kindly received; but Mrs. Stenhouse, in common, no doubt, with many a sad and afflicted wife who had preceded her, now found by experience what polygamy in practice really was. In her little work, published a year ago, she gives a most interesting account of this period of her existence, and it would be well for those who theorize about polygamy and the domestic life of the Saints, and who find excuses for Brigham Young, to read the sad but evidently truthful story of what she saw and endured at that time, and what thousands of women have also experienced.

Another wife was introduced into the family, and she was not intended to be the last. The usual troubles of the first wife under the "plurality" system were intensified and rendered more acute, as might be expected, to a lady of refinement and cultivation than perhaps they might have been to one of a cold or unthinking disposition. What a wife's feelings under such circumstances must have been no one—probably not even a woman—outside of Mormonism could realize.

MRS. FANNY STENHOUSE.

Presently, however, light began to dawn. After many years, during which he had prospered greatly and risen to high position among the Saints in Utah, Mr. Stenhouse found his faith in the divinity of Mormonism weakening, and finally, with his wife—the subject of this sketch—who had long before in heart abjured the faith, he gave in his resignation to the authorities, and asked to be excommunicated. Three days after they left the Church they were attacked by four masked men, almost within call of their own home, and were grossly insulted and brutally treated by them. No effort was made by the Mormon priesthood to discover the perpetrators of this outrage.

From that time Mrs. Stenhouse resolved to devote all her energies in the endeavor to enlist the sympathy of the outside world for the sufferings of the Mormon wives, and the interest of women every where in the constitutional suppression of polygamy in Utah by act of Congress. During the past winter she lectured on this subject in various parts of the States, and was received every where with marked consideration.

Personally Mrs. Stenhouse is of medium height, inclining to embonpoint, ladylike, modest, and unpretending, attractive rather from her quietness of manner than from any special characteristics. She evidently possesses in a remarkable degree a reserve of latent power which qualifies her to do any thing which she believes it is her duty to undertake; and no one would suppose from her appearance that she had had such an extraordinary history, and had passed through the mental and physical sufferings which the degrading system of polygamy and the missionary life in Mormonism imposed upon her. She is now residing with her family in Salt Lake City. Her eldest daughter is the wife of Joseph A. Young, the eldest son of the prophet Brigham.

SLAVES AND SLAVE DEALERS.

A STREET SCENE IN ZANZIBAR.

IN this drawing three distinct classes of the East African population are shown. In the foreground is a party of female slaves and their children. They have been sufficiently long in a state of servitude to have recovered their plumpness and good looks; in the middle distance is a group of the dominant class in Zanzibar, the merchants, traders, and Banians who fatten on the nefarious slave traffic; while in the background we see a group of living skeletons, chained neck and neck, being newly captured slaves from the interior. In attempting to put down the East African slave-trade the English have set themselves a heavier task than perhaps they anticipated, but the evils which it produces are so palpable and so enormous that all civilized nations ought to help them in trying to put an end to it. It is intolerable that a large part of a mighty continent should be kept in a chronic state of insecurity, bloodshed, and misery, just because the Mussulmans of Turkey, Egypt, and Arabia annually require some 100,000 servants to do their laborious and menial work. The process is a most wasteful one, for thousands die of ill usage and hardship between their home and their final destination, while the slave-hunting system introduces intestine feuds into every village community. Would it not be possible for the embassadors at Constantinople and Teheran to point out to the Grand Turk and the Shah that by the simple process of offering good wages the people of North America get an abundant supply of European laborers to do their hard and dirty work, and to persuade the Turks and the Persians to act in a similar manner toward the negroes? It is useless to appeal to the humanity of these people; they regard such matters from a stand-point totally different from our own; but if it could be proved to them that they would in the long-run save money by employing free laborers, they might, through the logic of the pocket, become abolitionists. We do not believe that the slave-trade will ever be stopped by mere compulsion so long as there exists a demand in the country for negroes; on the contrary, its horrors will be intensified, as they undoubtedly are now by dhow-chasing and other feeble modes of interference; the only real remedy is to replace involuntary importation by free immigration. If the Orientals could be induced to accord the negroes fair wages, good treatment, and perfect liberty of action, a passenger trade might spring up rivaling in magnitude that of the North Atlantic, and Quashee would land at Muscat or Suez as unconcernedly as Paddy or Fritz go ashore at Castle Garden, New York.

HAIR DYEING.

THE practice of artificially changing the color of the hair has descended to us from remote antiquity. That it is common with us may be inferred from the innumerable nostrums continually advertised, as well as from the appearance of the heads and beards of some of our acquaintances. We may roughly divide the methods employed in dyeing the hair into two. The one, which is founded on the rational means of restoring the color of the hair, consists in supplying the materials employed by Nature for the pigment. Sulphur and iron, and perhaps manganese, appear to constitute the pigment in question, iron being found principally in the darker hair. Availing ourselves of this knowledge, we may darken hair by conveying to its bulbs by means of the absorbent power of the skin one or more of these materials, as may be required. They must be applied in a diluted solution to the hair glands, on the same principle that we are able to stain the bones of young animals by the administration of madder with their food. When iron is administered alone, it has the desired effect by mingling with the sulphur of the hair. When the hair is so far blanched that it no longer possesses this last substance, it must be supplied artificially in a separate form. Iron has this advantage, that it is beneficial to the system, and that its use can scarcely ever be hurtful. Bismuth, lead, and copper are frequently substituted for iron by fashionable hair-dressers. Most of the hair restorers sold in shops owe their coloring power to lead, which, combining with the sulphur of the hair, under the influence of the oxygen of the atmosphere, obtains the desired effect. Leaden combs exercise a similar action. The long-continued employment of the last-named metal must necessarily prove injurious, and is said to have caused colics, and even palsy, though the latter does not seem to have been well authenticated. Some people have used it for years without any apparent evil result.

The other and best-known process for changing the color of the hair is by the application of ordinary dyes. They act on the hair mostly mechanically, by simply staining it, just as silk and cotton and wool are made to change their hue. These dyes do their work in a few hours, or in a few minutes. They consist of different salts and preparations of iron, bismuth, lead, silver, and copper. Also some vegetable substances are employed, such as pyrogallic acid, and the juice of the walnut, the whortleberry, and the betel-nut. These and many other articles have been tried, with more or less success, to conceal the ravages of time. Much ingenuity has been bestowed in the preparation of hair dyes, and great improvement has been obtained in their results. We do not often see now a human head of hair passing through a gradation of tints, as we did formerly, beginning from snow-white roots and ending with purple-black tips. Nevertheless, even the most skillfully dyed head can not approach Nature, and can scarcely fail to be detected by a close observer.

THE TICHBORNE CLAIMANT.

WHO would have thought some some six or seven years ago, on reading a brief paragraph in the papers to the effect that a claimant to the Tichborne estates had appeared in Australia, that a cause would arise out of that statement assuming greater dimensions and arousing more popular interest than perhaps any trial on record? Looking back to the commencement of the affair, our surprise is as great as that of the Oriental fisherman when he saw an immense genie come out of a little leaden casket. Every thing connected with this case tends to bigness, the personal appearance of the claimant being no exception to the rule, and even the side issues of this extraordinary inquiry assume a portentous magnitude, just as the tributaries of the mighty Amazon far exceed in size the principal rivers of smaller countries. In this place we need not do more than remind our readers that the claimant, after a trial of unprecedented length, failed to convince a jury that he was the heir to the Tichborne estates, that he was then committed to Newgate on a charge of perjury and forgery, but was afterward released on bail. His trial on the former of these charges began in the Court of Queen's Bench, Westminster Hall, on Wednesday, the 23d of April, and some idea of the length to which it is likely to extend may be gathered from the fact that the opening speech of Mr. Hawkins, the senior counsel for the prosecution, alone occupied a week. His address was chiefly of a biographical character, as he first sketched the life of Roger Charles Tichborne up to the date of his disappearance on board the Bella, and then narrated the history of Arthur Orton, who, according to the theory of the prosecution, is identical with the claimant. The accompanying illustration gives a life-like portrait of the soi-disant Sir Roger Tichborne, whose real name, in the minds of most men, is Arthur Orton, the butcher of Wapping.

WE desire to call the attention of our readers to a new process discovered by Madame HERMAN, artiste, of this city, for taking life-size Busts from an ordinary photograph. These busts have all the beauty and durability of Parian marble, and can be furnished for less than one-tenth the price. She is also prepared to give private lessons in her entirely new method of making Foliage, never before taught in this country, which is a perfect representation of the natural leaf, and is made without moulds or scissors. It has been pronounced the greatest invention of the day. Madame HERMAN will also teach her new method of making Wax Flowers, by which any lady may become proficient in the art in three hours' time. Samples of her art, including busts of many of our most distinguished citizens, are on exhibition at her residence, to which our readers, and particularly the ladies, are cordially invited at 113 West 41st Street, New York.—[Com.]

EVERY mother who has a crying baby, or children subject to croup and stomach-complaints, can rely upon Castoria to keep the child well and give it rest. There are but few nurses in New York who do not use Castoria. It should be in every house.—[Com.]

OPENING OF SUMMER FASHIONS,

From "Smith's Illustrated Pattern Bazaar." One Dollar a Year, and a Great Premium.

1712

1712—Polonaise—will do justice to any kind of material. Is becoming for either stout or slight figure; the back has a postillion cut in two deep points, the centre being the shorter; is laid in a deep box-pleat on the under side, causing it to set out just enough to relieve the flat, awkward appearance occasioned by the absence of the pannier or bustle. The revere front gives it the coat effect. It is predicted for the coming autumn costumes. Requires eight yards of twenty-seven-inch-wide silk. Pattern, with cloth model, $1 00.

1718—Polonaise—is being extensively manufactured in Europe for Fall importations. It may be left open or closed in front of skirt with the same graceful effect. One of its greatest charms is, the draping will not become disarranged or slide to one side, as most styles. For wash goods, its merit is evident, as it is festooned and kept back with a single button. The straight front is the marked feature in all the coming styles. Requires about five yards of linen thirty-six inches wide. We recommend this shape for any kind of material, and feel sure we shall be gratefully remembered by such as take our advice in selecting it. Pattern, with cloth model, $1 00.

Notice the SPECIAL PREMIUM below.

Suit No. 33—The Overskirt is one of the greatest novelties; three yards of twenty-four-inch silk (without being cut) is so draped and festooned as to form one of the most elegant designs. Number of overskirt, 1502. Pattern, with cloth model, which shows how to festoon, &c., 50 cents. Number of under-skirt, 1571. Pattern, with cloth model, showing trimming, 50 cents. Number of waist, 801. Pattern, with cloth model, 25 cents. Patterns and cloth models of entire suit, $1 00.

Notice the SPECIAL PREMIUM below.

1555—Redingote—when belted down and draped, is a beautiful polonaise. By unfastening the belt and unbottoning the straps on the under side, it falls into a perfectly plain sacque—a most valuable novelty for laundring. Requires six yards of one-yard-wide material. Number of Redingote 1555. Pattern, with cloth model, any size, 50 cents. Number of skirt, 1589. Pattern, with cloth model showing trimming, 50 cents.

1555

Notice the SPECIAL PREMIUM below.

1360—Redingote—is suitable for any kind of material. It is close fitting in the back, with two large pleats laid at the bottom of waist. The front is without darts and double-breasted; can be belted in or left loose, at pleasure. When made in silk, poplin, or cashmere, it serves for either house or street. Requires seven yards of twenty-seven-inch goods, to make a full, long garment for medium-sized lady. All sizes. Pattern, with cloth model, 50 cents.

1360

818—Is one of the most satisfactory ways of making piqué, linen, or cloth suits for children. It is appropriate for girls under six years, and for boys four years. The jacket is nearly tight-fitting; the vest is not separate, but simulated by the trimming. Battlements are cut in the side forms of the back, to correspond with those in front. The skirt is gored, and laid in four box-pleats at the waist. Is easily laundried. Requires one and a half yards for four years. Pattern, with cloth model, 25 cents.

818

Notice the SPECIAL PREMIUM below.

712—Apron. It is simply a gabrielle slightly falling to the figure, and tied in the back with a sash of the same. Low neck and a band for the sleeve. Made in Swiss, silk, or alpaca. Sizes from two to ten years. Requires two yards of linen for seven years. Pattern, with cloth model, 25 cents.

WEBSTER'S PATENT

Button-hole Worker.

Pat. June 27, 1871. Awarded first premium at the Am. Institute and Md. Institute Fairs, 1871.

It is one of the most important inventions of the age. The most perfect Button-hole Worker ever invented! So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Every stitch is taken with the most perfect mechanical accuracy. Is used entirely independent of the sewing machine, and will last a lifetime. Does away with pricking the fingers, straining the eyes and with imperfect and irregular worked button-holes. They give universal satisfaction. Ladies who use them say that they are worth their weight in gold. Over eleven thousand sold during the first week of their introduction. Local and traveling agents wanted everywhere. They sell at sight, and give over 100 per cent. profit. Sample Button-hole Worker and sample Button-hole Cutter packed in a neat case, with full directions for use, together with sample of our new and novel way of canvassing, sent to any address on receipt of 65 cents. Orders by mail receive prompt attention. Address WEBSTER M'F'G CO., Manufacturers, Ansonia, Ct. Please state in what paper you saw this.

Compagnie des Indes,

PARIS.

Fabriques de Dentelles, Bayeux, 14 Rue Royale, Alencon, 20 Rue de Lencrel. | Fabriques de Cashmere des Indes, Cashmere, Umritzur.

MM. VERDE DE LISLE FRERES, of the Compagnie des Indes, especially address themselves to ladies of America contemplating a voyage to Europe, inviting their attention to their productions of LACES AND CASHMERE SHAWLS exhibited at their warehouses,

No. 80 Rue Richelieu, Paris, and N. 1 Rue de la Regence, Bruxelles.

Those who call either from interest and curiosity, or for the purpose of buying, will meet with equal courtesy. As this house pays no commissions under any circumstances to agents, the direct purchaser obtains all the advantages. All goods marked in plain figures. Prices invariable. English spoken throughout the house.

The Standard Lotta Bustle.

A Diploma has been awarded by the American Institute to A. W. Thomas, Patentee and Manufacturer for the lightest, strongest, most durable, comfortable, elastic, and cheapest Bustle in the market. The wearer can sit in any position whatever without bending or injuring it in the slightest degree, it closing entirely up on sitting, and returning with precision to its original shape on arising. The heaviest dress will not cause it to diminish its size, or change its perfect form (as is generally the fault). No ladies' wardrobe complete without the 'Standard Lotta Bustle. For sale every where. Ask for Nos. 10, 11, 15, 18, 22, &c., comprising the various sizes and styles. Patentee and Wholesale Manufacturer, 91 White St., N.Y.; & 801 Race St., Phila.

719 & 1103 BROADWAY,
IMPORTER OF ENGLISH HATS.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St. and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

A REED SHAKEN with the WIND:

By Emily Faithful.

A LOVE STORY by this celebrated woman. An exquisite romance of "Our Best Society," giving glimpses of Home and Heart Life of a deeply interesting nature. As a novel, enticing, it is calculated to alarm THE FLIRT, and to show the wretchedness sure to follow insincerity in love.

They say that inebriation is very prevalent in literary circles. A member of the press had a glass too much the other night at the theatre. (N.B.—It was an opera-glass, which fell upon him from the upper boxes.)

LITTLE GIRL. "Cos all good girls die young, and I don't care about that just yet."

A characteristic story is told of the most incorrigible of the burlesque writers. When a favorite domestic drama was recently brought out at Liverpool, a terrible wait occurred on the night of its production after the second act. The orchestra had exhausted its repertory, and still the curtain remained down. Presently a harsh grating sound was painfully audible from behind—the sound of a saw struggling through wood.

"What is that noise?" impatiently asked a gentleman of the author.

"Well, I can't say," answered Mr. Byron, mournfully, "but I suppose they're cutting out the third act."

A POST UNDER GOVERNMENT—A telegraph post.

An Irishman, leaning against a lamp-post as a funeral procession was passing, was asked who was dead. "I can't exactly say, Sir, but I presume it is the man in the coffin."

Sloper was asked to take the chair the other day. He tried to, but the landlord stopped him with it under his arm, going out of the door.

A correspondent writes: "I have to submit two instances of apt production of Holy Writ, to neither of which, I think, can any body object on the score of irreverence. In the first, an old clergyman was asked by his son, who was also a parson, to preach at his church. The young man, whose views differed entirely from those of his parent, was most delighted at his acquiescence, which, he thought, showed that the elder was gained over to his way of thinking. But his hopes were dashed to the ground when his father gave out for his text, Matthew, xvii. 15: 'Lord, have mercy on my son, for he is lunatic.' The second case happened to a field-officer in the army, who was at school with me. Sending unpaid to a former school-master an envelope full of potato skins, he received it back by return of post. On being foolish enough to pay sixteen pence—a great sum for a school-boy—he opened the covering envelope, and saw inside its flap this simple statement, Proverbs, xii. 16: 'A fool's wrath is presently known.'"

What kind of cattle do they have in Scotland? A man there advertises that he "wants a woman to wash, iron, and milk one or two cows."

"She only wore a single rose," is the language of a song. Rather a light costume. Wind wasn't probably east that day.

At a dinner, during a pause in the conversation, a gentleman accosted a judge present in a voice that attracted the notice of a very large party, asking him to drink a glass of wine with him. "For," said he, "you and I are connected."

"I am happy to hear it," was the reply, "but am not aware how."

"I'll tell you," was the rejoinder; "your ancestor hung twenty-nine out of thirty-two of my ancestors."

A paper announces that by the recent burning of an ice-house, twenty thousand tons of ice were reduced to ashes.

That unfortunate set of men known as Washington's body servants is thinned out so rapidly by death of late that it is feared not more than a few thousand of them will be left to take part in the centennial celebration.

FERNERIES.

A SHADY corner of your garden, where the sun seldom if ever comes, but which must nevertheless be adorned and beautified in some way for the eyes of the beholder or passer-by, will furnish just the spot for a fernery.

No more beautiful or refreshing object will be found in the garden than a bed of various kinds of ferns, growing luxuriantly, each in its own way, and needing no attention beyond an occasional shower from the watering-pot when the weather is dry.

A trip into the woods about the middle of May will give you plants well started and vigorous, which, if carefully transplanted, will scarcely show that they have been moved, but go on growing from the first. In the Middle States we have nearly one hundred varieties, some more rare and difficult of culture than others, and of beauty equal to the finest exotics, so that one need not go far from home to discover a sufficient variety for the largest fern bed. A summer trip among the mountains or a visit to friends in the country will afford an opportunity to gather them, and when once the attention is attracted to their abundance and beauty, it will be a great source of pleasure.

By the road-side and along the ditches you will find them, some tall and stately, with branching stems of grand proportions, and others so small and delicate that their little miniature fronds will scarcely be visible until sought after. Some love the damp and low places in the woods, while others are found clinging to the crevices of rocks, or upon the stone fences or rubbish heaps, where their seeds have lodged and sprouted; but a thing very rarely seen is a fern of any kind with its root in the water. It loves to droop over the brook as if to drink, and rejoices in the vapory moisture that rises from it, but chooses a drier place for its roots, as if afraid of the current that might some day wash it quite away. The lover of these things need not wait to begin a collection until every thing else is ready. A bed can be prepared temporarily to receive the little roots as they are met with, and by-and-by, when the rock structure is completed, they can be transplanted carefully into the places prepared for them.

As regards these rockeries, which are to give character to your undertaking, they may be of various styles, according to the space you may have at your disposal. If the grounds are large, and you have some unsightly object at hand for which a screen may be desirable, directly in front of it will be the place for your rockery; and it may be reared high enough to answer the double purpose of use and ornament. If rocks and stones are scarce, any old bricks or débris from a demolished building will answer every purpose.

To begin work, we should recommend you to have before you a drawing of some old ruin, representing a broken wall with openings here and there, and with an irregular top or margin. Any drawing-book will furnish you with sketches of this kind, if you can not improvise; and having marked out your ground, begin building up the wall with the bricks or stones as roughly and irregularly as possible. A boy can do the work, under your direction, if a mason can not be found, and you must judge of the effect as the pile progresses. Build it up with only one thickness of brick, and when this is done, make another precisely like it in height and general character, leaving six inches of space between them. When they are done, this space is to be filled, if possible, with good loam, or leaf mould from the woods. Here and there there should also be left small openings, like breaches, in your wall, occurring in different places on the opposite sides, and before filling in the earth it will be well to give the old bricks a wash of some coarse paint, of a yellowish-brown color, in order to convey as nearly as possible the idea of old stonework. If there are any good-sized stones to place about the ground at the base of your structure, the effect will be further improved.

This will afford a grand chance for different varieties of ferns and other climbing plants to enjoy their natural habits of growth. The kinds that love to lodge high up in the crevices or on the sides of mountains may be planted on the summit; and in the little breaks in the wall, and below, among the stones at the base, will grow the taller polypodiums, and lovely climbing fern that will cling so gracefully to the rough places until it reaches the very summit. A few creepers from the woods will not interfere with the ferns, but will help to support the stalk of the delicate climbing ones, and cover the whole wall with a sheet of dark green, changing with the earliest frost into a brilliant crimson. Other plants, like sedum and saxifrage and tradescantia, may be planted on the top, or in the holes in the sides, and all will grow together in pleasing confusion. I have seen one of these wall rockeries in which a doorway had been left, and around it were growing clumps of maiden-hair, wall-rue, and sempervivum in picturesque profusion.

presenting a large variety of literary and artistic attractions.

WOMEN AND WORK.

WE fear that one of the least promising traits of modern society is the marked distinction made between the compensation paid for the same kind of labor to women and to men. The poor seamstress toils for four or five dollars a week; her male rivals demand and obtain nearly as much for the work of a single day. The female teacher receives one-third less for her equally useful labors than the male principal. The man-servant gets nearly twice as much as the maid. We believe the same inferiority is insisted upon in shops, factories, and almost all other employments, and the rude distinction handed down to us from our barbarous ancestors is preserved without shame and enforced without relaxation. No one ever heard of a woman being as well paid as a man, and no one seems to have sought for the reason of the difference. It has, indeed, no reason. It is a blind delusion, the growth of superior strength, and rests upon the same impulse that leads the Pawnee to devolve all the toils of life upon his squaw, and the Patagonian to devour in seasons of famine his least attractive helpmate.

Yet the sad results to modern society of the usage seem to lift it above the range of ridicule, and the woes, the temptations, and the possible dangers that beset the paths of ill-paid women, the privations of the solitary seamstress, or the laborious life of the faithful teacher, have sometimes a painful and always a touching moral. We trust that the subject is already attracting the attention of employers, that they will in future endeavor to remedy so dangerous an abuse, and to set the example to foreign countries of an equal attention to the wants and the merits of their work-people of both sexes. The painful stories that often come to us through the newspapers of the destitution of sewing-women, of women living upon three or four dollars a week, show that the fatal principle is active among us. We must have employers as hard as steel, as relentless as a farmer of the taxes; and we have a public that is anxious to get its clothing cheap. But the duty of the public is plain. It is to patronize no shop where the work-women are not as liberally paid as the men; and of the women it should be the aim to make their complaints known to the people.

But we were chiefly desirous to urge the Board of Education to hasten the reform which they have already suggested, and to raise the salaries of the female teachers of the public schools to an equality with those of the male. There could be no more generous or more patriotic reform. It would be the first assertion of the principle that female labor should be condemned to no lasting inferiority in honors and rewards. It would make the public schools the announcers of the fact that we, at least, have abandoned the barbarous practice of our European ancestors; that woman's work is hereafter to be rated at its true value; and that, in the art of teaching, where perhaps she excels the opposite sex, her value is acknowledged, and her services amply rewarded. In this way our public schools would teach a lesson that all the world should learn.

THE BIG TRUNK.

THE season of travel is here. Saratoga calls with the voice of all her springs, and the Trunk replies. The sea takes up the cry, the hills repeat it with a thousand echoes, and field and farm ring its changes. The season of travel is approaching, and as a natural consequence the season of the Big Trunk too. And concerning the said trunk, there is no other season as apropos for a word or two of preaching to fault-finders.

From the time of flowers to that of frost the air rings with objurgations on the Big Trunk—chiefly from the mouths of those who never lifted a handle of it—and it is called the back-breaker, the man-killer, the patent porter-crusher, and other equally euphonious epithets. But do those of the sterner sex who so unsparingly denounce it imagine that the women who for the most part are the offenders in the matter of the Big Trunk are necessarily man-haters, or have any special object in destroying porters? Does it, indeed, never occur to them that their own sex has some blame to receive in the matter, and that the railroad smasher and his master are at least participants in the wrong?

When the railroad authorities began to make an extra charge to the traveler for every additional trunk he checked it became necessary, of course, since there was no chance to rebel, for the traveler to outwit his tyrant, and to shut two trunks into one. And when the smasher began his depredations upon baggage there was nothing for baggage to do but to be twice as strong, and therefore twice as heavy, as before. Nor is the baggage-smasher solely responsible in his province, since his singular adroitness in ruining property is to be attributed more to the rush and hurry of our fast American business life, which is almost purely masculine, be it said in passing, and for which neither steam nor electricity is fast enough.

So much of the fault of the Big Trunk, therefore, it is plain, does not belong to the owner of the trunk, but to the very persons in whose behalf the greater portion of the complaining is done. But having now explained the reason of its being at all, let us look a little more closely into the subject.

In the first place we feel called upon to deny that the Big Trunk is of necessity or propriety a back-breaker or body-crusher. Originally, to be sure, advantage was taken of its size to pack away a whole wardrobe in it; but as luxury has increased, and a lady's wardrobe has assumed not only its present dimensions, but its present extravagant value, something was found to be necessary for the transportation of the precious wardrobe which should occasion the least possible folding and crumpling, and there was the Big Trunk at hand and ready-made. French maids soon learned how to tack on the inside in separate layers the broad tapes which, tightly stretched and tied, should hold the various skirts in place so firmly that let the trunk be tumbled from the north to the south pole, yet not a fold of the silks and laces should be disturbed. And so it has come to pass that the lady who travels with the Big Trunk is tempted to disregard the extortions of the railways, and almost universally takes along a smaller trunk for the conveyance of the heavier articles of her attire, and reserves the Big Trunk for little else than her dresses and her hats—not, be they ever so goodly a number, necessarily a mountainous burden to the frames that porters are wont to boast—and as a general thing the trunk itself is much weightier than its contents. If there are among us any yet remaining who insist upon stowing their possessions up to the last limit of their trunk's capacity, and then getting in and treading down the contents as if it were a wine-press, they are the ones who bring discredit and perhaps overthrow on an institution that, fitly used, is of great value, and who, if they persist, may eventually render it impossible for any one to appear at a distance from home in a fresh and untumbled toilette, since it is a matter of impossibility to crowd the multitudinous ruffles and plaits and draperies of a modern dress into any narrow compass and take them out uncreased and in decent condition. Fathers and husbands who complain now of the fees they pay to porters will in that day have many times as much to pay in the provision of the new dresses required to take the spoiled ones' places, for soil can be removed, but wrinkles are ineffaceable.

This feeing of porters, by-the-way, connects one with a novel and mysterious employment of which but little is known in the world abroad, and which few of us who toss the puffing Hibernian his half dollar are likely to guess at unassisted. We have all of us been wont to fancy as we relieved our consciences at the top of the third flight by that amount of currency, and received the voluble thanks customary therefor, that at any rate the man was by that much the richer, and he who handled so many trunks a day must handle as many half dollars, and all the sooner be ready to retire from the back-breaking business. But which of us was ever acute enough to guess the truth, and to conjecture that the poor man had but farmed out his strong muscles for small but regular per diem wages? Yet such is the fact. In most of our large hotels some one individual purchases of the proprietors the right to move the baggage of the guests; and so much of the transaction being complete, he introduces into the house his own corps of porters, to all of whom he pays the usual daily wages of their class elsewhere, and the transaction is concluded when the liberal fees of our free-and-easy pleasure-seekers are transferred, as we understand is the invariable case, from the porter's pockets to those of the employer, exact account being taken and rendered, and the business footing up a very handsome yearly return to be passed to the credit of the Big Trunk.

STEP-MOTHERS.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

THE cruel step-mother is the bête noire of fairy-land, and is not unknown in real life. I have seen step-mothers who, if left to my judgment, would have been speedily doomed to outer darkness, where are weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth. And I have seen step-mothers whose care and patience and tenderness and wisdom were not to be excelled. Between these two extremes comes every grade of goodness and badness.

It is not to be concealed that the relation is one of exceeding difficulty. It is, in a sense, unnatural. The natural way is for husband and wife to see their children grow up, to live to a good old age, and to die full of years and honors. When the wife dies prematurely, the whole current is set back. There is confusion, derangement, and almost inevitable injury. It is seldom that the remainder of life is more than a partially successful effort at restoration. No one knows better than the conscientious and sagacious step-mother how irreparable is the loss which the mother and the children have both sustained. Whether it is better supplied by the assumption on the father's part of the whole responsibility, or by the substitution of a foreigner for the lost mother, admits of question. When we see a step-mother reckless, cold, and cruel, or even when we see one really endeavoring to do her duty by the children, yet doing it without heart, without warmth, without sympathy, without success—priding herself on meeting abundantly all their material wants, yet with no loving appreciation of their inward nature, and never securing their confidence—we are ready to condemn the whole relationship. When we see a father becoming to his bereaved daughters a very mother for tenderness and watchfulness, a companion and confidant in school and social life, their most intimate and trusted friend, making for them a bright home and a happy life, training them up to respectability, usefulness, and grace, keeping the image of their mother fresh and her memory green, doing her honor as the one woman of his life, and avowing, by his daily walk, his belief in immortality and his expectation of a glorious reunion, then we say this is the true course, though in some things we see that the home and the daughters show the lack of a woman's tender training and fine touch. But another man marries a wife whose great heart infolds his children not only from love to him, but pity for them. The home which was forlorn grows warm and attractive. The children, who were a little wild and shabby and inharmonious, are once more clothed and in their right mind. Another father, who remains true to his last wife, presides over a house which daily deteriorates. Irregular meals, improper food, insufficient and inappropriate dress, uncared-for children straying in the streets, a house waxing constantly more dreary, comfortless, and repulsive—these make even a step-mother seem not the most unpromising establishment in the world.

Below the ideal marriage between one man and one woman growing ever more and more into a complete and perfect sympathy, and sinking at last into a common grave to rise together in newness of life, there are many forms of marriage worthy the name. But something is gained when we settle down into the conviction that marriage is a matter between the man and the woman, for them to decide, and for nobody else. If no man would henceforth ever say that he wants to marry in order to provide a mother for his children, he would stand better at least before the woman-world. His assertion may be true, but he would much better keep it to himself. In the first place, nobody believes him. Talk about the children is a ruse which deceives no one but himself. It is because he himself wants a wife, and not because he is moved with compassion toward his children, that he begins to agitate the subject. At any rate, people will always think so, and he will only be laughed at for his pains. In the second place, the alleged fact is no proper motive for a marriage. It is an insult to women, and implies mean-spiritedness in a man. There is no greater nuisance than a hungry prowler about society, seeking whom he may devour for his cubs. Let him hold up his head like a man, and take care of his children himself the best way he can; and if Providence decrees him to fall in love, and he can command a woman's love in return, and make her look kindly on his children for his sake, no one will forbid the bans; but to ask a woman to accept him for his children's sake is asking her to cheapen herself indeed. It is difficult enough to mother the children when she is in love with the father; but to ask her to do it without that stimulus and support, to take father and children both out of a generic compassion, is to invite rejection and make pity and respect alike impossible.

So if a woman marries a man who has been already once married, it may be that her love for his helpless children impelled her, but it is not in good taste to say so. Let her say nothing about it. He or she who excuses, accuses. A man ought to be so in love with a woman and a woman with a man as not to care what people say or think of their marriage. They should be so satisfied themselves as to be indifferent to the satisfaction of indifferent people. A man may be weak to fall in love a second time, but he is never so weak as when he is apologizing for it. A woman may be foolish to encumber herself with a bothersome man and a family of turbulent children when she might live in peace and tranquillity, but if she keeps her lips sealed, no one will ever know whether she is or not. Is she annoyed by the common strictures passed upon step-mothers? She ought to be so good a step-mother as to be able to laugh them to scorn, and to find in the cordiality of her step-children a balm for every wound. Is she pained by the implication of being her husband's second choice? She ought not to have married him without a love so deep, a sympathy so comprehensive, as to know no past and no future, and her satisfaction and enjoyment in him ought to be so great as to make every arrow pointless and both their hearts invulnerable. People will forever talk, but there is a love which never heeds it nor ever hears it, and it is the only love worth having. The one thing that ought never to be apologized for or explained is marriage. If it is not sufficient unto itself, nothing can make it sufficient. The explanation may be eminently virtuous and plausible, but who shall explain the explanation?

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

INFANTS' CLOTHING.

LAYETTES at the furnishing houses are made with dainty neatness, yet there is little novelty about them to record. The fancy is still to hide plump, dimpled shoulders under high-necked dresses with long sleeves, and to make very long skirts, measuring a yard from the waist down. Baby dresses imported from Paris are cut with half-low square necks, and a high yoke of lace and embroidery is then added, making the garment do duty both as a high and low dress. Imported christening robes are made of linen cambric, ornamented with daintiest needle-work wrought on the garment, and finest Valenciennes. Less expensive robes are of French nansook, soft, fine, and of yellow-whiteness, like India muslin. The yoke and the broad tablier are formed of lengthwise bands of Valenciennes between puffs of nansook. The skirt may be finished by a deep hem headed by insertion, or else a flounce finished with lace. The sash is tied on the left side, and is made either of watered ribbon or else soft twilled India silk, with fringe knotted on the ends, and is always snowy white, as every thing baby wears should be. Some mothers prefer a muslin sash, with insertion bands its entire length, and an edging of Valenciennes. Ordinary day slips are made with plain yokes and full loose breadths not confined at the waist by belt or sash.

Infants' cloaks are large double capes of repped piqué. The upper cape is almost covered with embroidery done in "baby patterns" of slender vines, lilies-of-the-valley, with tiny buds and leaflets. For those who use woolen fabrics at all seasons of the year there are cloaks of white cashmere, lined with thin silk, and handsomely embroidered: price from $60 to $85. Cashmere cloaks trimmed with silk bands and fringe cost $35 or $40. The cap is of Valenciennes lace and appliqué embroidery, made close-fitting, with slightly pointed crown in Normandy shape. Lace turbans are prepared for baby boys. Shapely little sacques of zephyr wool, knit in Afghan stitch, white, with rose or a sky blue border, are used for extra wraps on cool mornings: price $1 60 to $2. Larger and thicker sacques, knit in shell figures, are $3 25.

SHORT CLOTHES.

The first short dresses are also made with yokes, to which full breadths are added, making waist and skirt in one piece, but a belt is placed underneath, and the muslin is gauged on it in two or three rows of gathers. The French aprons, which are merely yoke slips without belts, are also used as dresses. Gabrielles still rival the yoke slip in popularity. There have been several attempts at changing the shape of this garment, but the simple model at first used is invariably returned to as the best. Corded piqué and white Irish linen are the fabrics for Gabrielles. The trimmings are insertions of open-worked English embroidery set in, with the goods underneath cut away, and a scant ruffle of embroidery of the same design edges the dress. The insertion sometimes outlines tabliers on the front breadth, passes over the shoulders and down the back. On other dresses it is inserted diagonally, or in blocks, or else oval medallions. On piqués a kind of piqué braid covers the edge where the insertion is joined to the fabric.

For girls over a year old square-necked sleeveless over-dresses of piqué are worn over Gabrielles; also high-necked princesse over-dresses with long sleeves are worn above the plain skirt of piqué. The furnishing houses provide for every-day wear factory-made blouses of pale buff linen cut in Gabrielle shape, and neatly trimmed with rows of braid. The price is $1, and the garment is large enough for a girl of two years. Boys' blouses are of thicker linen, cut with diagonal front, and belted. Price $2. The wrap worn alike by boys and girls of one or two years is a walking coat of piqué—a kind of long wrapper dress with large cape. Girls begin at this age to wear the regular Normandy cap, with its high pointed crown of muslin, plain, puffed, or embroidered, over a colored silk lining, and trimmed with colored ribbon or black velvet: price from $7 to $14. Lovely little sun-hats of piqué are made with embroidered crowns buttoned on a scalloped brim. These cost only $2, and are very easily laundried. Boys wear soft straw turbans, shaped precisely like the Rabagas hats worn by their mammas, with white royale velvet band and facing, and a closely curled ostrich tip.

SAILOR SUITS.

Sailor toggery is more popular than ever both for boys and girls. Girls of three years old and upward wear piqué dresses made with a sailor blouse and one gored skirt, trimmed with bands, collar, cuffs, pockets, and sash of blue Chambéry. These cost $6. Pale buff linen sailor dresses, with brown, white, or blue accessories, cost $5. The navy blue flannel suits for the sea-shore, traveling, and for cool mornings in the country, are trimmed with white braid, one wide and two narrow rows, and cost from $6 upward. Pale blue and white cashmere trimmings are also used on these dresses. Boys not yet in trowsers wear piqué, linen, and flannel suits made with sailor blouses and kilt skirts. Price $5 50 for piqué dresses slightly braided.

The sailor jacket of white loosely woven cloth, with stripe or polka dot of color, is the favorite wrap. It is double-breasted, with revers; the back is close-fitting and slashed. The revers is faced with black, blue, or brown silk to match the figure in the cloth, and the band around the sacque is of the same silk. Price $10 for sizes large enough for girls from four to seven years old. Deep navy blue cloth sacques with white piping and silvered buttons are sold for girls from nine to fourteen years of age: price $12 50.

STOCKINGS, SHOES, ETC.

The skirts of little girls' dresses are worn quite short, just coming below the knee. The long stocking is gartered above the knee, and the drawers are not visible. The English fancy for wearing colored stockings is being adopted here for children. During the winter children of wealthy people were arrayed in white throughout, except the stockings of scarlet or blue merino. Striped lisle-thread and cotton hosiery with wide bands of color around the leg, brown, black, blue, or scarlet, are now worn with white summer dresses. This is in questionable taste, but it is the fancy at present. For very small children there are buff, pink, blue, and gray kid boots, buttoned on the side, and without heels. Girls of three years and misses wear black kid buttoned boots. Boys also wear striped stockings and buttoned boots; besides these, the low shoes tied across the instep are popular for the little fellows.

SCHOOL-GIRLS' DRESSES.

The convenient model prescribed for school-girls' dresses is the box-pleated blouse-waist with two skirts, or else the single skirt with a loose belted polonaise. The dress skirts of girls just in their teens should reach the ankle; younger girls are wearing shorter skirts than formerly.

Flax gray linen suits, cool, and not easily soiled, are a boon to the school-girl. They should be made simply, and may be entirely without trimming; at least braiding and embroidery are superfluous. On the skirt put one deep kilt pleating, or else two gathered straight flounces hemmed below, and each headed by a bias band. Make the polonaise a loose double-breasted front, with adjusted back; hem the edge, or else face it; put two rows of large pearl buttons down the front; make square pockets and cuffs, and wear with a Russia leather belt. This suit will require a white habit shirt beneath, but if the polonaise is made single-breasted, the skirt may be dispensed with. For plain prints, percales, and linen lawns, choose those with fine stripes, or else small polka dots. Put two straight gathered flounces eight or ten inches wide on the skirt; make an apron-front over-skirt with long full back breadths, and trim with a ruffle, or else merely hem; put from three to five box-pleats in the back and front of the blouse, and add a standing English collar, or else a high fraise. The sleeves may be coat-shaped, with a cuff, or else a frill falling on the wrist; if the shirt sleeves of last summer are worn, the cuff is turned downward, and made flaring toward the hand.

Guipure lace sacques are objects of desire by young misses; if simply shaped and tastefully made, they serve to make the simplest lawn suit look quite dressy. The German imitation guipure netting, in rose patterns or in stripes, is used for this purpose, and the edge or border is of real guipure lace. In very simple sailor shape and in small sizes these are sold as low as $12.

For commencement dresses and other gay occasions young girls wear white Swiss or organdy muslin dresses, trimmed with ruffles edged with Italian Valenciennes, and brightened up by a wide sash of watered ribbon, or grenadine, or of twilled silk placed just below the waist, around the hips, and knotted loosely low on the left side of the back. A pretty model for such a dress has four lapping box-pleated flounces on the skirt, each flounce being five inches deep, and edged with Valenciennes; the simple round over-skirt has one flounce, and above it is a row of lengthwise bands of insertion, with a box-pleat of muslin between; the blouse-waist is formed entirely of long bands of insertion, separated by a box-pleat; a high Medici fraise trims the neck, and a ruffle edges the wrists of the coat sleeves.

The sailor-shaped Rabagas hat of rough-looking Mackinaw straw, trimmed with a band and streamers of black velvet ribbon, is worn by young girls. Sometimes white daisies or rose clusters are stuck in the hat-band. The hat is worn far back on the head, or else on one side in a saucy way that is very becoming to fresh, piquant faces. The Rubens hat and the Medici, with the brim turned up high and closely on both sides, are also much affected by jeune demoiselles.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The revival of an old fashion in trimming is that of introducing wash nets amidst the pleats and ruffles of thin white muslin dresses. This net is like that of old Mechlin thread lace, and is inserted in wide bands in dress skirts with box-pleats of muslin placed upon it lengthwise. The effect is very pretty.

Very plainly trimmed skirts of black taffeta silk are chosen by ladies to wear under independent polonaises of linen, batiste, or summer camel's-hair. The flounces are alike all around the skirt, and consist either of two gathered flounces ten inches deep, or else one deep kilting laid in groups of three pleats in a cluster.

For vest-front polonaises a different trimming is used, as the open front displays the front breadth of the dress skirt. Loose puffs or wide bias bands, or else double box-pleats, or perhaps kilt pleating, extend from belt to toe on three front breadths, while two deep flounces are in the back. These vest polonaises are deeply pointed on each side, and are caught up in a puff behind by large bows. Black silk suits have jet fringe on the basque and upper skirt, or else on the vest-polonaise, and elaborate irregular flounces on the lower skirt.

PERSONAL.

MR. JAMES GORDON BENNETT has been sued in Paris. Some time ago the Herald noticed, in terms not positively delightful, the suit brought by the Vicomte de Brimont against Mr. PENNIMAN, of this city, for the continuance of an annual allowance which the vicomte stipulated he should receive from Mr. PENNIMAN at the time he, DE BRIMONT, married in Paris Miss PENNIMAN. The lady died a few years after the marriage, and Mr. PENNIMAN, who, it is rumored, was displeased with the course pursued by his son-in-law, refused, after the death of the daughter, to pay any thing more to the widower. There took place in Paris a suit, which M. DE BRIMONT gained; but meanwhile Mr. PENNIMAN had come to New York, the suit was revived here, and decided against DE BRIMONT. The Herald's criticism has raised the ire of the noble DE B., who has instituted a suit against Mr. BENNETT, now in Paris, and laid his damages at the sum of 100,000 francs. Mr. BENNETT proposes to defend to the last this attempt at extortion. He doesn't exactly see how he can be prosecuted in Paris for articles published in New York.

—Truly "man heapeth up riches, but can not tell who shall gather them." A fresh instance of the truthfulness of the aphorism has recently occurred in Philadelphia. Some two years ago Mr. WILLIAM P. WILSTACH, an opulent gentleman of Philadelphia, died, leaving about $1,100,000. By the terms of his will half this sum went to his wife, and half to his daughter, then a minor, who was to come into possession on attaining the age of twenty-one, which would be on March 21, 1874. In case of death prior thereto her share was to go to certain public institutions of Philadelphia. A few days since Miss WILSTACH died, and so the half million bequeathed to her will go to the charities designated in her father's will.

—TAUCHNITZ, the eminent publisher, of Leipsic, has given a copy of each of his publications to the Free Library of Chicago. Several American publishers, of various degrees of "eminence," have done the same thing, though it hasn't been much exploited in the newspapers.

—M. CASIMIR PERIER, the new French Minister of the Interior, is the son of the celebrated minister whom THIERS supported in the days of LOUIS PHILIPPE, and in his diplomatic career at various European courts he has earned high reputation for liberality and ability.

—Mr. JOHN WILSON is a gentleman whose name is just now in the types of all the Paris papers for having given to the Museum of the Louvre a painting by CONSTABLE, taken from his private gallery, as well as the "Bay of Weymouth," which he recently purchased for 56,600 francs. On the same day M. DE REISET had bought for the Louvre the "Cottage" of CONSTABLE for 24,500 francs. Gentlemen of wealth hereabouts have here instances which they may emulate by presenting to our Metropolitan Museum of Art paintings worthy of being exhibited in what is to become our "Museum of the Louvre."

—Speaking of the habits of men who are most prominent in the financial circles of New York, "Burleigh," the New York correspondent of the Boston Journal, says: "The sons of WILLIAM B. ASTOR walk down regularly every day from the Prince Street office to Wall Street. Watches can almost be set by their coming. Standing on the corner of Wall Street between nine and ten, the heavy merchants, brokers of a quarter of a century's standing, bank presidents, and officials who have fame, can be seen turning into the street and going into their offices before business begins. The Manhattan Bank is one of the heaviest banks of the city. Mr. MORRISON, the President, is a Scotchman and a devout Presbyterian. He worked his way up from a boy in the office to his high position. He turns the corner of Wall Street every morning about nine. He comes on foot, and does not leave his position till the bank closes. No cashier speculates with the funds of his bank."

—Father BECKX, the General of the Order of the Jesuits, is described as a short, narrow-shouldered man of seventy, with a tranquil countenance, "whose life seems to concentrate itself in his expressive gray eyes, shaded by long black lashes, and always bent to the ground except when he is addressing you." His head is long and narrow, and its baldness is concealed by a black skull-cap; his brown hair, interspersed here and there with a thread of silver, is brushed back from his temples behind his ears, and a sharp, prominent nose and thin, bloodless lips complete this very characteristic countenance. He speaks French and German with equal purity.

—BAYARD TAYLOR writes from Vienna that although American industry is not yet represented at the Exhibition, our people are, and by gentlemen concerning whose character there are and can be no reproachful rumors in Vienna.

—The Marquis of Lorne and the Archbishop of Canterbury have been corresponding on the subject of small livings in the Church of England. The marquis suggests that a fund might be formed large enough to make it certain that the incumbent of every living should have, at the least, two hundred pounds a year. Toward the establishment of such a fund Princess LOUISE and himself are anxious to render aid, and the Archbishop is quite agreeable—of course.

—Rev. NEWMAN HALL will revisit this country in August next and lecture in various cities, provided he can obtain the assent of his congregation, which is not likely to be withheld.

—The only instance in ecclesiastical history where a father and a son are both bishops is that of Bishop SAMUEL REINKE, of the Moravian Church, at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, and his son, Bishop AMADEUS REINKE, of this city, also of the Moravian Church.

—So successful was the play of David Garrick, with Mr. SOTHERN in the title rôle, at Wallack's Theatre during the past few weeks, that Mr. WALLACK has paid to Mrs. ROBERTSON, widow of the author, $1450 as copyright for its use!

—Mr. SMALLEY, the London agent of the Tribune, gives in a recent letter to that journal some interesting reminiscences of the late JOHN STUART MILL. "As a talker," says Mr. S., "he had a manner of his own. Talker, in common dinner-table sense, he was not. He seldom told a story for the sake of telling it, nor kept a store of frivolous anecdotes to be produced for the mere amusement of listeners. Nor would he talk to every body. On subjects that interested him and with the people of the right sort he would pour out in easy profusion his stores of information. Among all the men whom I have met in England I remember but two who were in any degree comparable to him in the variety and fluent accuracy of his knowledge. These two were men extremely unlike him and unlike each other—Mr. CARLYLE and Mr. GLADSTONE. But they had this quality in common. He would meet men on their own ground if they were worth meeting, and they generally found him stronger than they were themselves in their own specialty. The play of his mind was not less remarkable than the fullness of it. He liked radical houses, naturally enough, and he could be seen at his best at Mr. TAYLOR'S or Sir CHARLES DILKE'S."

—Mr. JAMES W. WALLACK, who died a few days since while on his way homeward, was not only a dramatic artist of exceptional ability, but a most estimable gentleman in private life. Off the stage, he was notably a diffident and modest man. His tastes were all refined, and his habit of life, when not professionally engaged, whether in summer or winter, was to go straightway to his fine cottage and farm of sixty acres situated in the most beautiful portion of Long Branch. A more domestic man could scarcely be imagined. It was difficult to entice him from his home, where he was always so kind, so good, so charming. His funeral at the Church of the Transfiguration on the 27th ult. was attended by a large concourse of friends and admirers, who thus attested their respect for his memory.

—JOAQUIN MILLER communicated to JAMES REDPATH that he proposed soon to enter into bonds hymeneal with an English lady of fortune, the only daughter of Sir T. D. HARDY, of London. She should be a hardy woman, indeed, to wed that gifted and peculiar son of the Sierras—that "child of nature whose home was with the setting sun."

—The anniversary of RAPHAEL'S birth was recently celebrated in his native town, Urbino, Italy. One MORRIS MOORE contributed a large sum for the purchase of RAPHAEL'S house, and was thereupon given the right to occupy one of its rooms whenever he should visit the town. Mr. M. MOORE is an eccentric Englishman—very.

—General CANBY was so charitable a man that he died poor, leaving his widow with nothing but a pension of thirty dollars a month. Mr. J. B. MONTGOMERY, a contractor on the Northern Pacific Railway, learning this fact, collected from citizens of Portland in three hours $5400 in gold, and presented it to Mrs. CANBY.

—The Jubilee Singers, who recently had such a success in this city, appeared before the Duke and Duchess of Argyle and a distinguished private company, which was honored by the presence of the Queen, who dropped in during the concert and expressed her gratification.

—Miss HARRIET FENIMORE COOPER, a daughter of the eminent novelist, is writing a history of the Oneida Indians. This tribe has nearly died out. The few that remain are peaceable, intelligent, well-to-do farmers and laborers, and good citizens. It is a curious fact about Indians—they have an aversion to becoming mechanics. They are cunning at every thing else but that.

—The "whirligig of time" has brought about another curious result in Cincinnati. Quite recently the Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER went to Cincinnati to install his nephew, Rev. GEORGE B. BEECHER, as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in that city. It was in that church, in 1834, where charges of heterodoxy were preferred against Dr. LYMAN BEECHER, then president of Lane Seminary, and applying for admission to the Cincinnati Presbytery. The trial on those charges came off in 1835. They were not sustained. An appeal to the Synod had a similar result. Dr. WILSON, pastor of the First Church from 1808 to 1846, began this zealous warfare on Dr. BEECHER, continued it, and when beaten in the Synod, carried the matter to the General Assembly. The animus of the trouble was in a sermon Dr. BEECHER had delivered at the East, and which had subsequently been published in a pamphlet. Despite that sermon, with its alleged "false doctrine," Dr. BEECHER had been admitted to the Presbytery. In May, 1836, Dr. WILSON brought the case before the General Assembly, but found it weak, and was permitted to drop it. By church discipline, having failed to prove his charges, he was liable to the same treatment Dr. BEECHER would have received had he been convicted. In 1837 or 1838 GEORGE, a son of Dr. LYMAN BEECHER, and father of the pastor lately installed, was examined for ordination by the Cincinnati Presbytery. Dr. WILSON did not like his theology, and made a fight against him, but he was ordained. The Second Church, formed from the First, received Dr. LYMAN BEECHER as pastor, Dr. WILSON giving it most hearty opposition. Rev. GEORGE B. BEECHER a few months ago received a call as the fifth pastor after Rev. Dr. WILSON, who died in 1846. He was a Congregationalist, but was received without a dissenting vote into the Cincinnati Presbytery.

—WILLIAM PHILLIPS, who died in April last in Santa Cruz, was a descendant of one of the oldest, wealthiest, and most distinguished families of Boston. He was a grandson of WILLIAM PHILLIPS, formerly Lieutenant-Governor of Massachusetts, whose father, JONATHAN PHILLIPS, bequeathed, in 1849, $20,000 to be expended in forming and maintaining a public library in the city of Boston; also $20,000 as a trust fund, the income of which was to have been expended in adorning and embellishing the streets and public places in said city. He was one of the largest contributors in Boston in aid of the arctic expedition fitted out at this port, and he contributed $10,000 toward the erection of the Music-Hall. He was the oldest living descendant of the Rev. GEORGE PHILLIPS, of Watertown, the first of the name in America, who came to New England with Governor WINTHROP in the Arabella in June, 1630. Mr. WILLIAM PHILLIPS left a fortune estimated at about two millions of dollars. After paying bequests to the amount of about $100,000, the income of the whole estate is left to Mr. JOHN C. PHILLIPS (of the firm of MACKAY & PHILLIPS, 130 Water Street, New York), a cousin of the deceased. Mr. J. C. PHILLIPS was educated at Harvard College, and graduated in 1858.

—Earl RUSSELL'S new book, Essays on the Rise and Progress of the Christian Religion in the West of Europe, from the Reign of Tiberius to the End of the Council of Trent, contains the following sentence at the close of the preface: "To Christianity for their religion, to liberty for their political institutions, the nations of the world must look, abjuring superstition, persecution, intolerance, in their religion; injustice, inequality, despotism, in their political institutions."

—Mr. HENRY G. MARQUAND, an intelligent and opulent, and, what is more, a very estimable gentleman, of this city, has erected for himself at Newport a cottage, or edifice rather, at a cost of $100,000, from the piazzas of which he proposes to get the interest of his money by inhaling the pure sea-breezes that come specially wafted to Newport to invigorate the wealthy and the wise who there do dwell.

—Mr. FREDERICK LOCKYER, of London, is the author of this little verse, which contains a deal of truth:

"They eat and drink, and scheme and plod,
And go to church on Sunday;
And many are afraid of God,
And more of Mrs. Grundy."

Child's Knitted and Crochet Bib.

THIS bib is worked with fine knitting cotton and fine steel needles, in the form of a square, from the outer edge toward the middle, and is edged with crochet points. The three upper corners are folded down in revers. The neck binding is crocheted in connection with the bib. Cast on 116 st. (stitch) on the first needle, 100 st. each on the second and third needles, and again 116 st. on the fourth needle. Knit, going back and forth, 20 rounds, so that on both sides of the work always alternately 5 rounds appear all knit plain, and 5 rounds all purled. In the first round always work off together the last 2 st. of the first, second, and third needles with the first st. of the next needle, thus always 3 st. together; this narrowing is repeated in every second following round, and the st. formed of the narrowing should always form the middle st. of every following narrowing. Then work 10 rounds in the same manner, but in the first of these 10 rounds cast off the first and the last 66 st.; after casting off the first 66 st., knit off together the next 2 st., and narrow in a similar manner at the beginning of each of the following 9 rounds. After casting off the last 66 st. of the first round the working thread must, of course, be laid on anew for the second round. After finishing the tenth round, cast on 70 st. in connection with this round, and gather these st. in two equal halves on the next two needles, so that each of the four needles closed in a ring contains the same number of stitches. Knit 60 rounds more, always going forward, in precisely the same manner as before, first going back on the foundation st., and narrowing in the middle as on the other corners of the square. Cast off the remaining 8 st. together in 1 sl., and then fasten the working thread carefully. Border the bib with a round of points, crocheting always alternately 1 single crochet on the outer edge, 1 point (consisting of 4 chain stitches and 1 single crochet on the second, 1 double crochet on the first of these), and with the latter pass over a corresponding interval. Finally, turn down the upper and the two side corners of the bib on the outside in revers, and fasten each corner with a button. Set on the bows of blue silk ribbon as shown by the illustration.

(chain stitch); pass over the last 7 of these, and going back on the remaining ch., work the 1st round.—Always alternately 2 sc. (single crochet) on the next 2 st. (stitch), 2 ch., with these pass over 2 st.; at the end of the round work 2 sc. on the last 2 st. Then work 7 ch., and t. (turn the work). 2d round.—Fasten to the last st. of the preceding round (to do this drop the st. from the needle, insert the needle in the st. to which the fastening is to be done, and draw through the dropped st.), 30 ch., fasten to the first st. of the preceding round; then 7 ch., t. 3d round.—2 sc. on the next 2 st. in the first round, thus surrounding the ch. in the preceding round, then always alternately 2 sc. on the following 2 foundation st. (thus surrounding the st. of the second and first rounds below), 2 ch., with these pass over 2 st. At the end of the round work 2 sc. on the last 2 st. of the first round; then 7 ch., t. Repeat these last two rounds until the band is of the requisite length, but always transpose the long st. surrounding 2 rounds, as shown by Fig. 2, which gives a full-sized section of the crochet-work. In the last 10 rounds work the band in a point, fastening, in each ch. round, to the second st. and the st. before the last of the preceding round, instead of to the first and last st., and in each following round pass over 2 st. at the beginning and end. Finally, border the band on the outer edge, excepting the straight end, with two crochet rounds as follows: 1st round.—Always alternately 1 sc., with which fasten together the next 2 projecting ch. loops, 2 ch.; on the sloping sides of the pointed end always work 1 sc. on 1 ch. loop. 2d round.—Always 2 sc. on the ch. between the sc. of the preceding round, after every 2 sc. 1 picot, consisting of 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the last sc. At the point of the band fasten a linen tape as shown by Fig. 1.

Continue the work in this manner, observing Fig. 3; the design forms ribs, slanting on the sides and coming together in a point in the middle, as shown by the illustration. In the last 23 rounds work the band in a point, narrowing 1 st. each at the beginning and end of these rounds. To do this knit off together the last 2 st. of each round, and draw the first st. of each round over the next st. Finally, surround the band with two rounds of ch. scallops (always 1 sc. and 5 ch.), as shown by the illustration, and fasten tapes on the point for tying.

THIS sofa-pillow is covered with red faille, which is plain in the middle, nine inches and a quarter long, and puffed at each end. The middle is also covered with a piece of gray linen, which is ornamented in open-work, called Venetian embroidery, with gray cotton, and arranged to be buttoned at the ends; it may thus be readily removed and washed when soiled. For each of the puffs at the end of the sofa-pillow cut a strip of faille forty-eight inches long and five inches and three-quarters wide, and line it with white net. Having joined the ends of the strip on the left side, arrange one edge in side pleats to suit the circumference of the sofa-pillow; arrange the other edge in close pleats also, in the opposite direction. Cover the seam of the puff with a box-pleated ruffle of the material an inch wide (see Fig. 1). For the embroidered cover of the sofa-pillow cut of fine gray linen one piece nine inches and a quarter long and thirteen inches and three-quarters wide, and to this piece transfer the design, observing Figs. 1 and 2; the latter shows a full-sized section of the embroidery. Having run the outlines of the design figures with the working thread, work the button-hole stitch bars between the outlines, always carrying the thread along the outlines from one bar to the next, and then also button-hole stitch the outlines of the design figures. Cut away the material underneath the button-hole stitch bars. Furnish the completed embroidery strip on the sides with button-hole stitch points, and on the ends with small buttons and button-hole stitch loops.

Java Canvas and Point Russe Afghan, Figs. 1–5.

THE foundation of this afghan, of which Fig. 1 shows a section reduced in size, is of Java canvas. The embroidery is worked in point Russe with the coarsest knitting cotton (Estremadura); the fringe is plaited and knotted of the projecting threads of the canvas. In selecting the canvas (which may be obtained of various widths) the requisite number of stitches for the design, and also for the width of the fringe, must be calculated exactly. The embroidery is worked as shown by the illustrations, which show full-sized sections of the foundation, the border, and the outer edge. After finishing the embroidery cut away the projecting crosswise threads of the canvas close to the embroidery at each side of the afghan; of the lengthwise threads form the fringe, observing Fig. 1. To do this arrange in the hollow between two points the upper part of six double threads in a Russian braid, and fasten together the threads of every seven such braids close underneath the braiding in a fringe tassel, tying them tight with a thread. At the extremity of each point knot eighteen double threads together in a tassel. If less elaborate embroidery is desired, the diamond foundation may be omitted, and only the border finished by the pointed strip worked all around the afghan.

Border in Satin Stitch Embroidery.

See illustration on page 388.

THIS border is suitable for ornamenting furniture, table-covers, portières, baskets, etc. It is worked on a foundation of light-colored cloth, woolen material, or silk with split zephyr worsted or with filling silk in dovetailed and diagonal satin stitch, and in half-polka stitch. The selection of colors is left to the taste. The embroidery may either be worked in several shades of one color, and the half-polka stitch edge in a light, contrasting color, or else the flowers in various bright colors, and the stems and leaves in brown and green. In this latter case the half-polka stitch edge should be worked in the lightest shade of the same colors; or else gold or fine colored silk cord may be sewed on instead for the edge and for the lines which edge the border.

LADY ANNA.

CHAPTER XIII.

NEW FRIENDS.

THE introduction to Yoxham followed quickly upon the Earl's visit to Wyndham Street. There was a great consultation at the rectory before a decision could be made as to the manner in which the invitation should be given. The Earl thought that it should be sent to the mother. The rector combated this view very strongly, still hoping that though he might be driven to call the girl Lady Anna, he might postpone the necessity of acknowledging the countess-ship of the mother till the marriage should be an accomplished fact. Mrs. Lovel thought that if the girl were Lady Anna, then the mother must be the Countess Lovel, and that it would be as well to be hung for a sheep as a lamb. But the wisdom of Aunt Julia sided with her brother, though she did not share her brother's feelings of animosity to the two women. "It is understood that the girl is to be invited, and not the mother," said Miss Lovel; "and as it is quite possible that the thing should fail—in which case the lawsuit might possibly go on—the less we acknowledge the better." The Earl declared that the lawsuit couldn't go on; that he would not carry it on. "My dear Frederic, you are not the only person concerned. The lady in Italy, who still calls herself Countess Lovel, may renew the suit on her own behalf as soon as you have abandoned it. Should she succeed, you would have to make what best compromise you could with her respecting the property. That is the way I understand it." This exposition of the case by Miss Lovel was so clear that it carried the day, and accordingly a letter was written by Mrs. Lovel, addressed to Lady Anna Lovel, asking her to come and spend a few days at Yoxham. She could bring her maid with her or not as she liked; but she could have the service of Mrs. Lovel's lady's-maid if she chose to come unattended. The letter sounded cold when it was read, but the writer signed herself, "Yours affectionately, Jane Lovel." It was addressed to "The Lady Anna Lovel, to the care of Messrs. Goffe and Goffe, solicitors, Raymond's Buildings, Gray's Inn."

Lady Anna was allowed to read it first; but she read it in the presence of her mother, to whom she handed it at once, as a matter of course. A black frown came across the Countess's brow, and a look of displeasure, almost of anger, rested on her countenance. "Is it wrong, mamma?" asked the girl.

"It is a part of the whole; but, my dear, it shall not signify. Conquerors can not be conquerors all at once, nor can the vanquished be expected to submit themselves with a grace. But it will come. And though they should ignore me utterly, that will be as nothing. I have not clung to this for years past to win their loves."

"I will not go, mamma, if they are unkind to you."

"You must go, my dear. It is only that they are weak enough to think that they can acknowledge you, and yet continue to deny to me my rights. But it matters nothing. Of course you shall go—and you shall go as the daughter of the Countess Lovel."

That mention of the lady's-maid had been unfortunate. Mrs. Lovel had simply desired to make it easy for the young lady to come without a servant to wait upon her, and had treated her husband's far-away cousin as elder ladies often do treat those who are younger when the question of the maid may become a difficulty. But the Countess, who would hardly herself have thought of it, now declared that her girl should go attended as her rank demanded. Lady Anna, therefore, under her mother's dictation, wrote the following reply:

"WYNDHAM STREET, August 3, 183-.

"DEAR MRS. LOVEL,—I shall be happy to accept your kind invitation to Yoxham, but can hardly do so before the 10th. On that day I will leave London for York inside the mail-coach. Perhaps you can be kind enough to have me met where the coach stops. As you are so good as to say you can take her in, I will bring my own maid.

"Yours affectionately, ANNA LOVEL."

"But, mamma, I don't want a maid," said the girl, who had never been waited on in her life, and who had more often than not made her mother's bed and her own till they had come up to London.

"Nevertheless you shall take one. You have to make other changes besides that; and the sooner that you begin to make them, the easier they will be to you."

Then at once the Countess made a pilgrimage to Mr. Goffe in search of funds wherewith to equip her girl properly for her new associations. She was to go as Lady Anna Lovel to stay with Mrs. Lovel and Miss Lovel and the little Lovels. And she was to go as one who was to be the chosen bride of Earl Lovel. Of course she must be duly caparisoned. Mr. Goffe made difficulties, as lawyers always do, but the needful money was at last forth-coming. Representations had been made in high legal quarters—to the custodians for the moment of the property which was to go to the established heir of the late Earl. They had been made conjointly by Goffe and Goffe, and Norton and Flick, and the money was forth-coming. Mr. Goffe suggested that a great deal could not be wanted all at once for the young lady's dress. The Countess smiled as she answered: "You hardly know, Mr. Goffe, the straits to which we have been reduced. If I tell you that this dress which I have on is the only one in which I can fitly appear even in your chambers, perhaps you will think that I demean myself." Mr. Goffe was touched, and signed a sufficient check. They were going to succeed, and then every thing would be easy. Even if they did not succeed, he could get it passed in the accounts—and if not that—well, he had run greater risks than this for clients whose causes were of much less interest than this of the Countess and her daughter.

The Countess had mentioned her own gown, and had spoken strict truth in what she had said of it, but not a shilling of Mr. Goffe's money went to the establishment of a wardrobe for herself. That her daughter should go down to Yoxham Rectory in a manner befitting the daughter of Earl Lovel was at this moment her chief object. Things were purchased by which the poor girl, unaccustomed to such finery, was astounded and almost stupefied. Two needle-women were taken in at the lodgings in Wyndham Street; parcels from Swan and Edgar's—Marshall and Snellgrove were not then, or at least had not loomed to the grandeur of an entire block of houses—addressed to Lady Anna Lovel were frequent at the door, somewhat to the disgust of the shop-men, who did not like to send goods to Lady Anna Lovel in Wyndham Street. But ready money was paid, and the parcels came home. Lady Anna, poor girl, was dismayed much by the parcels, but she was at her wits' end when the lady's-maid came—a young lady, herself so sweetly attired that Lady Anna would have envied her in the old Cumberland days. "I shall not know what to say to her, mamma," said Lady Anna.

"It will all come in two days if you will only be equal to the occasion," said the Countess, who in providing her child with this expensive adjunct had made some calculation that the more her daughter was made to feel the luxuries of aristocratic life, the less prone would she be to adapt herself to the roughnesses of Daniel Thwaite, the tailor's.

The Countess put her daughter into the mail-coach, and gave her much parting advice. "Hold up your head when you are with them. That is all that you have to do. Among them all, your blood will be the best." This theory of blood was one of which Lady Anna had never been able even to realize the meaning. "And remember this, too, that you are in truth the most wealthy. It is they that should honor you. Of course you will be courteous and gentle with them. It is your nature. But do not for a moment allow yourself to be conscious that you are their inferior." Lady Anna—who could think but little of her birth—to whom it had been throughout her life a thing plaguesome rather than profitable, could remember only what she had been in Cumberland, and her binding obligation to the tailor's son. She could remember but that and the unutterable sweetness of the young man who had once appeared before her—to whom she knew that she must be inferior. "Hold up your head among them, and claim your own always," said the Countess.

The rectory carriage was waiting for her at the inn yard in York, and in it was Miss Lovel. When the hour had come it was thought better that the wise woman of the family should go than any other. For the ladies of Yoxham were quite as anxious as to the Lady Anna as was she in respect of them. What sort of a girl was this that they were to welcome among them as the Lady Anna—who had lived all her life with tailors, and with a mother of whom up to quite a late date they had thought all manner of evil? The young lord had reported well of her, saying that she was not only beautiful, but feminine, of soft, modest manners, and in all respects like a lady. The Earl, however, was but a young man, likely to be taken by mere beauty, and it might be that the girl had been clever enough to hoodwink him. So much evil had been believed that a report stating that all was good could not be accepted at once as true. Miss Lovel would be sure to find out, even in the space of an hour's drive, and Miss Lovel went to meet her. She did not leave the carriage, but sent the footman to help Lady Anna Lovel from the coach. "My dear," said Miss Lovel, "I am very glad to see you. Oh, you have brought a maid! We didn't think you would. There is a seat behind which she can occupy."

"Mamma thought it best. I hope it is not wrong, Mrs. Lovel."

"I ought to have introduced myself. I am Miss Lovel, and the rector of Yoxham is my brother. It does not signify about the maid in the least. We can do very well with her. I suppose she has been with you a long time?"

"No, indeed: she only came the day before yesterday." And so Miss Lovel learned the whole story of the lady's-maid.

Lady Anna said very little, but Miss Lovel explained a good many things during the journey. The young lord was not at Yoxham. He was with a friend in Scotland, but would be home about the 20th. The two boys were at home for the holidays, but would go back to school in a fortnight. Minnie Lovel, the daughter, had a governess. The rectory, for a parsonage, was a tolerably large house, and convenient. It had been Lord Lovel's early home, but at present he was not much there. "He thinks it right to go to Lovel Grange during a part of the autumn. I suppose you have seen Lovel Grange?"

"Never."

"Oh, indeed. But you lived near it, did you not?"

"No, not near—about fifteen miles, I think. I was born there, but have never been there since I was a baby."

"Oh! you were born there. Of course you know that it is Lord Lovel's seat now. I do not know that he likes it, though the scenery is magnificent. But a landlord has to live, at least for some period of the year, upon his property. You saw my nephew?"

"Yes; he came to us once."

"I hope you liked him. We think him very nice. But then he is almost the same as a son here. Do you care about visiting the poor?"

"I have never tried," said Lady Anna.

"Oh dear!"

"We have been so poor ourselves—we were just one of them." Then Miss Lovel perceived that she had made a mistake. But she was generous enough to recognize the unaffected simplicity of the girl, and almost began to think well of her.

"I hope you will come round the parish with us. We shall be very glad. Yoxham is a large parish, with scattered hamlets, and there is plenty to do. The manufactories are creeping up to us, and we have already a large mill at Yoxham Lock. My brother has to keep two curates now. Here we are, my dear, and I hope we shall be able to make you happy."

Mrs. Lovel did not like the maid, and Mr. Lovel did not like it at all. "And yet we heard when we were up in town that they literally had not any thing to live on," said the parson. "I hope that, after all, we may not be making fools of ourselves." But there was no help for it, and the maid was of course taken in.

The children had been instructed to call their cousin Lady Anna—unless they heard their mother drop the title, and then they were to drop it also. They were not so young but what they had all heard the indiscreet vigor with which their father had ridiculed the claim to the title, and had been something at a loss to know whence the change had come. "Perhaps they are as they call themselves," the rector had said, "and, if so, Heaven forbid that we should not give them their due." After this the three young ones, discussing the matter among themselves, had made up their minds that Lady Anna was no cousin of theirs, but "a humbug." When, however, they saw her their hearts relented, and the girl became soft, and the boys became civil. "Papa," said Minnie Lovel, on the second day, "I hope she is our cousin."

"I hope so too, my dear."

"I think she is. She looks as if she ought to be, because she is so pretty."

"Being pretty, my dear, is not enough. You should love people because they are good."

"But I would not like all the good people to be my cousins—would you, papa? Old Widow Grimes is a very good old woman; but I don't want to have her for a cousin."

"My dear, you are talking about what you don't understand."

But Minnie did in truth understand the matter better than her father. Before three or four days had passed she knew that their guest was lovable, whether cousin or no cousin; and she knew also that the new-comer was of such nature and breeding as made her fit to be a cousin. All the family had as yet called her Lady Anna; but Minnie thought that the time had come in which she might break through the law. "I think I should like to call you just Anna, if you will let me," she said. They two were in the guest's bedroom, and Minnie was leaning against her new friend's shoulder.

"Oh, I do so wish you would! I do so hate to be called Lady!"

"But you are Lady Anna—aren't you?"

"And you are Miss Mary Lovel; but you wouldn't like every body in the house to call you so. And then there has been so much said about it all my life that it makes me quite unhappy. I do so wish your mamma wouldn't call me Lady Anna." Whereupon Minnie very demurely explained that she could not answer for her mamma, but that she would always call her friend Anna—when papa wasn't by.

But Minnie was better than her promise. "Mamma," she said, the next day, "do you know that she hates to be called Lady Anna?"

"What makes you think so?"

"I am sure of it. She told me so. Every body has always been talking about it ever since she was born, and she says she is so sick of it."

"But, my dear, people must be called by their names. If it is her proper name, she ought not to hate it. I can understand that people should hate an assumed name."

"I am Miss Mary Lovel, but I should not at all like it if every body called me Miss Mary. The servants call me Miss Mary; but if papa and Aunt Julia did so, I should think they were scolding me."

"But Lady Anna is not papa's daughter."

"She is his cousin. Isn't she his cousin, mamma? I don't think people ought to call their cousins Lady Anna. I have promised that I won't. Cousin Frederic said that she was his cousin. What will he call her?"

"I can not tell, my dear. We shall all know her better by that time." Mrs. Lovel, however, followed her daughter's lead, and from that time the poor girl was Anna to all of them—except to the rector. He listened, and thought that he would try it; but his heart failed him. He would have preferred that she should be an impostor, were that still possible. He would so much have preferred that she should not exist at all! He did not care for her beauty. He did not feel the charm of her simplicity. It was one of the hardships of the world that he should be forced to have her there in his rectory. The Lovel wealth was indispensable to the true heir of the Lovels, and, on behalf of his nephew and his family, he had been induced to consent. But he could not love the interloper. He still dreamed of coming surprises that would set the matter right in a manner that would be much preferable to a marriage. The girl might be innocent—as his wife and sister told him; but he was sure that the mother was an intriguing woman. It would be such a pity that they should have entertained the girl, if, after all, the woman should at last be but a pseudo-countess! As others had ceased to call her Lady Anna, he could not continue to do so; but he managed to live on with her without calling her by any name.

In the mean time Cousin Anna went about among the poor with Minnie and Aunt Julia, and won golden opinions. She was soft, feminine, almost humble—but still with a dash of humor in her, when she was sufficiently at her ease with them to be happy. There was very much in the life which she thoroughly enjoyed. The green fields, and the air which was so pleasant to her after the close heat of the narrow London streets, and the bright parsonage garden, and the pleasant services of the country church—and doubtless also the luxuries of a rich, well-ordered household. Those calculations of her mother had not been made without a true basis. The softness, the niceness, the ease, the grace, of the people around her had won upon her day by day and hour by hour. The pleasant idleness of the drawing-room, with its books and music and unstrained chatter of family voices, grew upon her as so many new charms. To come down with bright ribbons and clean unruffled muslin to breakfast, with nothing to do which need ruffle them unbecomingly, and then to dress for dinner with silk and gauds, before ten days were over had made life beautiful to her. She seemed to live among roses and perfumes. There was no stern hardness in the life, as there had of necessity been in that which she had ever lived with her mother. The caresses of Minnie Lovel soothed and warmed her heart; and every now and again, when the eyes of Aunt Julia were not upon her, she was tempted to romp with the boys. Oh! that they had really been her brothers!

But in the midst of all there was ever present to her the prospect of some coming wretchedness. The life which she was leading could not be her life. That Earl was coming—that young Apollo—and he would again ask her to be his wife. She knew that she could not be his wife. She was there, as she understood well, that she might give all this wealth that was to be hers to the Lovel family; and when she refused to give herself—as the only way in which that wealth could be conveyed—they would turn her out from their pleasant home. Then she must go back to the other life, and be the wife of Daniel Thwaite; and soft things must be at an end with her.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE EARL ARRIVES.

AT the end of a fortnight the boys had gone back to school, and Lord Lovel was to reach the rectory in time for dinner that evening. There was a little stir throughout the rectory, as an earl is an earl, though he be in his uncle's house, and rank will sway even aunts and cousins. The parson at present was a much richer man than the peer; but the peer was at the head of all the Lovels, and then it was expected that his poverty would quickly be made to disappear. All that Lovel money which had been invested in bank shares, Indian railways, Russian funds, Devon consols, and coal mines, was to become his—if not in one way, then in another. The Earl was to be a topping man, and the rectory cook was ordered to do her best. The big bedroom had been made ready, and the parson looked at his '99 port and his '26 Margaux. In those days men drank port, and Champagne at country-houses was not yet a necessity. To give the rector of Yoxham his due, it must be said of him that he would have done his very best for the head of his family had there been no large fortune within the young lord's grasp. The Lovels had ever been true to the Lovels, with the exception of that late wretched Earl, the Lady Anna's father.

But if the rector and his wife were alive to the importance of the expected arrival, what must have been the state of Lady Anna! They had met but once before, and during that meeting they had been alone together. There had grown up, she knew not how, during those few minutes, a heavenly sweetness between them. He had talked to her with a voice that had been to her ears as the voice of a god—it had been so sweet and full of music! He had caressed her—but with a caress so gentle and pure that it had been to her void of all taint of evil. It had perplexed her for a moment—but had left no sense of wrong behind it. He had told her that he loved her—that he would love her dearly; but had not scared her in so telling her, though she knew she could never give him back such love as that of which he spoke to her. There had been a charm in it, of which she delighted to dream—fancying that she could remember it forever as a green island in her life; but could so best remember it if she were assured that she should never see him more. But now she was to see him again, and the charm must be renewed—or else the dream dispelled forever. Alas! it must be the latter. She knew that the charm must be dispelled.

But there was a doubt on her own mind whether it would not be dispelled without any effort on her part. It would vanish at once if he were to greet her as the Lovels had greeted her on her first coming. She could partly understand that the manner of their meeting in London had thrust upon him a necessity for flattering tenderness, with which he might well dispense when he met her among his family. Had he really loved her—had he meant to love her—he would hardly have been absent so long after her coming. She had been glad that he had been absent—so she assured herself—because there could never be any love between them. Daniel Thwaite had told her that the brotherly love which had been offered was false love—must be false—was no love at all. Do brothers marry sisters? and had not this man already told her that he wished to make her his wife? And then he must never give her another kiss. Daniel Thwaite had told her that; and he was not only her lover, but her master also. This was the rule by which she would certainly hold. She would be true to Daniel Thwaite. And yet she looked for the lord's coming as one looks for the rising of the sun of an early morning—watching for that which shall make all the day beautiful.

And he came. The rector and his wife, and Aunt Julia and Minnie, all went out into the hall to meet him, and Anna was left alone in the library, where they were wont to congregate before dinner. It was already past seven, and every one was dressed. A quarter of an hour was to be allowed to the lord, and he was to be hurried up at once to his bedroom. She would not see him till he came down, ready and all hurried, to lead his aunt to the dining-room. She heard the scuffle in the hall. There were kisses—and a big kiss from Minnie to her much-prized cousin Fred—and a loud welcome from the full-mouthed rector. "And where is Anna?" the lord asked. They were the first words he spoke, and she heard them, ah! so plainly. It was the same voice—sweet, genial, and manly; sweet to her beyond all sweetness that she could conceive.

"You shall see her when you come down from dressing," said Mrs. Lovel, in a low voice, but still audible to the solitary girl.

"I will see her before I go up to dress," said the lord, walking through them and in through the open door to the library. "So here you are! I am so glad to see you! I had sworn to go into Scotland before the time was fixed for your coming, before I had met you, and I could not escape. Have you thought ill of me because I have not been here to welcome you sooner?"

"No—my lord."

"There are horrible penalties for any body who calls me lord in this house—are there not, Aunt Jane? But I see my uncle wants his dinner."

"I'll take you up stairs, Fred," said Minnie, who was still holding her cousin's hand.

"I am coming. I will only say that I would sooner see you here than in any house in England."

Then he went, and during the few minutes that he spent in dressing, little or nothing was spoken in the library. The parson in his heart was not pleased by the enthusiasm with which the young man greeted this new cousin; and yet why should he not be enthusiastic, if it was intended that they should be man and wife?

"Now, Lady Anna," said the rector, as he offered her his arm to lead her out to dinner.

It was but a mild corrective to the warmth of his nephew. The lord lingered a moment with his aunt in the library.

"Have you not got beyond that with her yet?" he asked.

"Your uncle is more old-fashioned than you are, Fred. Things did not go so quick when he was young."

In the evening he came and lounged on a double-seated ottoman behind her, and she soon found herself answering a string of questions. Had she been happy at Yoxham? Did she like the place? What had she been doing? "Then you know Mrs. Grimes already?"

She laughed as she said that she did know Mrs. Grimes.

"The lion of Yoxham is Mrs. Grimes. She is supposed to have all the misfortunes and all the virtues to which humanity is subject. And how do you and Minnie get on? Minnie is my Prime Minister. The boys, I suppose, teased you out of your life?"

"I did like them so much! I never knew a boy till I saw them, Lord Lovel."

"They take care to make themselves known, at any rate. But they are nice, good-humored lads—taking after their mother. Don't tell their father I said so. Do you think it pretty about here?"

"Beautifully pretty."

"Just about Yoxham—because there is so much wood. But this is not the beautiful part of Yorkshire, you know. I wonder whether we could make an expedition to Wharfedale and Bolton Abbey. You would say that the Wharfe was pretty. We'll try and plan it. We should have to sleep out one night; but that would make it all the jollier. There isn't a better inn in England than the Devonshire Arms—and I don't think a pleasanter spot. Aunt Jane, couldn't we go for one night to Bolton Abbey?"

"It is very far, Frederic."

"Thirty miles or so; that ought to be nothing in Yorkshire. We'll manage it. We could get post-horses from York, and the carriage would take us all. My uncle, you must know, is very chary about the carriage-horses, thinking that the corn of idleness—which is destructive to young men and women—is very good for cattle. But we'll manage it, and you shall jump over the Stryd." Then he told her the story how the youth was drowned, and how the monks moan; and he got away to other legends, to the white doe of Rylston, and Landseer's picture of the abbey in olden times. She had heard nothing before of these things, or of such things, and the hearing them was very sweet to her. The parson, who was still displeased, went to sleep. Minnie had been sent to bed, and Aunt Julia and Aunt Jane every now and again put in a word. It was resolved before the evening was over that the visit should be made to Bolton Abbey. Of course their nephew ought to have opportunities of making love to the girl he was doomed to marry. "Good-night, dearest," he said, when she went to bed. She was sure that the last word had been so spoken that no ear but her own had heard it. She could not tell him that such word should not be spoken; and yet she felt that the word to Daniel Thwaite would be almost as offensive as the kiss. She must contrive some means of telling him that she could not, would not, must not, be his dearest.

She had now received two letters from her mother since she had been at Yoxham, and in each of them there were laid down for her plain instructions as to her conduct. It was now the middle of August, and it was incumbent upon her to allow matters so to arrange themselves that the marriage might be declared to be a settled thing when the case should come on in November. Mr. Goffe and Mr. Flick had met each other, and every thing was now understood by the two parties of lawyers. If the Earl and the Lady Anna were then engaged, with the mutual consent of all interested—and so engaged that a day could be fixed for the wedding—then, when the case was opened in court, would the Solicitor-General declare that it was the intention of Lord Lovel to make no further opposition to the claims of the Countess and her daughter, and it would only remain for Sergeant Bluestone to put in the necessary proofs of the Cumberland marriage and of the baptism of the Lady Anna. The Solicitor-General would at the same time state to the court that an alliance had been arranged between these distant cousins, and that in that way every thing would be settled. But—and in this clause of her instructions the Countess was most urgent—this would not be done unless the marriage was positively settled. Mr. Flick had been very urgent in pointing out to Mr. Goffe that in truth their evidence was very strong to prove that when the Earl married the now so-called Countess, his first wife was still living, though they gave no credit to the woman who now called herself the Countess. But, in either case—whether the Italian Countess were now alive or now dead—the daughter would be illegitimate, and the second marriage void, if their surmise on this head should prove to be well founded. But the Italian party could of itself do nothing, and the proposed marriage would set every thing right. But the evidence must be brought into court and further sifted, unless the marriage was a settled thing by November. All this the Countess explained at great length in her letters, calling upon her daughter to save herself, her mother, and the family.

Lady Anna answered the first epistle—or rather, wrote another in return to it. But she said nothing of her noble lover, except that Lord Lovel had not as yet come to Yoxham. She confined herself to simple details of her daily life, and a prayer that her dear mother might be happy. The second letter from the Countess was severe in its tone, asking why no promise had been made, no assurance given, no allusion made to the only subject that could now be of interest. She implored her child to tell her that she was disposed to listen to the Earl's suit. This letter was in her pocket when the Earl arrived, and she took it out and read it again after the Earl had whispered in her ear that word so painfully sweet.

She proposed to answer it before breakfast on the following morning. At Yoxham Rectory they breakfasted at ten, and she was always up at least before eight. She determined as she laid herself down that she would think of it all night. It might be best, she believed, to tell her mother the whole truth—that she had already promised every thing to Daniel Thwaite, and that she could not go back from her word. Then she began to build castles in the air—castles which she declared to herself must ever be in the air—of which Lord Lovel, and not Daniel Thwaite, was the hero, owner, and master. She assured herself that she was not picturing to herself any prospect of a really possible life, but was simply dreaming of an impossible Elysium. How many people would she make happy, were she able to let that young Phœbus know in one half-uttered word, or with a single silent glance, that she would in truth be his dearest! It could not be so. She was well aware of that. But surely she might dream of it. All the cares of that careful, care-worn mother would then be at an end. How delightful would it be to her to welcome that sorrowful one to her own bright home, and to give joy where joy had never yet been known! How all the lawyers would praise her, and tell her that she had saved a noble family from ruin! She already began to have feelings about the family to which she had been a stranger before she had come among the Lovels. And if it really would make him happy, this Phœbus, how glorious would that be! How fit he was to be made happy! Daniel had said that he was sordid, false, fraudulent, and a fool. But Daniel did not, could not, understand the nature of the Lovels. And then she herself—how would it be with her? She had given her heart to Daniel Thwaite, and she had but one heart to give. Had it not been for that, it would have been very sweet to love that young curled darling. There were two sorts of life, and now she had had an insight into each. Daniel had told her that this soft, luxurious life was thoroughly bad. He could not have known when saying so how much was done for their poor neighbors by such as even these Lovels. It could not be wrong to be soft and peaceful and pretty, to enjoy sweet smells, to sit softly, and eat off delicately painted china plates, as long as no one was defrauded, and many were comforted. Daniel Thwaite, she believed, never went to church. Here at Yoxham there were always morning prayers, and they went to church twice every Sunday. She had found it very pleasant to go to church, and to be led along in the easy path of self-indulgent piety on which they all walked at Yoxham. The church seats at Yoxham were broad, with soft cushions, and the hassocks were well stuffed. Surely Daniel Thwaite did not know every thing. As she thus built her castles in the air—castles so impossible to be inhabited—she fell asleep, before she had resolved what letter she should write.

But in the morning she did write her letter. It must be written—and when the family were about the house she would be too disturbed for so great an effort. It ran as follows:

"YOXHAM, Friday.

"DEAREST MAMMA,—I am much obliged for your letter, which I got the day before yesterday. Lord Lovel came here yesterday, or perhaps I might have answered it then. Every body here seems to worship him almost, and he is so good to every body! We are all to go on a visit to Bolton Abbey, and sleep at an inn somewhere, and I am sure I shall like it very much, for they say it is most beautiful. If you look at the map, it is nearly in a straight line between here and Kendal, but only much nearer to York. The day is not fixed yet, but I believe it will be very soon.

"I shall be so glad if the lawsuit can be got over, for your sake, dearest mamma. I wish they could let you have your title and your share of the money, and let Lord Lovel have the rest because he is head of the family. That would be fairest, and I can't see why it should not be so. Your share would be quite enough for you and me. I can't say any thing about what you speak of. He has said nothing, and I'm sure I hope he won't. I don't think I could do it; and I don't think the lawyers ought to want me to. I think it is very wrong of them to say so. We are strangers, and I feel almost sure that I could never be what he would want. I don't think people ought to marry for money.

"Dearest mamma, pray do not be angry with me. If you are, you will kill me. I am very happy here, and nobody has said any thing about my going away. Couldn't you ask Sergeant Bluestone whether something couldn't be done to divide the money, so that there might be no more law? I am sure he could if he liked, with Mr. Goffe and the other men.

"Dearest mamma, I am

"Your most affectionate daughter,

"ANNA LOVEL."

When the moment came, and the pen was in her hand, she had not the courage to mention the name of Daniel Thwaite. She knew that the fearful story must be told, but at this moment she comforted herself—or tried to comfort herself—by remembering that Daniel himself had enjoined that their engagement must yet for a while be kept secret.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

"THE Hill of Death" is the terribly significant name which rude fishermen have given to the wild, rough locality where lie buried the greater portion of the victims of the wreck of the Atlantic. The little fishing town of Prospect has witnessed a succession of fearful scenes within the past two months. More than four hundred corpses have been laid upon the shore and hastily interred beneath the rocky sod. Whether the remains of all the dead will ever be recovered it is impossible to say. It is probable that some have been washed out to sea and will be "missing" forever. The Halifax divers have recently devoted themselves exclusively to the work of grappling for the dead, while the submarine laborers of the New York Wrecking Company have been engaged in recovering the cargo of the lost steamer. It was found necessary to blow up portions of the submerged steamer in order to facilitate operations. The improvements which have been made in the apparatus provided for divers are of such a nature that with ordinary caution the perils attending the business are less than is commonly supposed. The dress of the diver is extremely heavy, weighing several hundred pounds, yet, when beneath the surface of the water, he can move about with facility. A very perfect system of telegraphy is established between the diver himself and those connected with the apparatus which supplies air for him to breathe, so that almost any question can be asked and answered. The rock-ribbed coast of Prospect has for weeks past been covered with groups of bereaved friends, who have watched with fearful hope the divers as they brought one inanimate form after another to the surface. Fathers, husbands, brothers, sons, waiting in painful anxiety to recognize some dear familiar face among the dead. These have been mostly friends of the cabin passengers; a large proportion of the steerage passengers had no near relatives in this country. But many anxious watchers, after standing day after day upon the rocks in vain, have returned to their homes in sadness and disappointment. The body of one cabin passenger was found off the coast of Havenburg, nearly seventy miles from the scene of the disaster—a fact which proves that many other remains may have been washed far out to sea, with scarcely a possibility of recovery.

A few fierce mosquitoes have already made their appearance as harbingers of summer. A year ago the month of May brought a rabid flock that almost devoured us. But then they disappeared as suddenly as they came, and reappeared only at their appropriate season.

Vienna thought to enrich herself suddenly by the fruit of the Exposition. She reckoned that there would be a great influx of visitors from May onward through the summer, and that they would submit to pay any prices for accommodations within the city limits. A short time before the 1st of May hotels and lodging-houses were crowded. Then suddenly notice was given that after May 1 hotels would raise their prices, rates for rooms would be doubled, and restaurants would demand an increase of pay for every thing supplied. But visitors did not tamely submit to any such extortion. They took a look at the Exhibition, and then there was a general stampede in every direction. Warned by reports, those on the way to Vienna turned aside to other places until this matter should right itself. The natural result of comparatively empty hotels, unoccupied residences, and vacant restaurants was what might be expected, after the elaborate preparation which had been made. A panic followed, and speculators failed. Even respectable banking houses were seriously injured. Thus the rapacity of the Viennese has met its just reward—and from it all the world may learn a wholesome lesson.

The most extraordinary hens are turning up on every side. Now it is one of an enterprising disposition, who lays eggs of extra size, or perhaps two every day; and then it is one of a modest turn of mind, like a Utica fowl, who, very unconsciously no doubt, has gained celebrity by producing eggs of about the size of hot-house grapes. Into these little eggs she puts no yolks, so the novelty of the article is increased.

Applications have already been received by Professor Agassiz for many more students than can be accommodated at the Anderson School on Penikese Island.

The last change in the government of France is the first one within half a century that has been made in that nation without some violence.

The warm season was inaugurated out West by a terrific tornado, accompanied by hail and rain. The reports which have come from various towns in Iowa which were unfortunately in the line of the whirlwind inform us that houses, fences, trees, cattle, and human beings were alike caught up, whirled through the air, and finally dashed to the ground with destructive violence. Many lives were lost, and severe injuries inflicted on many who escaped death. The reports of such a phenomenon are usually exaggerated; but it is said that the hailstones that fell measured in some instances no less than nine inches in diameter! and that four hours after they were picked up they still remained as large as hens' eggs. Such a missile must have wrought destruction, to be sure.

The following story is told of the late Chief Justice Chase. When he was Secretary of the Treasury, and had certain appointments to make, the merits and claims of two candidates for the same office were so evenly balanced that he called on a friend, who was acquainted personally with both applicants, for his opinion in the premises.

"They are both good men," was the response; "but I think Mr. —— ought to be appointed."

"Why?"

"Well, in the first place, he has been a life-long friend of yours, and—"

"Being a friend of mine is no reason why he should have office," broke in Mr. Chase. "Let the other man be appointed."

The order was carried out, greatly to the mortification of the friend, who thought he saw here an opportunity to reward years of faithful and perhaps unpopular devotion.

So sensitive was Mr. Chase to charges of favoritism that it not unfrequently happened that he erred in the other direction, and often did actual injustice to his friends.

There are no less than four dramatic versions of Wilkie Collins's story, The New Magdalen, prepared for the stage in this country. The version of Wilkie Collins himself was sold to Miss Carlotta Le Clercq; but that has not prevented the production of American versions.

Of course it is hot, and the heat has come suddenly; but it is not necessary to infer therefore that we are certainly to have the cholera in our midst. It is unwise to create a panic about diseases. Securities against all prevailing diseases, especially in summer, are discretion and cleanliness. Eating too much, eating when fatigued, and eating stale or unripe fruit and vegetables, are dangerous in hot weather. So also is overexertion, especially when exposed to the sun. And perfect cleanliness of household premises is imperative.

China possesses coal fields which cover 400,000 square miles; and as she has not yet devoted her energies to the business of coal-mining, there remains a chance that England may yet be able to obtain fuel enough to keep her people warm, even when her own supply fails.

May 28, 1873, was the "Children's Day" in Brooklyn—the forty-fourth anniversary of the city Sunday-schools. To the lover of children there could be no more beautiful sight than greeted the eye in the streets and parks of the "City of Churches" on this festive day. About forty-four thousand children, gathered from 133 Sunday-schools, neatly and tastefully dressed, with bright eyes and smiling faces, parading in line—this is a scene seldom surpassed in brightness and beauty. The schools are arranged in five divisions—Prospect Park Division, Heights Division, Washington Park Division, Bedford Avenue Division, and Carroll Park Division. In some cases the exercises appropriate to the occasion are conducted in churches, in others they are in the open air. But wherever the children are, there are flowers in profusion, and hundreds of gay banners. It is difficult to decide which division presents the most attractions in their parade; but this year we were drawn to Prospect Park. A stream of carriages was flowing Parkward; and as we drove in sight of "The Green," the attraction became visible—15,000 children seated in a shady spot under the trees. In their centre a large liberty-pole, with the American flag floating from the top, was placed, and around this 150 smaller flags were arranged. A grand stand was erected in front of the division for the accommodation of the pastors and invited guests. The band performed a choice selection of music, and the children's songs resounded through the clear air. The parade took place on "The Green," the scholars marching four abreast, and keeping good time and order. Throngs of spectators were on every side; hundreds of carriages filled with eager lookers-on occupied every sightly place. It was a charming spectacle to every one. The parade over, the children marched to their respective schoolrooms, where cake and ice-cream were bountifully supplied. Meanwhile, in other parts of the city similar performances were taking place. To every Brooklyn Sunday-school scholar this anniversary is a marked day.

Collar in Point Lace Embroidery on Tulle, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS collar is worked on fine tulle with point lace braid of various widths and with lace stitches of fine thread. First, transfer the design, of which one-half is given by Fig. 34, Supplement, complete, to paper or linen, and on this sew a piece of tulle of the requisite size. Then run on the point lace braid, observing Fig. 1, and the full-sized section, Fig. 2, page 397, without passing the needle through the foundation. At the points and curves lay the braid in pleats, or gather it. Button-hole stitch the flowers and leaves formed of the point lace braid on the wrong side of the embroidery with fine thread, at the same time laying on a thread of coarse tatting cotton on the right side, and surrounding it in working the button-hole stitches. Cut away the material underneath the figures, observing the illustration. Finally, work the lace stitches and border the collar on the outer edge with woven picots.

Rose-wood Footstool.

THE frame of this footstool is of rose-wood, ornamented with gold. It is twelve inches and seven-eighths high, and is furnished with a cushion of brown woolen reps. The cushion is ornamented in application embroidery as shown by the illustration. The embroidery is worked on light brown cloth with cloth in a darker shade, with saddler's silk in several shades of brown, and with gold thread. The embroidery is edged with brown worsted cord, and finished at the corners with tassels of the same color.

Child's Knitted and Crochet Cap.

See illustration on page 393.

THIS cap is knitted with fine knitting cotton and steel knitting-needles of the requisite size. Begin in the middle of the crown with a foundation of 8 st. (stitch), close these in a ring, and work as follows: 1st round.—All knit plain. 2d and 3d rounds.—All purled. 4th round.—All knit plain. 5th round.—Always alternately t. t. o. (thread thrown over), 1 k. (knit plain). 6th round.—All knit plain; on each t. t. o. in the preceding round always 1 k., 1 p. (purled). 7th–9th rounds.—All purled. 10th round.—All knit plain. 11th round.—Always alternately t. t. o., k. 2 together. 12th round.—All knit plain; on each t. t. o. of the preceding round 1 k., 1 p., 1 k. 13th–16th rounds.—All purled. 17th round.—All knit plain. 18th round.—Always alternately t. t. o., k. 3 together. 19th round.—All knit plain, but on each t. t. o. work 1 k., 1 p., 1 k. 20th–23d rounds.—All purled. 24th round.—All knit plain. Repeat the 18th–24th rounds three times more. This completes the crown of the cap, and with the next round the head piece is commenced. For this the number of stitches should be divisible by 5, therefore the requisite number of stitches are widened at regular intervals. 46th round.—Always alternately p. 2 together, 1 p., p. 2 together, t. t. o. 47th–53d rounds.—All knit plain; in the 47th round always work 1 k., 1 p. on the t. t. o. of the preceding round. 54th round.—Always alternately 3 k., drop the 2 st. from the needle which were knitted in the 47th round on the t. t. o. of the preceding round and knit plain in the next rounds, and then rip them to the 47th round, then carry the upper thread from the back toward the front around all the threads of the preceding rounds, take it up on the needle of the left hand, and knit it off plain as a stitch. 55th round.—All knit plain; on the st. which was knitted on the eight loose threads work always 1 k., 1 p. This completes the first pattern figure. First, repeat the 46th–55th rounds once, and then the 46th and 47th rounds once more. In order to form the back edge of the cap, take up 31 st. on a separate needle, pay no attention to them for the present, and knit 92 rounds more in the preceding design, going back and forth; in the 92d round work on the t. t. o. of the preceding round always 1 k., 1 p., 1 k. Care should be taken that each round begins and ends with 1 st. of the close strip of the design. After finishing the 92d round, gather the edge stitches at both sides on needles and knit on all st. in connection (also on the st. previously left unnoticed), always going forward, as follows: 160th round.—All knit plain. 161st–164th rounds.—All purled. 165th round.—Always alternately t. t. o., k. 3 together. 166th round.—All knit plain; on each t. t. o. work 1 k., 1 p. 167th–170th rounds.—All purled. 171st round.—All knit plain. Then take a crochet needle and crochet with the same cotton always alternately 1 sc. (single crochet), with which fasten together 3 st. of the knitting, 3 ch. (chain stitch). For the edging on the outer edge of the cap work with twisted cotton, No. 100, 2 rounds more. 1st round.—On each sc. of the preceding round 1 dc. (double crochet), after each dc. 3 ch. 2d round.—∗ On the next ch. between 2 dc. work 1 scallop, consisting of 4 dc., 1 p. (picot, consisting of 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first ch.), 2 stc. (short treble crochet), 1 p., 2 stc., 1 p., 4 dc., pass over 2 dc. separated by 3 ch.; repeat from ∗. Through the round of holes on the outer edge run narrow colored satin ribbon, and furnish the cap with strings of the same color.

Infant's Knitted Sock.

See illustration on page 393.

THIS sock is knitted with blue and white zephyr worsted. Begin on the upper pointed edge, working, with blue worsted and medium-sized steel knitting-needles, a foundation of 96 st. (stitch). On this foundation work, always going forward, as follows: 1st and 2d rounds.—With blue worsted, all purled. 3d–8th rounds with white worsted. 3d round.—All knit plain. 4th round.—∗ 4 k. (knit plain), t. t. o. (thread thrown over), 1 k., t. t. o., 4 k., k. 3 together; repeat from ∗. 5th round.—All knit plain; work off each t. t. o. of the preceding round as 1 st., and always knit off 3 st. together as in the preceding round, so that the st. formed of the narrowing in the preceding round always forms the middle st. of the narrowing in this round. 6th and 7th rounds.—Like the 5th round. 8th round.—All knit plain; this round should count 48 st. 9th–11th rounds with blue worsted. 9th round.—All knit plain. 10th and 11th rounds.—All purled. 12th–30th rounds with white worsted. 12th–14th rounds.—All knit plain. 15th round.—Always alternately 1 k., 2 p. (purled). Repeat these last 4 rounds three times more; the purled st. of every fourth following round should always come above each other in the same direction. 28th–30th rounds.—All knit plain. 31st–33d rounds with blue worsted. 31st round.—All knit plain. 32d and 33d rounds.—All purled. 34th and 35th rounds with white worsted. 34th round.—All knit plain. 35th round.—Always alternately t. t. o., k. 2 together. 36th–38th rounds.—Like the 31st–33d rounds; work off each t. t. o. of the 35th round as 1 st. 39th–47th rounds with white worsted. 39th round.—All knit plain. 40th round.—Always alternately 1 p., 1 sl. (stitch slipped), as if going to purl the stitch, therefore the working thread should lie before the sl. Like these 2 rounds work the 41st–47th rounds; it must be observed, however, that the purled st. and the sl. come transposed. After finishing the 47th round count off 18 st. for the front of the foot of the sock, and, paying no attention for the present to the remaining st., knit on these 18 st., always going back and forth, the 48th–50th rounds with blue worsted. 48th round.—All knit plain. 49th round.—All purled. 50th round.—All knit plain. 51st–85th rounds with white worsted, in the design of the 39th–47th rounds, but as the knitting is now done going back and forth, purl the round knit plain which follows each pattern round on the wrong side of the knitting. Besides this, narrow 1 st. each at the beginning of the 70th, 74th, 78th, and 82d rounds, and at the end of the 72d, 76th, 80th, and 84th rounds, so that the 85th round counts only 10 st. 86th–90th rounds with blue worsted. 86th round.—All knit plain. 87th round.—Alternately 1 k., 2 p., finally, 1 k. 88th round.—Alternately 1 p., 2 k.; finally, 1 p. 89th round.—Like the 87th round, but narrow 1 st. at the beginning and end. 90th round.—All knit plain. In connection with this work the foot of the sock entirely with blue worsted as follows: Gather the edge stitches at both sides of the front, and the 30 st. previously left unnoticed, on needles, and now knit, always going forward, 20 rounds, alternately 1 round all purled, 1 round all knit plain. In the 14th, 16th, 18th, and 20th of these rounds narrow twice each at both sides of the middle of the front, leaving 6 st. between the two narrowings in the 14th round; in the remaining rounds bring these two narrowings nearer the middle by 2 st. each, so that they come together in the last round. In the 16th, 18th, and 20th rounds, in the middle of the back of the foot, narrow, besides, always twice 1 st. side by side, thus 6 st. altogether. After finishing the last round knit off together 2 opposite st. from the wrong side. Now only the strip which finishes the foot remains to be worked. For this take up the st. of the 1st round of the foot on needles and knit with blue worsted four rounds, all knit plain, always going forward, but so that the wrong side of the st. comes on the outside; then cast off rather tight, and ornament the strip on the right side with a cross seam of white worsted, as shown by the illustration. Through the round of holes above the ankle run a piece of cord crocheted in chain stitch with white worsted and trimmed with cut worsted balls.

Knitted Sacque for Infant from 3 to 6 Months old.

THIS sacque is worked with white knitting cotton and steel knitting-needles of the requisite size. Begin on the under edge with a foundation of 232 st. (stitch), and on these knit in rounds, going back and forth, as follows: 1st and 2d rounds.—All knit plain. 3d round.—All purled. 4th and 5th rounds.—All knit plain. 6th round.—Sl. (slip one stitch), 1 p. (purled), k. 2 together (knit 2 st. together), * 4 p., t. t. o. (thread thrown over), 1 p., t. t. o., 4 p., k. 3 together; repeat from *, but at the end of the round k. 2 together instead of 3, and then purl 1 st. 7th, 9th, and 11th rounds.—All knit plain. Always knit off the t. t. o. as 1 st. 8th, 10th, and 12th rounds.—Like the 6th round; repeat the 1st–12th rounds once, and then the 1st–5th rounds once more, which completes the border. With the next round begins the design for the foundation of the sacque. 30th round.—All purled. 31st round.—Sl., 2 k. (knit plain), then always alternately 2 p., 6 k.; at the end of the round 2 p., 3 k. 32d round.—Sl., 1 p., then always alternately 4 k., 4 p.; finally, 4 k., 2 p. 33d round.—Like the 31st round. In order to continue the design repeat the 30th–33d rounds constantly, but the dots, which appear purled on the right side, should be transposed; then knit 60 rounds more, without changing the number of stitches. In the 94th round take up the first and the last 38 st. for the fronts, each on a separate needle, and separate the middle 60 st. of the knitting for the back. Pay no attention for the present to the remaining 18 st. between the back and fronts. Finish the back and fronts separately in the design previously described, repeating the pattern figure, consisting of 4 rounds, eleven times for each part; then take up the 16 st. of each front nearest the armhole on a separate needle, and with these knit for the shoulder 16 rounds more in the preceding design; but in the 2d, 4th, and 6th of these rounds always knit 2 st. together on the neck. Work the remaining rounds without changing the number of stitches. Having also worked at both sides of the back two shoulder pieces with 16 st. each in a similar manner, join the back and fronts on the shoulders, always knitting together two opposite st. from the wrong side. Gather the side st. at the neck of both shoulders on needles, and knit, in connection with the st. of the back and fronts, the neck of the sacque. First, work three rounds, which appear purled on the right side, then one round of holes, as follows: Always alternately t. t. o., k. 2 together, 1 k.; then again three rounds, which appear purled on the right side; in the first of these three rounds work off the t. t. o. in the preceding round as st., then cast off. For each sleeve gather on the armhole at both sides of the shoulder seam 8 st. each on a needle, at the same time widening 1 st. after every second following st., so that 24 st. are on the needle. On these st. work, going back and forth, 15 rounds in the design previously described, but on both sides of the needle, thus at the beginning and end of each round widen 1 st., taking up 1 st. from the nearest edge st. of the armhole. This widening is always done in the same edge st. in three successive rounds, so that for the widening of every 15 st. at both sides 5 edge st. are used; then also gather the remaining edge st. of the armhole on needles, and in connection with the 18 st. of the body, hitherto left unnoticed, knit, always going forward, in the design given, 76 rounds more, narrowing 1 st. each in every second round at both sides of the 18 middle st. This narrowing is continued until the 18 st. are reduced to 4 st. and a small gore is formed. To make the bottom of the sleeve tight enough, knit in the following round always alternately 5 k., 1 st. narrowed; next follow 2 rounds all purled, 1 round of holes like those on the neck, and again 2 rounds all purled. Edge the sleeve with a border like that on the under edge of the sacque, and then cast off.

Knitted and Crochet Sacque for Infant from 3 to 6 Months old.

See illustration on page 393.

THE original is of fine white zephyr worsted, for which knitting cotton may be substituted if preferred. Fig. 14, Supplement, gives one-half of the pattern for the sacque. Having completed the pattern along the middle line to a whole, crochet a chain stitch foundation corresponding in length to the under edge of the pattern (the stitches should not be stretched), and the number of stitches to be divisible by four. Gather the foundation stitches on knitting-needles, and work, going back and forth, first 10 rounds in patent knitting, as follows: 1st round.—4 k. (knit plain), ∗ t. t. o. (thread thrown over), 1 sl. (stitch slipped), as if going to purl, 1 k.; repeat from ∗. At the end of the round work 4 k. 2d round.—4 p. (purled), ∗ t. t. o., sl. the st. (stitch) knit plain in the preceding round, as if going to purl, knit together the st. and t. t. o. of the preceding round, and repeat from ∗; at the end of the round work 4 p. 3d–10th rounds.—Like the 2d round. The 4 st. at the beginning and end of each round are continued throughout the work, thus forming a tight edge on the fronts of the sacque; as these st. do not belong to the design, however, they will not be referred to again in the course of the work. After finishing the patent knitting, work 3 rounds all purled. Now follows the open-work pattern for the foundation of the sacque. Each pattern figure consists of the following 4 rounds: 1st round.—∗ k. 3 together (knit 3 st. together), on the following st. work 1 p., 1 k., 1 p., and repeat from ∗. 2d round.—All knit plain. 3d round.—All purled. 4th round.—All knit plain. In repeating the pattern transpose the dots, knitting together the 3 st. which were worked on 1 st., and working 1 p., 1 k., 1 p. on the st. formed of knitting together in the preceding pattern figure. Having reached the armholes, gather the st. of the fronts and the st. of the back on separate needles, cast off several st. (8 in the original) between the back and fronts in the middle at the bottom of each armhole, and finish the back and fronts separately in the design previously described, widening or narrowing at the armholes and the shoulders according to the pattern. In order to form the slope of the neck, cast off several st. on the upper edge of the fronts and on the upper edge of the back, and shorten the following rounds for the shoulders in the requisite manner. Having finished the knitting, sew up the edges of the shoulders from the wrong side from 29 to 30. That side of the work on which the dots of the design appear purled forms the right side of the sacque. The sleeves, which are also commenced on the under edge with a crochet ch. (chain stitch) foundation, are worked according to the pattern, Fig. 15, Supplement, in the same design as the sacque. Having sewed up the sleeves on the sides from 31 to 32, border the under edge with two crochet rounds as follows: 1st round.—Always alternately 1 dc. (double crochet) on the next edge st., 1 ch., with this pass over 1 edge st. 2d round.—5 dc. on the next dc. of the preceding round, ∗ 1 ch., 1 sc. (single crochet) on the ch. between the second and third following dc., 1 ch., 5 dc. on the second following dc., and repeat from ∗. The finished sleeves are sewed into the sacque according to the corresponding figures. Sew a fly 8 st. wide, all knit plain, in rounds, going back and forth, to the left front edge of the sacque, and set the buttons on the fly. Border the right front edge with 1 round of sc., working the corresponding button-holes with several ch. each. Finally, work on the under edge of the sacque one round of scallops like those on the outer edge of the sleeves, and finish the neck with a small collar, which is worked on a ch. foundation to suit the width of the neck, in 16 rounds of patent knitting, and bordered on the outer edge with crochet scallops. Trim the sacque on the neck with an open-work round of double crochet; and through this, and also through the open-work round on the sleeves, run a colored silk ribbon.

OUT OF SIGHT, OUT OF MIND.

OH! where is the being that blindly
  Will hold as the faith of his kind
That proverb of spirit unkindly
  Which says, "Out of sight, out of mind?"
That heart were a wilderness lonely
  Which could not this saying deny,
Did it question the memories only
  That affection will never let die.

We think of the loved in our grieving,
  For we know they would feel with our care;
In our joy, for our faith is believing
  They would join, and we would they could share.
'Tis thus in our sorrows and pleasures
  Come dear ones, whom fate may remove;
And, though far "out of sight," the heart's treasures
  Are nigh in the "mind" of our love.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

What was paid for the Times Newspaper.—Mill and Bright.—The Saturday's Biography.—Not up in his Pickwick.

THERE was a rumor prevalent in town last week that Mr. Levy, of the Daily Telegraph, had purchased the Times newspaper. The alarm depicted on the countenances of capitalists was considerable; the clergy were dismayed; even members of the Hereditary Chamber looked at one another "with a wild surprise," like Cortéz when he first caught sight of the Pacific, although the news boded nothing pacific to them. The idea of so respectable and conservative an organ becoming radical was indeed something portentous. Most people, as was only natural, took refuge in skepticism. It was "ridiculous;" it was "impossible;" "money couldn't buy it," etc. To these objections it was replied by those in possession of the facts that not only was the news correct, but that they knew the exact sum which Mr. Levy had given for the Times.

"How much was it?" was the eager inquiry.

"Why, threepence"—which is, indeed, its retail price. There has not been so good a "sell" going about our club smoking-rooms for many a day.

The curious part of the matter is that at the very time this joke is being so rapturously received it is by no means certain that the Times has not been actually sold to Mr. W. H. Smith, the conservative member for Westminster, and the proprietor of all our railway book-stalls; and in that case no particular change needs to be made in its political programme. This was the gentleman, you remember, who turned poor John Stuart Mill out of his seat in the House of Commons. That great closet statesman's death will probably form the theme of many a discourse from our evangelical pulpits. When the Athanasian Creed became of late the subject of controversy, Mr. Mill delivered himself upon the subject to this effect: "The only means I possess of estimating the goodness of the Supreme Being are those by which I estimate the goodness of my fellow-man. If He sends me to hell for so doing, to hell I will go." I heard these very words repeated by a clergyman in a metropolitan church to a shuddering audience, and they will, without doubt, be now resuscitated. Yet any thing more unlike a blatant skeptic than that delicate, refined, and almost effeminate philosopher it is impossible to imagine. His physique was feeble, and his manner wanting in energy, but when he spoke his arguments had a comprehensiveness and lucidity such as proceed from no other lips. It is currently reported that Miss Taylor, his step-daughter, has been only waiting for his death in order to embrace the tenets of the Church of Rome, but considering that she is a lady of such advanced opinions as to be a member of "the Radical Club," I do not think this statement very reliable.

Talking of the radicals, Mr. Bright has much disappointed them by his answer to the Republican Association, in which he declares himself satisfied with our monarchical institutions. They do not, in his opinion, need to be swept away, root and branch, but only require reform and amendment. He has nothing to say, however, in favor of our hereditary peerage, and, on the whole, writes a sensible enough letter on the matter. If we were about to build a constitution, it would be right to build it upon the lines of that of the United States; but since we have already got one, it would be safer, he thinks, to adapt it to modern requirements. This prudent deliverance of his has already earned him the title of "Finality Bright," nor do the more advanced of his own party hesitate to hint that his favor with the Queen has mitigated his democratic fervor.

In a supplement to his History of the Newspaper Press Mr. Grant gives us a biography of the Saturday Review, in which he lifts the veil from that terror of authors, and exposes it, as he flatters himself, in all its nakedness and deformity, though, after all, he does little more than prove it to be ill-natured and cynical, which most people are already aware of. His account of its first establishment, however, is curious enough. Mr. Beresford Hope ("the Bœotian," as Gladstone called him), having absolutely destroyed the Morning Chronicle (he lost £7000 by it yearly) by his Puseyite predilections, felt, it seems, a sting of conscience for having employed so many able pens in a lost cause, and thrown them in some degree out of other employment. Instead, however, of pensioning his old staff, which his enormous wealth, notwithstanding the late drain on it, would have easily enabled him to do, he set aside £25,000 for the publication of a Review, and placed it in the hands of his late editor, Cooke, with liberty to take his own line. With the exception, therefore, of one or two Tory and High-Church articles, the appearance of which in the Saturday's columns used to excite such surprise, and which he put in out of gratitude to his patron, this gentleman adopted for a policy the attack of all popular favorites in literature and politics, which he certainly carried out with great consistency. And since, though nothing succeeds like success, nothing also has so many enemies, the abuse thus showered upon all great men was found very popular and palatable. It was not a very high line of procedure, but as the plan was obvious, and, by Mr. Grant's own showing, did no harm to the authors and politicians selected for the scalping-knife, it seems to me he has wasted a good deal of virtuous indignation. Perhaps the principal object of his pamphlet was to state that Mr. Harwood, the present editor of the Saturday, was a Unitarian preacher. Its most amusing statement is the following. After explaining that the best and wisest writers were always the object of the Saturday's virulence, Mr. Grant naïvely adds, "And I myself was among those authors whose works were most fiercely assailed."

In England, I am ashamed to say, some of us (and those even good judges) do not read our Pickwick as we ought to do. An attorney's clerk being under cross-examination before the Lord Chief Baron (Kelly) the other day, was asked sardonically by the prosecuting counsel whether he had ever been in the office of one Mr. Solomon Pell.

"Pell?" echoed the astonished witness. "Pell?"

"Well, you heard the question, didn't you?" broke in the irascible judge. "Don't fence with the learned counsel, but answer him directly." And he waited, pen in hand, to set down his reply.

"But I never even heard of Mr. Solomon Pell, my lord."

"That's not the question. The question is, Were you ever in Mr. Pell's office?"

It is not very often that our judges are made ridiculous, but I am told that the court was in one roar, and that the Lord Chief Baron has taken to his bed and a course of Dickens.

"I NEVER saw but one literal gaucherie in my life," said Frank Delamere, as we leaned over the bulwarks, and watched the quaint old houses of Panama melting into the receding background of forest, "and this was how it happened. On my first visit to New Orleans I fell in with an Englishman of the name of Montfort. I had got lost—no very difficult matter in a town like that—and was asking my way of a nigger, who seemed to know rather less about it than I did myself, when, luckily for me, this fellow Montfort happened to pass by. The moment he saw that I was at a loss he stepped forward, and very politely offered to pilot me, which he did, going considerably out of his way to do it. When we got to my hotel, of course I couldn't well do less than ask him in. We got talking, and his talk amused me somehow, so that when he got up to go I begged him to look me up again when he had nothing better to do. He did so, and in a little while we became pretty intimate—as intimate, at least, as any one could get to be with him. Not that he was what you would call reserved. He would talk freely enough about the things he had seen and done, and the strange places he had visited, and the strange people he had met; but when you came to think it all over afterward you would begin to notice that he had not said a word about who he was, or where he came from, or what he did, and, although we were so constantly together, I knew no more of him the last day than on the first.

"Another of his queer ways was doing things that nobody else did, and not doing things that every body else did, and that, too, not at all like an affectation, but as if it came quite natural to him. He used to walk the most unheard-of distances in the heat of the day, when all the rest of the town was having a siesta; and to go to bed early in the evening, just when every one else was going out; and to get up early in the morning, just when every one else was going to bed. Then, on the other hand, he neither smoked nor drank, never played cards, and (which was even more astounding to the New Orleansers) never made love! At New Orleans, you know, you make love to every woman you meet, as a matter of course; but this fellow (though, to do him justice, he was always perfectly polite to them) seemed hardly to know whether they were women or men!

"You mustn't suppose from all this, though, that he was unpopular. Let a fellow once get a character for that sort of thing, and it's ten to one the women like him all the better for it. Then, too, his feats in the athletic line, and the reports that were afloat of his wonderful adventures, and, above all, the kind of mystery that enveloped him, were great points in his favor. He wasn't ornamental, certainly—a square, heavy-built fellow, with a big lumpy forehead, and a long hooked nose, and a hard mouth half covered with thick mustache and beard; but he had a strange, out-of-the-way, picturesque style of talking that was rather attractive: and with all he had seen and all he had read, he was worth listening to. But it will save you a great infliction if, instead of describing him any further, I just quote you part of a conversation we had one day.

"'I suppose you'll be here some time yet?' said I.

"'Not likely,' he answered: 'I've been here six weeks already, and that's too long for any man to stay in one place without some special object. New scenery renews individuals, just as new blood renews races; and, besides, I've been far too comfortable here as it is.'

"'What the deuce do you mean?' asked I, fairly puzzled.

"'I mean,' answered he, 'that too much ease relaxes the muscles of the mind as well as those of the body: you need hard work and danger and adversity to come and fling cold water on you, and rub you down with rough towels and stir your blood into action once more. When any thing goes wrong with me it's just like a shower-bath; after the first shock I feel ten times fresher and stronger than ever: but prolonged enjoyment, with nothing to ruffle it, is not good for any one. Just think what a burden life would be if there were nothing to fight against!'

"'Well,' said I (I really couldn't help it), 'there's no fear but you'll have enough to fight against if you always go slap in the teeth of established usages as you've done here!'

"'Very true,' he answered, as coolly as if I had paid him a compliment. 'I can't expect every one to think as I do, and very likely it would be a bad thing if they did. But when a thing has got to be done, done it must be!'

"I can't give you an idea of the way he brought out that last sentence; every word sounded like a nail knocked into a wall. I didn't say any more to him that time.

"Now I must tell you that at this time the belle of New Orleans was a certain Miss Georgiana De Courcy, the handsomest girl and the greatest heiress in Louisiana, and—what counts for a good deal in the Southern States—of one of the oldest families in the South. She was certainly a splendid woman—without an atom of heart or conscience, beautiful as a leopard, vain as a peacock, and greedy of admiration as—well, as a woman; one of the finest creatures altogether that I ever saw in my life! Well, as you may imagine, before she had been in town a month all the young swells of the place were at her feet; and the most ardent of all was a young Frenchman, Henri Le Vaillant by name, a man of good family, and originally of good fortune; but he had contrived to run through such a lot of it before he came of age that, as Paddy says in the song,

'When he came to man's estate,
  It was all the estate he had.'

This being the case, it was only natural that he should think it a good idea to recoup himself by winning the favor (and fortune) of Miss De Courcy; and, to give the devil his due, he was just the man to make any girl like him if he had a mind that way. To begin with, he was a very handsome fellow—slim and graceful as any statue in Rome, and with that beauté du diable which you see so often among high-caste Frenchmen; then, he could sing first-rate songs, and dance like any Taglioni; and to crown all, he was the best rider, and, what was more to the purpose, the best fencer in the town. Indeed, he had pinked so many men in various quarrels that his chums, in a kind of chaff upon his double capacity of lady-killer and duelist, nicknamed him 'Perce-cœur.' So when it was known that 'the Pierce-heart' had got his eye upon Miss De Courcy, you may think that her other worshipers began to feel rather put about.

"Now it so happened that I had brought an introduction to the girl's father, Colonel De Courcy, whom she ruled as completely as she ruled every one else, and he had invited me to a grand ball that they gave a little after my arrival. It was at this ball that I got my first sight of Le Vaillant—a slight, delicate-featured man, with a little black mustache, but supple as a greyhound and active as a tiger. Of course he was horribly conceited, as these fellows always are; but barring that, he struck me as rather pleasant company, and I couldn't help thinking that if he really meant business as regarded the De Courcy, he stood well to make his game.

"Well, the ball was like every other ball—plenty of heat and crush and chatter; lots of dancing and flirting, and ices and Champagne; a few people worth talking to, and a great many better worth leaving alone. About two in the morning (having just made my escape from a dreadful woman, who had never been to Paris and would insist upon knowing all about it), I went out upon the veranda to recover myself, and came bump against another man, who was just coming in. I turned round to apologize, and saw—Montfort!

"I don't think I was ever more taken aback in all my life. Here was a fellow who neither danced, drank, nor flirted—who always went to bed at ten, and didn't know a woman from a mile-stone—cropping up all at once in the middle of a ball! It was Saul among the prophets with a vengeance!

"'Hollo, Montfort!' said I, 'isn't this rather a violation of your principles?'

"'What would you have? One must do in Rome as the Romans do. Here it's the fashion to go to balls, and I go to them. In the Andes, where I am going presently, it's the fashion to climb peaks and scramble along rock ledges, and I shall climb and scramble with the rest. Good-night—I must be going.'

"This (as poor Dickens says somewhere) was 'pilin' it up rayther too mountaynious.' The idea of Montfort, of all men on earth, doing a thing because other people did it was a little too good; I'd as soon have believed in Tom Sayers joining the Peace Society. And my doubts were not dispelled by a fragment of conversation which I overheard just then from two men who were standing on the veranda a little way off.

"'Who was that fellow who was out here just now with Miss De Courcy?'

"'Don't know; but I fancy it's the same man who takes those wonderful walks—Moffat, or Montfort, or some such name.'

"'Well, he seemed to be making the most of his time, anyhow.' And the two passed on.

"As for me, I went home very much out of temper with myself. I had been wont to brag that nobody could throw dust in my eyes; and yet this fellow Montfort had done it as thoroughly as one man ever did to another. To judge by present appearances, his former show of asceticism must have been all humbug; and upon my word, I was rather sorry for it. To me this man was a kind of rare specimen—a Codex Sinaiticus, a new hieroglyphic; and I valued him as Professor Tischendorf might value the one, or Sir Henry Rawlinson the other. In this easy-going age, bristling with every conceivable invention for making men indolent and luxurious, it was something to find even one living creature who seemed to defy without an effort every temptation that can assail humanity; and now it appeared all at once that he wasn't the man I took him for. The only thing to be done was to find out at once how the case really stood; so directly after breakfast I posted off to Montfort's quarters, and found him sitting near the window (as fresh as if he had been in bed all night) writing a letter with his left hand.

"'Hollo!' said I, 'is your right arm paralyzed with handing lemonade?'

"'No; but it's as well to keep in practice, in case I should hurt the other hand. That's one thing my travels have taught me—to be as handy with my left as with my right.'

"'Why, do you mean to say that you can throw and carve and write and handle a cue or a single-stick as well with one hand as with the other?'

"'Pretty nearly, so far as I've tried yet; one of these days I'll give you a specimen.'

"(So he did—in a way I little dreamed of.)

"'Well, look here,' said I, coming to the point, 'aren't you a pretty fellow to pretend never to love, and all that sort of thing—and then to go walking on a veranda at two in the morning with the prettiest girl in the town?'

"As I spoke, I looked keenly in his face for some sign of confusion. I might as well have looked at the Great Sphinx.

"'Ah, you think I'm in love with Miss De Courcy,' said he, with a quiet laugh. 'Well, you're not the only one who does me the honor to hold that opinion; but you rate my good taste too high. The young lady is an extremely interesting study; but as for my admiring her, happily even public opinion can not turn that fiction into a fact!'

"'Do you mean to tell me, then,' cried I, 'that you can't fall in love, even if you tried?'

"'I mean to tell you,' he answered, drawing himself up, and looking really grand for the moment, 'that I should not count life worth having, if I were overcome, even for one moment, by any influence that I could not shake off, which is what I understand by love. The greatest pleasure of life, take my word for it, is the free use of one's own will.'

"'I suppose, then,' said I, half joking, 'that if you did fall in love, and she played fast and loose with you, you'd kill yourself?'

"'Not myself,' he answered, very quietly; and then he put away his writing, and asked me to come out for a stroll. And so the subject dropped. But I now began to suspect (not for the first time) that my friend Montfort wasn't quite right in the head; and when you hear the rest of the story, I think you'll agree with me.

"Well, for about a month after that every thing went on as usual. The season was well in by this time, and I had my hands full—balls, masquerades, musical soirées, private theatricals, and what not. Once or twice I lighted upon Montfort in the very thick of it; but for the most part he seemed rather to fight shy of going about, in spite of his theory about 'doing as the Romans did.' However, he occupied a good deal of my attention just then; for, to tell the truth, I was rather riled at the way he had thrown dust in my eyes; and I determined to find out, by hook or by crook, whether he were really spooney on the De Courcy or not. But I might as well have saved myself the trouble, for, look as sharp as I might, I was just as wise at the end of the month as at the beginning. One thing I found out, though—that Montfort and Le Vaillant liked each other about as well as a badger and a terrier, and that the least thing would kindle a row between them. Le Vaillant had managed, by dint of his dueling renown, to exact a kind of deference from every body he knew; whereas Montfort made no more of him than if he had been a crossing-sweeper, and, indeed, had rather shut him up once or twice, when he began to brag a little too extensively. Now I needn't tell you that you may do any thing to a Frenchman rather than make him look small before a whole roomful of people, especially when half of them are ladies. Then, again, Le Vaillant's blustering ways riled Montfort; and so, bit by bit, they came to hate each other like poison.

"Now I should tell you that while all this was going on, I had become rather thick with Colonel De Courcy, Georgiana's father; not that I had any idea of her, but at that time I was rather mad on sporting, and the old colonel seemed to have hunted and shot every beast that came out of the ark. So pretty nearly every other day I used to stroll up there, and find the old boy sitting in his garden over a weed and a mint-julep, and we would have a long palaver about the big game, and the best spots for finding them. Well, one afternoon, about five weeks after that ball I was speaking of, I turned up in the colonel's garden, but didn't find him in his usual place; and I was just thinking of going up to the house to look for him, when, all at once, just on the other side of the high shrubbery behind which I was standing, I heard voices; and they were the voices of Miss De Courcy and—Montfort!

"Of course you'll say I was a confounded snob for listening, and I don't deny it; but, at the same time, I could no more help it than I could help breathing. Through the leaves I could see them standing on the sidewalk; and though they spoke low, I heard every word.

"'Mr. Montfort,' says she, 'I have a great favor to ask of you; and although people call you ungallant, I can not believe that you will be so unkind as to refuse me. Will you do what I ask?'

"(Talk of witchcraft! you should have heard her voice, and seen the look she gave! It was enough to drive a man stark mad; and I know it made me tingle all over, as if I'd fallen into a bed of nettles.)

"'I await your commands,' says Montfort, as coolly as if he'd been reading Euclid. (I couldn't have done it in his place, I know that.)

"'Well,' says she, 'I find that Mr. Le Vaillant—that young Frenchman whom you met here the other day—has been showing to all his friends a likeness of myself, which I was foolish enough to give him, and has the insolence to boast of it, as if—as if I had—in short, as if more importance might be attached to it than it really deserves.' (The way she did that little bit of bashfulness would have made her fortune on the stage.) 'You are the only man whom I can trust to check his impertinence, for all the rest seem afraid of him. May I count upon you to defend my reputation?'

"She took both his hands in hers (I suppose to add emphasis to her petition), and cast her eyes on the ground. It was well that she did; for there came over Montfort's face such a look of killing contempt as made me fairly shake. He drew himself up, as if he could have trampled her under his feet; and for that moment he looked really splendid—just as I had seen him look when I chaffed him about being in love with her, the morning after the ball.

"'I am at your service,' says he, bowing; and with that away he went, without another word. As for me, I stood like a fool for good five minutes before I could recollect myself, the whole thing took me so aback. This was worse than I had ever dreamed of. All that I ever bargained for was a little flare-up between Montfort and the Frenchman, which would blow over and leave all clear again; but here was a far more serious business. Whether the De Courcy had got tired of having Le Vaillant always hanging after her, and wanted to get rid of him, or whether it was only her confounded vanity that was tickled at the idea of setting men fighting about her, I can't tell; but I've always thought (though it seems a horrible thing to say of any woman) that she was riled at Montfort for not bowing down to her as every one else did, and that she meant to punish him by getting him knocked on the head. Look at it which way I would, it was a very bad business. Apart from my liking for Montfort, I couldn't abide the thought of an Englishman being killed by a Frenchman, and the whole town crowing over it, as they'd be sure to do. And yet how was I to stop it? I and the other two men were invited that very day to dine with some Virginian big-wig (Fortescue, I think his name was), and then to go to a ball that Colonel De Courcy was giving the same evening; so that even if they missed each other at one place, they were sure to meet at the other. Altogether, it really seemed as if the powers of mischief had contrived it; and I went home feeling bad all over.

"Well, to Fortescue's I went, and didn't manage to get near Montfort till dinner was done; but when we turned out to have our smoke in the garden (a famous big place, with a fountain in the middle, and dark shrubberies all round hung with colored lamps, just like a scene in a theatre), I got hold of him, and drew him into conversation, meaning at least to stick by him all the evening, in case of any thing happening. But just then, as ill luck would have it, who should come swaggering past but that beast Le Vaillant, with his chorus of worshipers about him, and, of course, he must bring out Miss De Courcy's likeness, and begin bragging about it before them all.

"'Thus it is that we Frenchmen win the day,' said he, in his boastful way; 'every thing is possible to those who dare! It is only those who hang back that get nothing, like those English cowards in the Crimea!'

"I jumped up like a shot at that, you may be sure; but Montfort was before me. With one stride he was through the circle, and confronted the Frenchman, looking him full in the eyes.

"'Did I understand monsieur to say,' asked he, bowing, 'that the English are cowards?'

"'I did,' answered the other, looking up at him insolently.

"'You lie, then!' says Montfort, and gave him a slap in the face with his open hand that echoed all over the garden like a pistol-shot.

"Then there was a row, if you like! Every body ran forward at once, shouting and screaming. In an instant the two had their coats off, and were standing face to face, each with a small-sword in his hand, on the bit of smooth turf beside the fountain. It was evident, as soon as they began, that Le Vaillant was the better swordsman of the two; and in a few minutes (just as I had feared) Montfort got a thrust through the arm, below the elbow, that made him drop his weapon. Of course all Le Vaillant's chums shouted for joy; but how they stared when Montfort coolly twisted his handkerchief round his right arm, drew the knot with his teeth, took up the sword in his left hand, and said, quietly, 'En garde, monsieur!'

"It was then, for the first time, that the Frenchman began to look disturbed; and certainly there was something awful in this dogged, blood-thirsty persistency, which no pain or danger could shake. Two or three of Le Vaillant's party tried to protest, but the others overruled them, and the fight began again. The two faces were a sight: Le Vaillant looked like a wolf in a trap—full of a kind of frightened fury; Montfort's face was quiet, and cold as marble, but with a look of grim satisfaction on it, as if he was sure of his man at last. And so, indeed, he was. In those days the French schools didn't generally teach their men how to meet a left-handed attack; and Le Vaillant, who had never seen any thing of the sort before, was fairly puzzled. His breath began to fail, his hand shook; and at last, as he overreached himself in making a thrust, Montfort sprang in, and went clean through him, from breast to back. Then picking up the miniature, he flung his coat loose over his shoulders, and flew out of the garden like a wild-cat. I followed him as hard as I could pelt (you know I couldn't tell what he might do in the mad fit that seemed to be on him), and I tell you that in all my life I never had such a run. He never slackened once till he got to Colonel De Courcy's, where the ball was just at its height; and there he bolted through the gate, burst into the ball-room, right through the midst of the dancers, and rushing up to where Miss De Courcy was standing, flung the miniature at her feet.

"'Talk of theatres!—that scene beat 'em all. Every body seemed turned to stone, and several ladies fainted outright, without any one minding them. And well they might. Montfort was white as a corpse, in spite of his hard run; his clothes were all splashed with blood; his right arm hung down at his side; and his face glared as if he were mad.

"'Are you satisfied?' he asked, in a voice as if some one were choking him. 'You commanded, and I have obeyed you. Take your likeness' (he crushed it with his heel as he spoke), 'and so perish every memorial of the woman who dared to weigh her caprice against the life of a brave man!'

"He looked round upon the company—who were all standing like statues—as if he could strike them dead on the spot, and then vanished into the darkness, like an evil spirit.

"I never saw or heard of him after that night; but he had his revenge, if that did him any good. The De Courcy never got over the fright he gave her; she fell into a decline, and died eighteen months later; and her father wasn't long in following her. Now, then, what do you say to a hand at écarté?"

PARIS GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THOSE DREADFUL AMERICANS.

WE have had some conversation about the habit of receiving on a given day in Paris, and dwelt, I think, a little on the advantages and inconveniences resulting from the system. It remains for foreigners to consider which way the scale dips as far as they are concerned, and to adopt or reject the plan accordingly. But let it be well understood that having once committed themselves to the obligation of remaining one day in the week in-doors for the accommodation of their acquaintances, it becomes an imperative duty on them to do so, and to allow no temptation to lure them out of the house on that day, nor to let any pretext of fatigue or slight headache, or any thing, in fact, short of positive illness, induce them to deny themselves to visitors. Premising that this fundamental principle is soundly established in their minds, we will give a word or two of advice on certain customs connected with this one of having "a day" which have of late years crept into Paris salons. The most prominent of these innovations is that of the five-o'clock tea. This has long been an institution in England. We will not stop to discuss the wisdom or the folly of making it a point of duty to scald one's inside regularly every afternoon with cups of boiling liquid, and of conscientiously providing for one's friends who drop in between lunch and dinner time the same enjoyable opportunity. But so many wise and vehement things have been urged against the process that it is only fair to repeat here the one word we ever heard advanced in favor of it. An Italian medical man of high repute assured a celebrated English writer in Rome that one reason why English visitors to the Eternal City succumbed less frequently than others to the malaria fever was owing to their custom of scalding themselves morning, noon, and night with hot tea. No other liquid, he maintained, could replace tea as an antidote against the terrible Roman fever.

Now that we have done our duty by the dear national beverage, which "cheers but not inebriates," we may, with a clear conscience, inveigh against its encroachments in Paris salons. This five-o'clock episode has not been imported to Paris by the English. Americans will tell you that it has, but I altogether and emphatically deny the charge. As a rule, people take it in England by way of a break in the day, and also because the late dinner hour, which varies from seven to eight, makes the slight refreshment of a cup of tea really desirable in our damp, dismal, and bone-aching climate; but in Paris, where the dinner hour is from six to half past, there is not the shadow of such a necessity for it, and English people are the first to congratulate themselves on being able to do without it. It never occurred to them to offer it to French people, who never take it in their own houses, and would a little while ago have thought it a most absurd entertainment. The English may plead guilty to having substituted tea and cakes in the evening receptions for sirups and sugar-and-water, but the five-o'clock tea is the doing of those dreadful Americans. Now it may strike you as ridiculous to say so, but this importation of theirs is bitterly resented by the French—by the Parisians, I should say—for they are, I fancy, as yet the only sufferers from it. They hate the trouble of it, and they can not see any justification for its being imposed upon them by strangers. It used to be fully understood among French people that when they went to visit each other they went to talk, and not to eat or drink. This made it as easy for the widow lady with a very small income, a small apartment, and one servant, to collect her friends about her once a week as for the fortunate possessor of a large revenue and fine establishment to do it. It entailed no expense whatever, and involved no trouble beyond a little extra attention to her dress, and the same for her bonne, who was seated in the anteroom, with her daintiest cap and apron, sewing in the window between the intervals of the rings, which she had no other occupation that afternoon but to answer. But all this is changed of late. Tea is expected where pleasant conversation formerly sufficed, and it is impossible to attend to this operation in the drawing-room while devoted to the hall door. The double service requires two servants, and the consequence is that madame not being able to stretch her income to the demand, closes her salon, and gives up her weekly gathering. This is not the result of a day, of course. It has taken probably three or four years to crush those unpretending little receptions out of Paris society; but thanks to the extravagant habits of those dreadful Americans, and to the weak-minded and ape-like propensities of the French themselves for following the lead in matters of fashion, it has been effectually and very extensively accomplished. The pleasant old French grandes dames, who can only afford one servant, are not the only ones to suffer; they are the last, perhaps, for fashion has to break through many rings before it penetrates into their narrow one. The English five-o'clock tea, even in the most magnificent establishments in London, consists simply of cups of tea already poured out, and handed to you on a salver, with a plate of wafer-like slices of bread-and-butter; neither cakes, nor ices, nor sweetmeats of any sort are introduced. When, therefore, English people in Paris choose to have it, it makes little difference in the afternoon's work where there are a couple of servants in a house. But the Americans are not satisfied with this. They have made the solitary cup of tea an opportunity for a grand display of plate, cakes, candies, and what not. On their day, when you visit them, you find the ladies attired as for a wedding reception, in the very latest fashion, young and old alike; and you behold a table set out with all the paraphernalia of an evening tea-party, a bright urn singing lustily above an entire silver service, surrounded by every variety of confectionery, wines, and liquors. The young lady, if there be one, presides over the tea-pot, and the occupation, as she naïvely admits, is agreeable because it gives one something to do, and makes a break in the effort at conversation. All this may be very pretty to look at, and the cakes are pleasant to eat, but the whole performance costs a good deal of money, which is not pleasant to many; they are foolish enough to consider themselves bound to return something of the same sort to their entertainers when these latter come to visit them. It may do once in a way, but when it has to be done once a week, it becomes a bore and a drain; they hate it, and revenge themselves by stigmatizing the somewhat ostentatious hospitality as "purse-proud vulgarity;" they take a dislike to the whole nationality, and declare that Americans don't know what "société" means; that they can not congregate for half an hour's intercourse without making it an occasion for showing off their money, etc. This is one among other reasons we have named why French people fight shy of Americans in Paris, and often appear to behave rudely or coldly to them; they simply can not afford to keep up with their habits and customs, and they naturally dislike appearing mean or inhospitable. Why can not American visitors, who really wish to see something of French life and manners during their sojourn in the country, conform outwardly to the simplicity which even still in exclusively French circles so charmingly characterizes them? Let them, if they hold to their cup of tea, have it, but what need for this tawdry display of plate and confectionery, alike against common-sense and good taste? If a few American women of high standing set their faces against the exaggeration of the custom, it would even now be soon modified, so as to render it inoffensive.

One last remark I must make while on this subject. Americans, who are so proverbially hospitable in their own country, are apt occasionally to run into the other extreme when abroad, and to suppose that because they can not have things on their accustomed fine scale, they are to do nothing in the way of social entertainment. This is a great mistake, especially in Paris, where hospitality can be made to consist so much more in the grace of the welcome than in the quantity of the refreshments. I was once invited with some friends to spend the evening with an American family from the West. It was sultry August weather. We were shown into the bedroom, where we took off our things; the salon was brilliantly lighted, and there we sat in conversation till eleven o'clock, when we took our leave, not having been offered so much as a glass of water. There was an indirect apology for the fact tendered afterward in the plea that as they were in furnished lodgings, the china, etc., was so shabby they really could not attempt to offer any thing to their friends. The same thing happened me on three occasions in the case of a most charming Southern family. Now surely this theory is a mistake. Who cares—at least in France—what your cups are like, if they be handed with simple hospitality and good tea? I shall say a few words next time on evening receptions. For the present I will conclude, with a hope that some of my American friends will change their views on the above points before we have the pleasure of making their acquaintance in Paris.

THE EMPEROR OF GERMANY AT ST. PETERSBURG.

IT is unnecessary here to recapitulate all the incidents of the recent festivities at St. Petersburg. There is no special bond of friendship existing between the people of Germany and the people of Russia, but the courts of the two empires are very closely connected by blood-relationship, in addition to which the Czar Alexander has a strong personal admiration for his uncle. As for the Emperor William himself, for nearly sixty years past he has maintained close personal connection with Russia. On New-Year's Day, 1814, he crossed the Rhine with a Russian corps, and saw fighting for the first time; the first military order he ever received was the Russian St. George, conferred on him for his bravery at Bar-sur-Aube, and he re-entered Paris on the 31st March of that year with Russian troops. Three years later he escorted to St. Petersburg the bride of the future Emperor Nicholas, and he attended the funeral of Alexander I. Since then he has paid many visits to the Russian court. One of these was of especial interest, when, on the occasion of Nicholas erecting a monumental column to the memory of his father and his father's wars, he went to St. Petersburg at the head of a deputation of men who had fought from 1813 to 1815. This incident is recalled by our sketch, in which we once more see the Emperor William, still active and vigorous, though so many of his German comrades in arms are in their graves. He is seated by the side of the Czar, and is passing beneath the martial statue of his brother-in-law, the late Emperor Nicholas. The two Emperors were preceded by the Chief of the Town, General Trepoff. The large building in the background is the palace of the Grand Duchess Marie Nicolaievna, or Nicholas's daughter, the second name of a Russian always denoting the parentage.

THE HUMMING-BIRD.

NOTHING can exceed the tenderness which the male humming-bird evinces during breeding-time for his lovely companion, nor the courage which he displays for her protection. On the approach of an intrusive bird, though ten times bigger than himself, he will not hesitate a moment to attack the disturber of his nest; his bravery adds a tenfold increase to his powers, the rapidity of his movements confounds his enemy, and finally drives him to flight. Proud of his success, the little champion returns to his partner, and flaps triumphantly his tiny wings. But with all his activity and courage, he is not always able to avert disaster from his nest, for an enormous bush spider (Mygale), covered all over with black hair, too often lurks in the vicinity, watching for the moment when the little birds shall creep out of the shell. With sudden attack it then invades the nest, and sucks their life-blood. Against this enemy neither courage nor despair is of any avail, and if the poor humming-bird endeavors to avenge the slaughter of his young, he only shares their fate, and perishes in the fatal embrace of the spider.

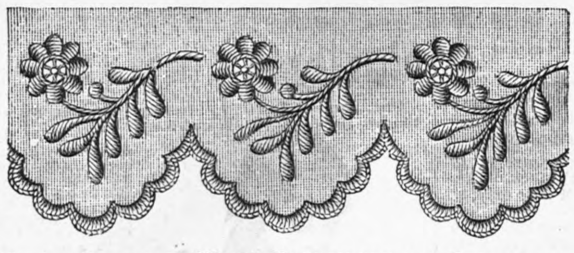

Fig. 1.—BORDER IN WHITE EMBROIDERY FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Borders in White Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE borders are suitable for trimming lingerie, linen, etc. They are embroidered on fine linen, batiste, or Swiss muslin. The illustrations plainly show the manner of working the embroidery.

Box for Postage Stamps.

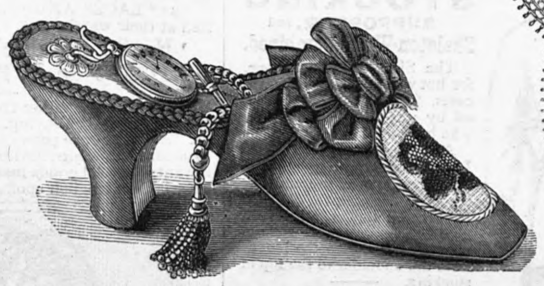
THIS box with an overlapping lid is made of card-board, divided into three sections on the inside, as shown by the illustration, and covered with white watered paper. The outside is covered with maroon inlaid Russia leather; in the middle of the lid, at the top, is a medallion of gray faille, on which either a monogram or a small design may be worked in satin stitch or point Russe with maroon saddler's silk and gold thread.

Cover for Bible, Prayer-Book, etc., Figs. 1-3.

THIS cover, which is designed for Bibles, prayer-books, etc., is made of velvet, damask, or faille, and is embroidered with gold thread and gold braid as shown by Fig. 1. Figs. 2 and 3 show each a full-sized section of a suitable border for the cover. The design figures of both borders are applied in a lighter shade of the material, and are edged with chain stitches of gold thread. Silver cord or colored silk braid may be used, or the embroidery may be executed with silk.

MEDIÆVAL DINNER-PARTIES.

IN the days of chivalry it was a costly business to ask a few friends to dinner. They were not content to eat and drink at the expense of the host, but fully expected—if the banquet partook of a ceremonial character—to carry away something more negotiable than a headache or an indigestion. They looked forward with a keen financial appetite to gifts of silver vessels, falcons, coats of mail, goodly horses, "certain gemmes, by curious art sette in gold; of purple and cloth of gold for men's apparell." Imagine a dinner-party of the present day at which cups and covers, weight-carrying hunters, bracelets and bangles, should be distributed between the courses, and from which no guest should be permitted to depart until he had accepted sufficient cloth to make him a new suit! Ancient banquets were not only expensive, but cumbrous. Many inconvenient ceremonies contributed to lengthen the hours consecrated to gastronomy. Certain dishes were brought in by a regular procession, the boar's head by a deputation of domestics, and the peacock by a contingent of fair dames. The peacock was styled "the food of lovers and the meat of lords." It was roasted and served up whole, covered after dressing with the skin and feathers, the comb entire, and the tail spread. Sometimes the noble bird was covered with gold-leaf instead of its feathers, but the prevailing taste appears to have been in favor of the peacock in full plumage.



WATCH-CASE.
For design and description see Supplement, No. XXIX., Fig. 99.

Edward the Third dispensed a romantic hospitality, wherein eating and drinking, tournaments and love-making, were agreeably mingled; but it was under the reign of his immediate successor, Richard the Second, that the magnificent prodigality of royal entertainments rose to its greatest height. The cost of these banquets was enormous, and the salaries of the cooks—if they were ever paid—must have greatly helped to lighten the royal coffers. Two thousand cooks and three hundred servitors were required to dress food for and wait upon the ten thousand visitors who daily attended the court. To furnish food for this almost incredible number of guests twenty-eight oxen, three hundred sheep, myriads of fowls, and immense quantities of game were immolated daily.

Richard the Second was not only a magnificent host, but a true epicure, and it was during his reign that the celebrated Forme of Cury was compiled by his master cooks, A.D. 1390. This curious vellum roll contained one hundred and ninety-six formulæ for the concoction of the dishes most in favor toward the close of the fourteenth century. Apparently the master cooks were not the sole authors of this curious work, as it was compiled by "assent and avysement of maisters of phisik and of philosophie," who dwelt in the court of King Richard.

It is remarkable that throughout the Forme of Cury we find it impossible to discover the slightest trace of plain food. When any thing is to be boiled we are told to "seeth it in a gode broth," or a court bouillon made of wine and water. Roasting is only spoken of as a preliminary to some operation of a more complicated description, and broils are not mentioned. Meat roasted and boiled was apparently left to "those of the meaner sort," for so far as we can discover the great lords contented themselves with stews, hashes, and made dishes generally.

Even as early as the fourteenth century the art of larding was well known, and is recommended for "cranys and herons, pecokys and partrigchis." In the account of the great feast at the enthronization of the "reverende father in God George Nevell Archbishop of York and Chauncelour of Englande, in the VI yere of the raigne of Kyng Edwarde the fourth," we find curious evidence of the favor in which strange edibles were then held. Among the goodly provision made for the banquet we find enumerated, in addition to one thousand sheep, one hundred and four oxen, three hundred and four "veales," and a like number of "porkes," four hundred swans, six wild bulls, one hundred and four peacocks, two hundred and four cranes, a like number of bitterns, four hundred herons, a thousand egrets, one hundred curlews, and twelve "porposes and seales."

At this sublime feast the "Earle of Warwicke" officiated as steward, and the guests were placed at various tables according to rank. It does not appear, however, that on this great occasion the bills of fare graduated in like proportion as was done at the enthronization feast of William of Wareham in 1504.

That the art of cookery should have declined rapidly in England after the Elizabethan period appears singular, but it is vain to seek in the records of later banquets for the magnificence that distinguished those of an earlier date. Dropping down to the period of the Revolution, we find that coarse food had almost entirely supplanted the delicate dishes of the mediæval cooks, and about the reign of the king wh was puzzled by an app' dumpling the culin y art sank, as might have been expected, to the lowest depths of degradation. Perhaps this decadence was due in great measure to the coarse tastes of the Georges, of whom the first liked stale oysters, and the last, in spite of his pretended refinement, was a gross feeder, who preferred a shoulder of mutton and onion sauce to the loftiest inspirations of his chef. It would, however, be unfair not to admit that the splendid quality of English meat and vegetables has had much to do with the national indifference to refined cookery. The raw material is so good in itself that it is almost impossible to spoil it. Hence has arisen a barbarous indifference to the culinary art which is often denounced in England as a mere device for making bad food palatable.

GREAT FORTUNES.

DR. ADAM SMITH, in his Wealth of Nations—a work which laid the foundation of our system of political economy—points out that the acquisition of wealth is quite indispensable to the advancement of society in civilization and refinement. "Without the tranquillity and leisure afforded by the possession of accumulated riches, those speculative and elegant studies which expand and enlarge our views, purify our taste, and lift us higher in the scale of being could not be successfully prosecuted. Experience shows that the barbarism and refinement of nations depend more on the amount of their wealth than on any other circumstance. No people have ever made any distinguished figure in philosophy or the fine arts without having been at the same time celebrated for their riches and industry."

As a rule, modern millionaires are not parsimonious in their way of living; in fact, the establishments of our merchant princes often eclipse those of the aristocracy. They frequently have expensive hobbies, like that of picture collecting, and their descendants find when such collections are dispersed that the money invested in works of art generally yields a good return. There are a few examples of great fortunes made by misers, who often denied themselves the necessaries of life in order that they might leave a large sum behind them. Such a man was James Wood, of Gloucester, England, who died in 1836 possessed of property sworn under £900,000. A will was found, in which he left all his property to Alderman Wood, of London, his attorney, and two clerks. But a short time after a codicil to the will was sent in anonymously, bequeathing various large sums to different individuals. It was accompanied with this extraordinary memorandum: "The inclosed is a paper saved out of many burned by parties I could hang. They pretend it is not J. Wood's hand; many will swear to it. They want to swindle me. Let the rest know." The writer was never discovered; and now came litigation, which lasted four years. Sir Herbert Jenner gave his judgment in 1840, rejecting the codicil so mysteriously sent. But—oh, the glorious uncertainty of the law!—Lord Lyndhurst, in a higher court, reversed the judgment, and the money was divided according to the terms of the will.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

R. S. L.—Get summer camel's-hair, or else vigogne, for a châtelaine redingote to wear over your brown silk skirt.

H. E. T.—Read about thin goods for mourning in Bazar No. 21, Vol. VI. Get a black chip Rubens hat, and trim with lustreless black silk. Lace is not admissible in deep mourning. Crape sacques lined with silk, or else wraps of the dress material, are used. It is necessary to send bust measure for loose polonaise pattern.

THERESE B.—The tight basque suit pattern is appropriate for grenadine. Put a wide puffed heading for each flounce. The grenadine over-skirt must not be lined—indeed, over-skirts should never be lined, as their grace consists in their soft drapery. The thick silk used for lining the basque is sufficient without other lining. The skirt upon which the grenadine flounces are mounted is made of thinner silk or of foulard. Make your plain Victoria lawn with a pleated blouse-waist and apron over-skirt, and trim both skirts with kilt pleating. Wear a watered ribbon sash.

DAISY.—The Double-breasted Jacket Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 43, Vol. V., contains the English walking jacket pattern. We can not give more "doll patterns" at present.

HAVEN.—Make both your green silks into stylish plain short dresses, and wear with polonaises of the new striped green fabrics, or else of batiste or Swiss muslin.

K.—A darker shade of gray, or else of leaf brown silk, combined with your pale gray would make a stylish suit. Make the lower skirt like sample, with flounces piped above the hem with a darker shade. Then have an over-skirt and sleeveless basque, or else a demi-polonaise of the darker shade, with dark sashes.

SUBSCRIBER.—You can buy a very desirable lace sacque of llama or guipure for $50. The latter will be the most stylish garment of the summer season.

A COUNTRY DRESS-MAKER.—The black silk polonaise made as you suggest will be the best over dress for the poplin skirt. Side pleatings are hemmed on the wrong side with lightly taken stitches that do not show outside. Bands down front breadths are pointed below, fringed, and meet a flounce across the foot of the dress. Puffs stop plainly at the skirt braid without trimming. Melon puffs are usually fringed above a flounce.

CONSTANT READER.—Short Gabrielles of gray or brown linen take the place of aprons for little children, both boys and girls. They are sold ready-made for $1 at the furnishing houses. White is most used for children. Brown linen, piqué, and percale are standard goods for children.

F. E. M. AND OTHERS.—For mourning read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 21, Vol. VI.

MRS. L. R. P.—A Medici fraise is a high frill of silk and lace around the neck, and would be suitable for your gray silk.

ERNESTINE.—Make your black grenadine by hints in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 18, Vol. VI.

S. S. H.—Mantles are sometimes made of the dress material, but a black cashmere wrap is more stylish, and more economical, as it serves with all dresses. Velvet will be much used for trimming all through the summer.

M. K. H.—Your questions are answered in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 21, Vol. VI. White strings to widows' bonnets are not worn. Black ribbon or crape strings fasten under the chin.

AN OLD READER.—Lumps of white wax placed about in your box, and the whole covered with white oiled silk, is the most probable plan for preventing your white satin turning yellow; but there is no sure plan, as much depends on the fabric itself. Your browned lace is merely soiled. The French scourers here restore point appliqué and other laces to their first beauty by steaming them, and by what is called dry pressure.

MRS. W. M. W.—Satin and guipure lace are not used here for trimming grenadines. Black repped silk pipings are preferred, also fringe, thread lace, jet, and watered ribbon sashes. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 18, Vol. VI., for further hints. Figured grenadines all black are preferred to plain ones.

MRS. S. A. H.—We have three cut paper patterns of wrappers—the gored wrapper, a Watteau, and a sacque wrapper. These do not draw when the arms are raised, as you fear.

E. A. N.—Upholster your wooden mantel with the lambrequin draperies now in fashion. Use chintz for chambers, with heavy reps for parlors and dining-room.—Guipure lace sacques are very fashionable.

MRS. L. M.—Get the darkest shade of brown in your striped silk and make a sleeveless jacket by our cut paper pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. VI. Sacques simply scalloped are worn by girls of four years.

MOTHER.—Get a Normandy cap of Swiss muslin with colored silk lining for your six-year-old daughter.

E. W. B.—The Worth over-skirt pattern has been sent you. Side sashes are usually but not always pendent from a belt. They are bias silk, or else the dress material, put in two or three long loops with two longer ends, and are attached to the side seam of the over-skirt. Sometimes a swinging piece extends from the right to the left and puffs up the skirt.

MRS. G.—Descriptions and illustrations of cut paper patterns of infant's wardrobe are in Bazar No. 35, Vol. IV.; hints about materials for such a wardrobe are also in Bazar No. 21, Vol. III. The fancy stores here sell guipure and point lace materials, and have advertised them in our columns. We can not furnish addresses.

OLD SUBSCRIBER.—The gingham over-skirt and jacket, or else white piqué made in the same way, will be pretty. Read description of Normandy caps in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 21, Vol. VI. Make the blue Chambéry by sailor suit pattern.

L. P. F.—For traveling dresses read Bazar No. 22, Vol. VI., and use the Loose Front Double-breasted Polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 23, Vol. VI.

B. B.—Read reply just given "Old Subscriber."

MRS. J. G. AND OTHERS.—Your letters were not answered in this column, but a careful reading of the New York Fashions of the last four numbers of the Bazar would have shown you that answers to your queries had been incorporated there.

C. E. C.—An article about removing stains was published in a late number of the Bazar.—The Cary sisters' memoirs were published during the holidays.

MARION F.—The Highland suit is made up in white piqué, trimmed with embroidery, or else wide braid on the jacket. The skirt is plain, with buttons on the front.

MRS. J. L. M.—Instead of Brussels net puffs you could use bands of guipure insertion, or else plain imitation guipure set in smoothly. A lining would destroy the light effect of the lace. Wear your polonaise over a high or low dress waist. A dress with brocaded grenadine flounces would be suitable for afternoon and dinner, but not for the street. Get white organdy for a polonaise and trim with insertion let in and lace, either Mechlin or Valenciennes. If insertion is too expensive, use organdy puffs with colored ribbon run through them. White yak and guipure insertion polonaises striped with black or with colored velvet are very dressy; also sleeveless jackets made in the same way.

TIRESOME.—As you did not give your address the paper has not been sent you. Dark blue is as stylish as brown. Get a gray foulard polonaise, or else a sleeveless jacket to wear with your blue dress. Your changeable silk is out of style. If dyed black it would be useful as foundation for a grenadine suit, but would hardly serve for any thing else.

THE BEST FOOD FOR SUMMER.

F. E. SMITH & Co.'s Crushed White Wheat, Atlantic Flour Mills, Brooklyn, is really an invaluable preparation. It is rapidly becoming an indispensable article of household food in almost every family. For children and invalids it is simply excellent, and as a wholesome summer food for all it is unequaled. The well-known chemical value of whole wheat preparations when properly manufactured, together with the reputation of the mills of the above firm, should be sufficient to induce all to give this article a trial. It is sold by nearly every grocer in New York and adjacent cities. —[Brooklyn Union.]

EVERY mother who has a crying baby, or children subject to croup and stomach-complaints, can rely upon Castoria to keep the child well and give it rest. There are but few nurses in New York who do not use Castoria. It should be in every house.—[Com.]

TAKE YOUR DYEING AND CLEANING to the New York Dyeing and Printing Establishment, Staten Island; 98 Duane St., 752 Broadway, and 610 Sixth Ave., New York; 164 and 166 Pierrepont St., Brooklyn; 40 North Eighth St., Philadelphia. No other offices.—[Com.]

AN ABSOLUTE TEST OF EXCELLENCE.—The truest test of excellence in a sewing-machine is, after all, the record of its sales. The manufacture of the Wilson Improved Under-Feed Machine employs an immense manufactory and nearly five hundred skilled workmen. The machines are turned out at the rate of from eighteen hundred to two thousand per week, and are sold faster than they can be made. The factory is pushed from day to day with orders. There is nothing strange in all this when we consider that it is a first-class, perfect machine, capable of any class of work, good for twenty years' constant service, and costing $15 less than the other first-class machines. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

Button-hole Worker.
Pat. June 27, 1871. Awarded first premium at the Am. Institute and Md. Institute Fairs, 1871.

It is one of the most important inventions of the age. The most perfect Button-hole Worker ever invented! So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Every stitch is taken with the most perfect mechanical accuracy. Is used entirely independent of the sewing machine, and will last a lifetime. Does away with pricking the fingers, straining the eyes and with imperfect and irregular worked button-holes. They give universal satisfaction. Ladies who use them say that they are worth their weight in gold. Over eleven thousand sold during the first week of their introduction. Local and traveling agents wanted everywhere. They sell at sight, and give over 100 per cent. profit. For Sale by LEADING RETAILERS and JOBBERS.
THE ORTOLAN.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:
1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.
2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.
3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.
4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.
NOTICE.
Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

FACETIÆ.

HOLD YOUR WHIST.—Playing-cards are sometimes made with rounded corners, with a view, we suppose, to avoid sharping.

A certain French baron, whose scientific tastes led him to collect the skulls of celebrated persons, one day received a visit from a man with whom he was accustomed to deal.

"What do you bring me here?" asked the baron, as the man slowly unwrapped a carefully enveloped package.

"The skull of Shakspeare."

"Impossible!"

"I speak the truth, monsieur le baron. Here is proof of what I say," said the dealer, producing some papers.

"But," replied the baron, drawing aside the drapery which concealed his own singular collection, "I already possess that skull."

"He must have been a rogue who sold you that," was the remark of the honest dealer. "Who was it, monsieur?"

"Your father," said the baron, in a mild tone; "he sold it to me about twenty-nine years ago."

The broker was for a moment disconcerted, then exclaimed, with vivacity,

"I comprehend. Be good enough to observe the small dimensions of the skull on your shelf. Remark the narrow occiput, the undeveloped forehead, where intelligence is still mute. It is of Shakspeare certainly, but of Shakspeare as a child about twelve or fourteen years old; whereas this is that of Shakspeare when he had attained a certain age and had become the great genius of which England is so justly proud."

The baron bought the second head.

ROMANTIC NONSENSE.—It is pretty well understood that there is a large and influential section of the community—unmarried ladies looking out for a settlement, an establishment, a position—who do not agree with the author of a modern poem, that Love is Enough. Many other things, they say, are wanted besides—such as a town and a country house, a carriage or two, saddle-horses, some creditable jewelry, perhaps a box at the opera, and, above all, plenty of pin-money.

THE NOMENCLATURE OF FICTION.—Is a new class of titles for novels coming into vogue? Or are the novels themselves going to be meteorological, like our conversation? It looks so, when we see advertised, the one under the other, Wild Weather and Bright Morning. Plenty more names of the same sort could be suggested—The Rainy Day, April Showers, Something in the Wind, Angry Clouds, All in a Fog, A Storm Brewing, etc.

CONGRUOUS COUPLES.

If there's a well-matched pair in married life,
It is a horsey man and nagging wife.

COMPLIMENTARY.

ARTIST. "Well, you see, I got into a rage, and took out the ten principal figures, all the sky, and most of the background."

FRIEND. "What a wonderful improvement, to be sure!"

UNACCOUNTABLE.

VISITOR. "Halloa, Snipp! going in for dumb-bells?"

SNIPP. "Yes; but I am bothered if I can make them out. I have been practicing all the morning, and I can't use them half so well as when I first began. Don't tell me that practice makes perfect after that."

SCIENCE GOSSIP.—Botanists have observed that the language of flowers is not a faculty developed alike in all blossoms. Some possess it more than others. For instance, flowers of speech have it to a remarkable extent.

Why does the present style of ladies' dresses remind one of the autumn?—Because of the loose sleeves (loose leaves).

An Irish doctor wants to know where he can procure a second-hand watch new!

"What are you about, my dear?" said a grandmother to a little boy, who was idling about the room and casting furtive glances at a gentleman who was paying a visit.

"I am trying, grandma, to steal papa's hat out of the room without letting the gentleman see it, for papa wants him to think he's out."

A wag, speaking of a blind wood-sawyer, says that "while none ever saw him see, thousands have seen him saw."

QUERY.—Is there more spring about a leap-year than any other year?

Two ministerial candidates for a vacant pulpit, named Adam and Low, having to preach on the same Sunday, Low, who preached in the morning, took for his text, "Adam, where art thou?" In the evening Adam gave his return shot by selecting for his text, "Lo, here am I."

A gentleman being asked if his neighbor's dog was a hunter, said he was half hunter and half setter—that he hunted until he found a bone, and then sat down to eat it.

The young married man who found himself at the theatre the other evening with feet incased in steel-colored boots, from a liberal application of stove-blacking in the dark, wants to know "how long this house-cleaning is going to last, anyhow."

TEACHER. "John, you young scape-grace, come here and I'll pay you back for your impudence to me yesterday."

PUPIL. "I have conscientious scruples against taking back pay of that sort."

AFTERNOON TEA.

STUDY OF A BASHFUL MAN, WHO HAS PRIVATELY TOLD AN AMUSING STORY TO THE HOST, AND HAS BEEN REQUESTED BY HIM TO REPEAT IT ALOUD FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE COMPANY. WE HAVE TRIED TO DEPICT THE WRETCHED INDIVIDUAL AT THE PRECISE MOMENT WHEN, HAVING MANAGED TO STAMMER THROUGH TWO-THIRDS OF HIS ANECDOTE (WHICH IS RATHER LONG), HE BECOMES CONSCIOUS, ALL OF A SUDDEN, THAT HE HAS COMPLETELY FORGOTTEN THE POINT.

TROUBLES OF OUR CHARITABLE PEOPLE.

MR. GOODMAN (chairman of soup-kitchen committee). "How is it that you did not come for your Soup to-day, Mrs. Smith?"

MRS. SMITH. "Well, Sir, there wasn't no taste in it last Week; and they tell me there be hardly enough Seasoning in it to-day!"

SELF-SACRIFICE.

BOY. "Teacher, there's a Gal over there a-Winkin' at me!"

TEACHER. "Well, then, don't Look at her."

BOY. "But if I don't Look at her, she'll Wink at Somebody else!"

A young man in a suburban town sent off his first postal card on Thursday morning. After writing a message on the back he inclosed it in an envelope, clapped on a three-cent stamp, and dropped it into the post-office, remarking that it was a very handy arrangement, and should have been introduced years ago.

The most accommodating man we ever saw, says the Danbury News, was he who was the captain of a steamship which plied between New York and Port Royal during the war. One day a soldier lost his cap overboard and went to the captain about it. The old gentleman said it was impossible to stop the vessel to recover it, but he kindly offered to make a mark on the rail where it went overboard, and get it when he came back.

A school-boy remarks that when his teacher undertakes to show him what is what, he only finds out which is switch.

TOBACCO DANCES.—Tobacco dances are the last things in Virginia, says a Southern paper. We remember attending a tobacco dance twenty years ago, when our father caught us smoking a "penny mild un" in the back garden. St. Vitus never began to step so lively as we did.

FOND OF "LOO."—A mild and affectionate wife in Lancaster overheard an acquaintance remark that her husband was too fond of loo. She waited up for him that night, and when he came home demanded to know if he had been spending his time with "Loo." The unsuspecting husband admitted that he had, when, without giving him time to explain, she went at him with a fire-shovel. The husband does not exactly remember how the interview ended, but he could never convince his wife that "loo" was a game at cards, and always plays whist now, and gets home before ten o'clock.

A TRUTH.—The surest way to lose your health is to drink other people's.

DOUBLE ENTRY.

"Mr. James, how do you keep your books?"
"Oh, by double entry."
"Double entry—how's that?"
"Easy enough. I make one entry and father makes another."

IMMERSION.—When may a man be said to be literally immersed in his business?—When giving a swimming lesson.

A LEGAL POINT.—A jury once returned into court in order that one of their number might be instructed upon the following point of law: "If I believe that the evidence is one way, and the other eleven believe different, does that justify any other juryman in knocking me down with a chair?"

REPAIRS.—A rich old fellow in a provincial town, who owns more houses than any one man in the place, was waited upon by a committee for a subscription to rebuild the fence about the cemetery. His reply was characteristic as well as humorous. "Gentlemen, I have always made it a rule in my business never to make any repairs until the tenants begin to complain."

A CHILD'S PRAYER—Sweets.

PROVERB AND PRESCRIPTION.

That "what's enough for one's enough for two,"
The saying is but in a measure true;
That is, a physiologist might say,
For each, of his or her three meals a day.

When is a man likely to be done brown?—When his friends toast him.

"I'm awfully screwed," as the hair said to the curl-paper.

The latest problem for civil engineers is to make one of the keys of a piano fit the lock of a canal.

On a recent trip of one of the Illinois river packets, a light draught one, as there were only two feet of water in the channel, the passengers were startled by the cry of "Man overboard!" The steamer was stopped, and preparations were made to save him, when he was heard exclaiming, "Go ahead with your old steamboat! I'll walk behind you."

A STRANGE INCIDENT.

A Pennsylvania woman, who has for years been afflicted with a cancer, and has been treated by eminent physicians without obtaining relief, dreamed that a stranger came to her house and gave her some medicines, saying that they would effectually cure her. Next day, on going to the door and looking out, she saw the identical man of her dreams approaching the house. He offered her a bottle of medicine to cure her cancer. She took it, followed his directions, and is now—as bad as ever.

"Lame!" sighed Mrs. Partington. "Here I have been sufferin' the bigamies of death for three mortal weeks. First I was seized with a bleedin' phrenology in the hampshire of the brain, which was exceeded by the stoppage of the left ventilator of the heart. This gave me inflammation of the left borax, and now I am sick with the chloroform morbus. There is no blessin' like that of health, particularly when you're ill."

MORBID MEN—Auctioneers.

A grocer asked an artist, "Is sculpture difficult?"

The artist replied, "Why, bless you, no. You have only to take a block of marble, a mallet and a chisel, and knock off all the marble you don't want."

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 26.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 28, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Chip Spanish Gypsy Bonnet.

THE revers of this white chip hat are bound with bias strips of black gros grain. The trimming consists of black lace two inches wide, a tulle scarf, bows of blue ribbon two inches and three-quarters wide, and a spray of pink roses and forget-me-nots. Black marceline lining, and strings of blue gros grain ribbon.

FERNERIES.

IN our last number we described the manner of constructing large fernery. For smaller grounds a simple rock bed is made by first depositing a heap of coal ashes and bits of broken crockery as a foundation and for drainage; then, upon these, a good layer of leaf mould and sandy loam. Upon this mound begin to rear your rock-work, placing the stones so as to have good spaces for soil between them; in the centre the clump or root of a tree may be placed to advantage, and delicate climbers, or perhaps a balsam apple, planted so as to ramble over it. When the rocks are placed in position, and the interstices well filled in, begin transplanting your ferns with great care, lest the crowns become injured or the roots broken. Place them also in the positions best suited to their individual habits, but always give them a good depth of earth, where they can draw up moisture from below. Those that are planted higher up will, of course, need more frequent watering in summer, and a slight protection during the winter.

In planting ferns of all kinds it is well to remember that they do best in coarse-grained, not sifted, soil, except perhaps for seedlings which are being started under glass. A very tasteful addition to the plants of this rock bed will be a few roots of our common evergreen ivy, which will flourish beautifully, and cling to the stones over which it clambers just as upon a wall.

Another design for a fernery in a small front-yard will be to build up a kind of pillar of rock-work, formed of old bricks or stones, whichever may be most convenient to obtain, leaving numerous openings on all sides, into which the ferns are to be planted, also tradescantia, saxifrage, or any other hanging plant, a bunch of handsome wall-ferns, such as maiden-hair, forming a graceful tuft to crown the top. If in a very shady, damp place, the bricks will soon become green and mossy, which will greatly improve the general effect.

There are also to be had at the flower and seed stores very elegant vases and pillars of terra cotta, intended for the same purpose, which will have the double advantage of ornamenting the garden in summer, and may be removed into the parlor and placed under glass as a winter arrangement. They are, of course, more expensive than the coarse brick or stone structures of which we first spoke; but for persons who do not need to consider this question they will be much more desirable and ornamental; and when planted with very choice ferns, Kenilworth ivy, lycopodiums, etc., will be beautiful indeed.

We have a friend who is such a dear lover of ferns that she has inclosed a corner on the north side of her house expressly as a winter fernery. Here she has arranged her rockery, and planted it with all the hardy and half-hardy varieties of American and British ferns, and here she has a never-failing garden of beauty and greenness the year round. From the ceiling hang rustic baskets and vases, formed of cocoa-nut shells pierced with many holes, and wire baskets made of common horse muzzles, all filled with delicate ferns, which have not only covered the tops, but have pushed their crowns through the holes, until the whole look like hanging bunches of greens. In the corners are placed vases and pots, planted with all sorts of shade-loving things: begonias, ivy, and many varieties of lycopodium, while up the sides creeps the lovely climbing fern, with its pedate leaves so delicately veined, and its wreaths of spores, or seeds, from which you may possibly propagate the plant—though this is a very difficult and uncertain method, except in the hands of experts.

According to the best authorities, there are two methods of increasing and propagating the different species of ferns—by dividing the roots, and by seeds, or spores, as the fern seeds are called. To describe the former: Take any ordinary variety of fern, in the spring, just at the time when the fronds begin to rise from the ground, and laying it upon a table, you will see that there are numerous little offsets, all of which are ready to form into new plants. A sharp knife will enable you to separate them without injuring the little roots belonging to each crown. These are perfect plants, ready to be set into small pots, or into a bed prepared for the purpose. And next we must give attention to the kind of soil, and study the manner of potting them; for the most healthy plants may be lost if that part of the business is misunderstood.

Mix the soil in somewhat the following proportions: one part yellow sandy loam, one part well-decayed black leaf mould, one part silver sand, and one part old rotted sod with the fibres still there. Have ready a quantity of broken earthenware to serve as drainage; and then, having mixed the soil well, proceed to place in the bottom a layer of the crockery, then a layer of the grassy fibre, and then a little of the finer mixed soil. Into that lay your fern root, holding it upright with the left hand, while with the right you sprinkle in the soil until the roots are well covered. Press down the soil about the plant with the fingers until it is firmly fixed, and place it in a position to be sheltered from the sun, giving it a daily watering with a fine rose on the spout of the watering-pot. That will water them thoroughly—fronds, roots, and all—without the danger of washing the roots. This is all the attention they will need until about the 1st of September, when they will require to be shifted into larger pots—the roots having by this time quite filled the small space allotted them. If you design them for a winter fernery, they should be brought in before there has been a touch of frost—or, at least, be protected at night by a spread of hay or straw, that can be removed in the morning. Even those which are to be left out-of-doors all winter it is well to water occasionally, and to keep them covered with a bed of leaves or with a layer of straw, as by these simple means the fronds are found to open much earlier than others which are left to themselves.

If you are desirous of starting a winter fern-case for your parlor, it should be prepared and planted in July or August at latest, so that the little roots may become well established before fall. A fern-case may be made rectangular in form, having glass sides and top, and the whole made to set loosely into a pan several inches deep, or it may be formed of a bell-glass shade set into a round pan—whichever may be most convenient to obtain, but in either case it is important that they fit loosely in their respective pans, as the expansion of the air underneath will be very apt to break them if tightly held. The pans should be about six inches deep, and lined with zinc—the compost prepared by mixing good garden soil, three parts, silver sand, one part, charcoal dust, one part, with crockery bits in the bottom for drainage. This compost, well mixed but not sifted, will be the best possible for planting the young ferns, and will suit all kinds that you will be likely to collect.

Among those that will be beautiful for this purpose are the smaller varieties of polypodium, maiden-hair (Adiantum), asplenium, athyrium, lycopodium, lastrea, lygodium, scolopendrium, davallia, and woodwardia. Of these family names of ferns there are many varieties, some natives of this country, and others of England, but most of them are easy of cultivation.

CHIP SPANISH GYPSY BONNET.

BUTTERFLY IMPRESSIONS.

CHOOSE the brightest specimens, perfect and uninjured by catching. If alive, a drop of alcohol will cause death very speedily. Then clip off the wings, and lay them on clean paper in the natural position, leaving the proper space between for the body. Now spread a coat of clean gum water on another piece of paper, and laying it over them, press slightly on the wings so that they will adhere. The body is to be drawn and painted between these wings. The wings themselves may be left on the paper, or, if laid face downward, may be removed before they are tight, and the distinct impression will remain, with all the fine down and velvety marks, impossible for any painting to imitate.

WAITING.

THE first glad day of summer saw our parting;
Our hopes were vague, our words were very few;
I murmured—from your passionate hold upstarting—
"I'll wait for you!"
Ah! I was young; the world was all before me;
My love should make life beautiful and true.
I said, when passionate parting pains came o'er me,
"There is so much to do!"
Come home! dearest, come home!

The summer waned, and anguish fell upon me,
Such heavy loss as wears the strength away;
And for a time its greatness seemed to stun me,
And so I lay
Weak and bewildered, with one wish forever
Haunting my nights and shadowing my days—
That I might fall upon your breast, ah! never
My head therefrom to raise.
Come home! dearest, come home!

A homesick child, lost in the dreary gloaming—
Such lone estate is haply like to mine;
My eyes are weary waiting for your coming,
My sun is slow to shine!
Do you remember, dear, that charméd season
When your strong arm upheld my faltering feet;
When life was set to rhyme unchilled by reason,
And oh, so wondrous sweet?
Come home! dearest, come home!

The red-leaved glories of the ripening autumn,
Sun-diamonds flashing on a dimpling sea,
These pleased me once; these now I cast no thought on:
You are away from me!
And I am very weary of this sorrow.
Where are you, oh, my best-belovéd friend?
And must I ask to-morrow and to-morrow?
And what shall be the end?
Come home! dearest, come home!

I know too well, unless some cheering token
Comes o'er the sea. I am not less than brave;
But Want and Doubt and Toil, uncheered, unbroken,
Lead swiftly to the grave.
Yet you are dearer far to me than heaven,
And while you live I feel I can not die:
Pray the dear God will smooth what is uneven,
And bring you by-and-by!
Come home! dearest, come home!

I live my life as you would have me live it
If you were here, and earth were glorified;
For you will turn again—I do believe it—
And seek my side.
When you come back you'll find me worthier loving—
Pain and Endeavor keep us pure and true—
And oh! remember in your farthest roving,
I wait for you!
Come home! dearest, come home!

A MITIGATION OF STEP-MOTHERHOOD.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

TO the general truth that the marriage of two people concerns only themselves there is a single exception. When either has, by a previous marriage, children who have arrived at the age of discretion, and who are not established in separate families, the marriage should not take place without their consent. Any one may make a marriage which shall be disgraceful to his parents and his brothers and sisters. But while this is very provoking, and justifies his family in withdrawing from his association, should that be the wisest course, it is of a different sort from the folly and perversity which involves children in trouble. A man's duty to his father is of a far less intimate kind than his duty to his children. Moreover, though he makes a match displeasing to his father, it very much less affects that father's daily life. He takes the objectionable wife to his own house. His father and mother need never meet her. It is but an outside matter, a mere affection of reputation, a vexation by proxy. But to his children it is a sore evil, and of long and daily and hourly continuance. I have seen the father of a respectable family live for years happily in his widowed home. His daughters, under the loving hand of an accomplished relative, grew up every thing that a father's heart could wish. And that father, tempted by the devil, and aided and abetted thereby, suddenly became enamored of a fierce, unprincipled, powerful woman, who speedily set his house by the ears, drove his daughters out of it, and himself into crime and woe which will not end with his life. Daughters may be foolish, and prejudiced against step-mothers in general, and a step-mother in particular; but they are daughters, existing by and for his will and pleasure, and not their own, and he should be lenient even to their folly, and heedful even of their prejudice. He has no right to introduce discord into their home and unhappiness into their life in the shape of a woman who is not needed, and whom he would bring not for their good, but for his own. The first time he had a right to consult himself, but this time his children should be consulted, and if they may not have the full appointing power, they at least should have the right of veto. If they are more than properly and naturally reluctant, if they are unreasonable and selfish, he is the right one to bear the penalty, for he should have brought them up better. If he has succeeded so ill with the children of one marriage, it is of very little consequence that he is prevented from making another.

In all cases of discord in these foreign alliances the sympathy of society, both in and out of fairy stories, is with the children and against the mother; and this is well, though it works harshly sometimes. But it should always be remembered that the children are the helpless, the ignorant, the passive party, while the woman is a mature and free agent. The little children are simply handed over to a stranger and an alien—and I refer now only to the families of little children who are not old enough to make assent or dissent intelligently. If a woman allies herself to a family of grown children without their cordial welcome, she deserves all the trouble she encounters. But even where there are little ones, she is not a little one, and the sympathy of society is justly with the weak and not with the strong. Nor is the tenderness, the humanity, of woman so overpoweringly predominant in this relation as to make the prejudice against it wholly a prejudice. While we have all seen many who discharged its duties with fidelity and warm affection, and who were beloved and honored as they deserved, it is not to the credit of woman that so many have but an indifferent success. If there is any thing which would enlist all the pity and indulgence of a feeling heart, it is the little children from whom a mother has been torn away. If, in addition to this, a woman loves their father, how is it possible that she should not have in them a quick vital interest, should not be instinctively and jealously alive to their comfort, their welfare, their happiness? Suppose the children are very trying, peevish, imperious, quarrelsome, or even false? Still they are the children of her husband, his body and soul, and though she can not have for them the very mother's love, it would seem that her love for him should overshadow and embrace all that are his. Sometimes it is an aunt, or a sister, or a cousin who feeds the flames of revolt in the younger members. In that case let the step-mother ruthlessly and promptly trample aunt, sister, and cousin under foot. A bad woman will do it for the sake of abusing her step-children with impunity. Shall a good woman hesitate to do it for the sake of training them to harmony and amiability and virtue and grace? Whoever comes between a woman and her husband or her children should be sacrificed. If she can not be converted, she should be banished. And when a woman has the whole field to herself, with all the sway which love gives her over her husband, and which superiority of education, position, and wisdom gives her over the children, it would seem as if a heart of ordinary sensibility and a head of ordinary sense might conquer even their prejudice, secure their allegiance, and command the situation.

But the situation is no joke, nor is any foolish talking or jesting convenient concerning it. There is much badinage about marriage and its preliminaries which is not too delicate or too seemly; but in the heyday of life, when the young man and maiden have not yet passed out of their frolicsome and buoyant youth, or eaten of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, much may be pardoned, much condoned, and much may even be allowed to foam and sparkle away in merry banter. But I know nothing more undignified, indecorous, I may say indecent and repulsive, than for the husband of a dead wife or the wife of a dead husband to be indulging in joke and repartee and trivial talk about prospective or possible match-making. Thoughtless friends will sometimes do it, but the iron is not supposed to have entered into their souls. The surviving partner of a sundered marriage is in truth what the old grave-stones grimly record—a relict. Never do I hear them speaking lightly of fresh ties but I see a dead face, white and fixed, a stark form cold under the coffin-lid. This is a silent partner, who may not be consulted, but who can not be forgotten, and whose shadowy presence should banish frivolity. I say not that the second marriage may not be as real as the first, may not even be more real, more complete, the only perfect union. But even so, the way to it lay through the gates of the grave, which silence and reverence beseem.

FAMILY COOKING.

BY PIERRE BLOT.—V.

TOMATO SOUP.—For this excellent soup the proportions are, seven or eight middling-sized tomatoes, three pints of broth, four or five stalks of parsley, two of thyme, salt, pepper, a tea-spoonful of pepper-corns, a bay leaf, two onions, three cloves, and three or four cloves of garlic, a quarter of a pound of rice, a table-spoonful of butter, one ounce of sugar, three slices of bread. The tomatoes are put in boiling water for a few seconds, taken off and dropped into cold water, and then skinned. They are put in a saucepan, and set on a moderate fire with the broth, parsley, salt, pepper, and the following spices tied in a linen rag: thyme, pepper-corns, bay leaf, onions, and cloves. When cooked, the whole is turned into a colander (with the exception of the spices in the rag) and forced through with a potato-masher, except the tomato seeds; then the strained juice and pulp are mixed with the rice; after it has been boiled the butter and sugar are added. The whole is simmered for about half an hour, and turned into the soup dish. While it is simmering the slices of bread are cut in dice and fried with a little butter, and put in the soup tureen before turning the mixture therein. Cover it for two minutes, and serve.

Lobster Soup, or Bisque.—This makes an excellent soup. The proportions are, two three-pound lobsters, three ounces of butter, two quarts of broth, and eight ounces of bread. Boil the lobsters as we directed in a preceding number, and after having removed the dark bluish vein and the stomach, cut the head off about half an inch back of the eyes; put the flesh of the tail aside, and pound the rest well—shell, small and large claws, and all that is in the body shell. It is then put in a saucepan with the butter, and stirred until the butter is melted; then a quart of broth is added, and the whole simmered for about fifteen minutes. The mixture is turned into a strainer, all the liquid is pressed out of it, and is set back on the fire with the toasted bread for a few minutes. The whole is then turned into a colander, and forced through with a potato-masher. About another quart of broth is added, a few minutes' boiling are given, and it is ready to use. Put in the soup tureen some bread cut in dice and fried in butter, and also the coral part of the lobster, chopped, and about a quarter of a pound of the flesh of the lobsters, also cut in dice. Turn the above mixture on the whole, and serve. What is left of the flesh is made into lobster-salad.

Sauces.—The majority of sauces are all commenced in the same way. When the butter and flour are thoroughly mixed and cooked as explained in a preceding number, the sauce is more than half made; the rest of the work is comparatively easy. The most inexperienced housekeeper will be able to make almost any sauce after two or three experiments.

White Sauce.—The proportions for this sauce are, two ounces of butter, one table-spoonful of flour, a yolk of egg, salt, and white pepper. A white sauce is the basis of several others, as will be seen below. It is made in this way: When the flour is cooked, as directed, with the butter, and as soon as it turns yellowish, pour into the pan about a pint of boiling water, little by little, stirring briskly the while with a wooden spoon; take from the fire when it is getting thick; beat a yolk of egg with half a table-spoonful of cold water, put it into the pan with salt and white pepper, mix it well with the rest, and you have an excellent sauce. A little grated nutmeg and vinegar, or lemon juice, are added, if liked. Lemon juice is better than vinegar when the sauce is used with fish. The cooking of the flour is done on a rather sharp fire, which is had by removing the cover of the stove or range; and by putting the cover back to its place a good or moderate fire is obtained, and by placing the pan on the corner of the range you have a slow fire.

Béchamel Sauce is made exactly like a white sauce, with the exception that milk is used instead of water.

Cream Sauce.—This is also made like a white sauce, with the exception that cream is used instead of water.

Blonde Sauce.—Broth is used for this sauce instead of water, and the rest of the process is the same as for a white sauce.

Lobster Sauce.—Add two or three table-spoonfuls of the flesh of boiled lobster, chopped, to a white sauce.

Shrimp Sauce.—Boil and clean a quart of shrimps, remove the shells, chop the flesh, and add it to a white sauce.

Oyster Sauce.—Blanch a pint or so of oysters, mix them with a white sauce, add lemon juice to suit the taste, and the sauce is made.

Mussel Sauce.—When the mussels are boiled and thoroughly cleaned, chop about a pint of them, and mix with a white sauce, adding lemon juice to taste.

Caper Sauce.—When the white sauce is made, add to it one, two, or three table-spoonfuls of capers, either whole or chopped.

Celery Sauce.—Blanch a few stalks of celery, chop them rather fine, and add them to a white sauce, giving just one boil after the celery is in.

Cucumber Sauce.—Chop fine a table-spoonful of pickled cucumbers, mix them with a white sauce, give one boil, and it is ready.

Egg Sauce.—Chop two or more hard-boiled eggs, mix them with a white sauce, and serve.

Mushroom Sauce.—It is made with either fresh or preserved mushrooms. A table-spoonful or more is chopped and mixed with a white sauce; then boil for half a minute, and it is done.

Truffle Sauce.—Made like the above, using truffles instead of mushrooms.

Fines Herbes Sauce.—This sauce is made with parsley and chives, or parsley and shallots; but if neither chives nor shallots can be had, as is often the case in the country, it is made with parsley and onions. A table-spoonful (more or less, according to taste) of both is chopped rather fine and mixed with a white sauce. They are used raw, and as much of the one as of the other. When mixed with the sauce, give two minutes' boiling, stirring the while, and the sauce is made.

Maître d'Hôtel Sauce.—This name is given to the mixture used with broiled fish or broiled meat, and is composed of butter, chopped parsley, and lemon juice when for fish, but vinegar instead of lemon juice may be used when it is to be served with meat.

Beurre Noir, or Brown Butter.—This is used with fish, calf's brains, etc., and is made thus: Two ounces of butter are set on a brisk fire in a frying-pan, and fried until of a dark brown color, then two or three stalks of parsley are dropped in, and fried a few seconds only, and then taken off by means of a skimmer. The butter is put away in a bowl. Half a pint of vinegar is boiled in the same pan for two or three minutes, with a pinch of pepper, and turned over the butter. The whole is heated when wanted, and turned over the fish, etc.

Veal.—We have explained before how to select veal, and described the pieces best suited for roasting, stewing, etc. In whatever way veal is cooked it should always be overdone. A fricandeau of veal is an excellent dish. Amateurs of veal are delighted when the veal season comes. We do not think that the reason why a fricandeau is so much relished (although it really deserves it) is because it has been devised by a king (Charles IX. of France), for we have seen many a person with honest and strong republican proclivities do the same justice to a fricandeau as the most royally inclined individual could do. Sorrel makes its appearance at the same time with veal. Having been kept under glass, or under salt hay or manure, during the winter, it begins to grow as soon as the first rays of the spring sun strike upon it.

Composition of a fricandeau: A piece cut across the leg of veal about six-eighths of an inch thick (such a piece weighs from two to three and a half pounds, according to the size of the calf), a quarter of a pound of salt pork for three pounds of veal, two quarts of sorrel, three ounces of butter, half a pint of broth, three or four stalks of parsley, two of thyme, one onion and one carrot, both sliced, a tea-spoonful of pepper-corns, and a bay leaf.

Process: Procure a larding needle, the same size as used for birds, and which can be had for twenty-five or thirty cents from any house-furnishing store; cut the salt pork in slices first, then in square fillets, of a size to fit the needle, and about two inches long; lard one side of the piece of veal thus: The meat is held in the left hand, then the needle is run through the meat for a length of about one inch and two-eighths of an inch deep, commencing near the edge of no matter what side, and running it toward the centre; when the needle is thus planted, insert a fillet of salt pork into it, then pull the needle off so that the fillet stays inside of the meat, both ends of it sticking out. Repeat that process until the whole side of the piece of veal be covered with the fillets, which should be about two-eighths of an inch apart. Spread two ounces of butter on the bottom of a saucepan, put all the seasonings described above over the butter, and the piece of veal over the seasonings, the larded side up, add the broth, and set on a pretty good fire, the pan being covered. Baste now and then with the juice from the bottom of the pan. It will take from two to three hours to cook, according to size and quality. When done it is placed on a dish on which there is a purée of sorrel or spinach, the gravy poured over it through a strainer.

Hosted by Google

If there is not gravy enough, a little broth should be added to the seasonings when the meat is taken off, one boil given, and it is ready. The sorrel or spinach may be served either under the meat or on a separate dish. When boiled, the sorrel or spinach is chopped, put back on the fire, with a little butter, and stirred for a few minutes; then a little of the gravy is added, stirred into it for one minute, and the purée is ready.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

ROUND JOSEPHINE WAISTS.

THE round Josephine waist for high-necked dresses is the next change that looms up and threatens to bring the now popular basques into disfavor. The Bazar announced last fall that these waists were in vogue abroad for low evening dresses, and already leading modistes are making them for day costumes. The Josephine waist is perfectly plain, with high shoulder seams, two darts in front, side forms behind, and is cut off evenly around the waist, and worn with a broad belt, often three inches wide. A high ruff and close coat sleeves finish the simple and tasteful corsage. When this waist is worn with an over-skirt, and belted, it has precisely the effect of a close-fitting polonaise; the same effect is also produced with a basque and over-skirt by concealing the basque beneath the over-skirt, and wearing a belt. This fashion is adopted by many ladies who are loath to relinquish the jaunty basque, and who are not sure that the round waist will be revived.

POINTED WAISTS.

Besides this round waist, pointed waists are also in vogue abroad for high corsages, and many newly imported dresses have a deep point in front, with round straight back. This style is very handsome for dinner dresses of silk and other heavy fabrics made with high Medici fraises. The châtelaine bodice, rounding over the hips, is gradually coming into use.

PRINCESSE DRESSES.

The most stately dresses of the season are the princesse, or, as they are promiscuously called, the empress and duchesse dresses. These were originally made with the waist and skirt in one; but the fashion that has been most successful has the back in long entire breadths from shoulder to foot, while the plain front is relieved by a basque falling just below the waist, and concealing a belt, to which the front of the skirt is attached. Worth revived this fashion, which is merely an improvement and elaboration of the simple Gabrielle. Pingat and other rival Parisian dress-makers have adopted it successfully, but some princesse dresses made here without proper models have been failures. The Bazar gave an illustration of this dress during the winter. Readers who have kept a file of last year's Bazar will find the dress we have described in No. 49, Vol. V. Sometimes the skirt is worn flowing in the house, and draped over a shorter skirt for the street. Other models have the back breadths cut like a Marguerite polonaise, with each width draped in long points, and sewed into the seams of an under-skirt.

COLORED GRENADINES.

For colored grenadines for carriage and watering-place dresses the close silken fabric, as smooth and lustrous as Chambéry gauze, is preferred to the open square meshes that are used in black. A still thicker stripe, over an inch wide, of the same shade, is a favorite pattern for these, while others have the lace stripe or polka dots, or else the clouded damask figures that came into vogue last season. Two colors appear in these dresses; the silk lining or underdress is in pretty contrasting color. Silk guipure lace of the same shade as the grenadine is placed among the flounces and as edging for ruffles. A description of a Parisian dress of this kind will give the best idea of it. It is composed of mauve silk with French gray striped grenadine and gray guipure lace. The demi-train is mauve silk. The front breadth of silk has three large loose-looped bows down the middle, while across the foot are two gray grenadine flounces, bias, gathered, with puffed heading and gray lace on the edges. These flounces extend around the skirt, and above them in the back breadths are three straight flounces almost covered with ruffles of bias grenadine. These reach to the belt. The over-skirt of grenadine, edged with a ruffle and lace, falls open from the belt in front in points on the sides, and is rounded up to the belt behind, and the space left on the tournure is covered by two wide fringed sashes of mauve silk, doubled and hanging plainly without loops. The basque, of simplest shape, is of mauve silk covered with grenadine and edged with a piping fold. The neck is cut square and low in front, and the grenadine slopes away, leaving a vest of mauve silk. Valenciennes frills inside ruffles of grenadine trim the neck and half-flowing sleeves.

BLACK GRENADINE WITH COLOR.

Black grenadines associated with colored silk are worn for afternoon and evening dresses at small entertainments, but are too gay for the street. A pretty dress for a brunette is a basque of palest pink silk, with sleeves of black grenadine, and a high black grenadine ruff showing a pink lining. The skirt has alternate pink silk and black grenadine ruffles, and a black sash with pink lining. A less conspicuous dress is of black grenadine with pale blue silk vest, blue sash, and a slight piping of blue in the hem of all the flounces. A remarkable dress from Pingat's is of serpent-colored (yellow-green) silk, with flounces and over-skirt of black grenadine, and a basque of the light silk covered with black grenadine. Up the front and around the neck are doubled silk ruffs curved outward and held in place by wire, while a still higher frill of lace surrounds the neck.

SOLID BLACK GRENADINES.

For the street, for church, and for visiting, solid black grenadines with thick stripes make the favorite costume of the summer. Dotted and damask black grenadines are also stylishly worn, but in order to be effective, they require to be handsomely made and very much trimmed. Plain silk grenadine side pleatings made straight and very narrow are used for trimming striped and figured grenadine flounces. Insertions of guipure and yak lace with edges to match are also much used, but the most perfect garniture of all is narrow thread lace ruffles very fully gathered and a heading of jet galloon, which is finest jet beads sewed on lace.

The belted polonaise is the garment preferred for street suits of grenadine. It is made slightly full, with waist and sleeves lined with silk, and is trimmed with elaborate rows of lace in front, and crocheted buttons in which jet is introduced. A high fraise and sash complete the garment. Square cuffs and large pockets are seen on some, but are scarcely appropriate for these thin dressy fabrics. Another style of grenadine polonaise very much admired has a long square vest of silk, or else moiré antique; the sides are long and deeply pointed, while the back is caught up under a sash. A bias puff of grenadine with a narrow ruffle on each side is used for trimming these. A narrow edge of lace adds much to the light and pretty effect of the puff; for this purpose many imported dresses have the French imitation thread lace. The high ruff of grenadine, silk, or black lace worn outside of a white lace fraise is obligatory to complete its perfect style. The skirts worn with these polonaises are of black silk, trimmed with grenadine puffs and flounces. Skirts of grenadine are seldom seen, and in many cases the flounces are also of silk instead of grenadine; such silk skirts are thus rendered useful for wearing with various polonaises. Bias striped flounces, edged with straight side pleatings and headed by puffs, are the most fashionable skirt trimmings. Another pretty fashion is to cover the three silk front breadths with five or seven loose lengthwise puffs that widen gradually toward the flounce at the foot; the back breadths are then flounced. Very pretty skirts also have clusters of lapping narrow flounces, three in a group, with a ruffle of thread lace between each cluster. Striped silk grenadines of excellent quality and three-quarters wide may be bought for $1 25 a yard; cheaper grades are apt to turn brown by wearing, and the mixed cotton and wool grenadines are not worth the expense of making. The handsomest grenadines shown have thick watered stripes over an inch wide, and cost $3 50 a yard. Narrower stripes are not now the first choice, though they make up very prettily. Ready-made polonaises of the grenadine that is sold for $1 25 a yard, trimmed with a very little yak lace, cost $40. Handsome grenadine suits cost from $75 to $125.

GRENADINE HOUSE DRESSES.

House dresses of grenadine are made with a basque and over-skirt, or else the newer round Josephine waist. The basque is lined throughout with thick silk, and requires no inner lining; its edge is simply finished with a piping of silk; the postilion pleats behind are pressed flatly their whole length, precisely like those in riding-habits, and held down by two rows of buttons. Leads are put in the postilion to add to its weight and keep it in place. Although the edge of the basque is very plain, the bosom and shoulders have an elaborate ruff and puff of the grenadine, beginning at the waist in front and extending up around the back of the neck. Valenciennes lace is placed up the front, and another row stands in full pleats around the neck. The coat sleeves have double frills of grenadine and lace, and the basque is completed by bows of watered silk in the front and back, and also on the sleeves. Black silk sashes with colored silk facings are very stylish with all black grenadines. Sashes grow wider continually, and are finished by fringe tied and knotted on the edges.

Pretty fraises of black silk, lined with pink, blue, or buff, and finished by a bow in front, are much worn with black and with white dresses.

WHITE PRINCESSE ROBES.

White satin jean and piqué dresses for house wear are being made in the princesse style. They are trimmed up the front breadths with the new bands of tucks and hem-stitching, or else they are elaborately embroidered. Open-worked English embroidery and the closer polka dots, vines, and tufted needle-work are the trimmings. Very sheer French nansook dresses are also made in this shape, and trimmed with box-pleatings of the fabric set on wide bands of wash net. A Napoleon blue sash of watered ribbon brightens up the dress; bows of very pale and very dark blue mixed ribbon are placed down the entire front and on the elbows.

SUMMER EVENING DRESSES.

Evening dresses for summer balls and hops are made of two shades of gossamer tulle, or else of tarlatan. For instance, two shades of rose-colored tulle appear in one dress. The low Josephine waist is of the darkest shade, covered with lengthwise puffs of lighter rose. The skirt has three front breadths covered with lengthwise puffs of the two shades alternating. The back breadths have five or else seven flounces of double tulle laid in side pleats, and are of alternating tints. A tulle sash is draped loosely about the hips, crossing high on the right side, and being caught together low down on the left with a cluster of roses of variegated hues—pink, red, deep crimson, and pale buff. For a blonde is a dress similarly made of tarlatan of palest blue with darkest ocean blue. The flounces of tarlatan were notched in saw-teeth edges and box-pleated. Two parures of flowers were provided for this dress; one was clusters of pink azaleas, and the other of large white daisies, yellow-centred, and placed in the midst of black velvet rosettes. For white muslin and white tulle dresses are garlands of convolvuli, mixed blue and pink, with embrowned leaves. Black velvet is fashionably combined with flowers in loops, rosettes, and streaming ends.

PERSONAL.

WHEN RALPH WALDO EMERSON reached Concord, on the 27th ult., his fellow-townsmen turned out in a body and escorted him to his new house, the school-children forming a prominent feature of the procession. Mr. EMERSON, in his characteristic way, thanked them for their kindness and sympathy at the return of an old man and his daughter.

—Speaking of the Bishop of Winchester ("Soapy Sam"), a London paper says: "The amount of work this prelate gets through is astonishing. On Thursday evening he lectured at the Southampton Polytechnic, on 'The Catacombs of Rome:' on Good-Friday morning he preached at St. Mary's in that town, of which his son is rector; in the afternoon he held a confirmation at Twyford, near Winchester; on Saturday morning he held a confirmation at Gosport, and in the afternoon another at Alverstoke." Bishop WILBERFORCE is now sixty-eight, and has been leading this sort of life ever since he entered the episcopate. Like WASHINGTON, WESLEY, PALMERSTON, and THIERS, he is a great rider, and when traveling through his diocese his saddle-horse always accompanies him, and his clergy are full of tales of his equestrian prowess.

—Mlle. NELLY DE MALAMARRE, who has just taken the veil, is the young lady who was at her father's residence during the war, when it was occupied by the Prussians. An officer having put his arm round her waist, she seized a knife and plunged it into his breast. A report of the affair was sent to Prince FREDERICK CHARLES, who ordered that no notice should be taken of the matter.

—Dean STANLEY has come to the front, after a certain sort, as a woman's rights man. He recently preached in London in aid of the Woman's Hospital. His text was, "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" He thought women much better spiritual directors of women "than the most dextrous priest, saintly confessor, or authoritative pontiff." Healing the sick he regarded as woman's special mission. He alluded to the late Mr. MILL, remarking how the philosophy of a master mind was touched by reverence for the woman he had loved.

—The Empress of Russia, now in Italy for the benefit of her health, writes a letter every day to the Emperor; but the good woman doesn't send it by mail—not at all. When the pleasant communication is finished she hands it to a courier, who starts with the packet, and delivers it personally into the hands of the Emperor; and eighteen of these messengers are constantly on the wing between Italy and St. Petersburg.

—The late JAMES L. REYNOLDS bequeathed $10,000 to the Chicago Association, the interest of which is to be used for the maintenance of a lady missionary to assist in the benevolent work of the association.

—Miss ELIZABETH HARRISON, one of Britain's good old maids, died recently in Sheffield, and left $300,000 to various charities.

—The ladies of the harem of the King of Siam have taken to wearing the European costume. No harem in that.

—The widow of Sir JAMES EDWARD SMITH, once president of the London Linnæan Society, recently celebrated her hundredth birthday by a dinner at Lowestoft to a hundred of the oldest of her acquaintances. They had a fine "old" time.

—The young sister of ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, who is now studying in Italy, is likely to prove one of the brightest operatic stars America has yet had to boast. Her vocal and lyrical powers, natural and acquired, are said to be of the highest order.

—EMILY FAITHFULL proposes to publish early in the fall her Impressions of America and Americans.

—Dr. CUYLER writes of a member in his church who listened to the Gospel from the lips of JOHN WESLEY, eighty-four years ago. His name is SAMUEL P. TAYLOR, and he is now ninety-five years of age.

—Mrs. GROTE, in her biography of the historian, her husband, mentions a conversation she had with some Oxford tutors in 1863 as to the influence of Mr. GROTE and JOHN STUART MILL on English university culture, and represents them as conceding that "GROTE and MILL may be said to have revived the study of the two master sciences—history and mental philosophy—among the Oxford under-graduates. A new current of ideas; new and original modes of interpreting the past; the light of fresh learning cast upon the people of antiquity: such are the impulses given by those two great teachers that our youth are completely kindled to enthusiasm toward both at the present time."

—The following citizens of Milwaukee compose the new School Board of that city. Judging from their names, we take them to be Yankees of the purest stripe: HUNDHAUSEN, KUENZLE, WASWEILER, ZEIGLER, SCHNURSTEIN, FREITAG, KÖTTING, MEINECKE, RUNCLE, OBERMANN, and TRUMPF.

—Since Mrs. CHARLES KEAN retired from the stage she so long adorned she shows her sympathy for the art by giving aid and suggestions to promising beginners. She is just now taking interest in a protégée named Miss ANNA BALDWIN, of whom something clever is expected.

—A gorgeous figure was cut by Count ANDRASSY, the Hungarian Premier, at the opening of the Vienna Exposition, and at the same time recalls the fact that twenty-five years ago the count was a refugee from the empire, a price set upon his head, and exposed to a disgraceful death. It was in 1849 that he was executed in effigy by Austrian authority, when great numbers of his compeers were banished, or forced to remain in exile, or stripped of their estates, or beheaded. The constitution of Hungary, which dated back a thousand years, was then abrogated; municipal liberties overthrown; martial law prevailed. And now ANDRASSY, the Hungarian, is one of the chief and most honored men in the grandest show ever seen in the Austrian empire.

—According to "Burleigh," the way in which Dr. STORRS, of Brooklyn, commenced to preach extemporaneously, was this: His congregation, though small, was respectable and wealthy. He found new men coming to Brooklyn and drawing large congregations, and he said that something must be the matter with himself if he could not draw. He resolved on a new departure. He laid off his gown, left his notes on his study table, and went at it. The experiment more than met his expectations, and he is now one of the most effective preachers in the country.

—The West Point cadets have just run the gauntlet of that august body called the Board of Visitors, appointed annually by the President to look into the affairs of our nascent warriors. The main thing at the "Point" is, of course, the conduct roll. If a cadet receives more than a hundred "demerits" in six months he is dismissed. The cadet is continually under the eye of a superior, who, like his shadow, is always with him, and whose business it is to report every departure from the requirements of the rules. This, in the slang vocabulary of the academy, is called "skinning." A cadet wrote this concerning the "persecution" of his "shadow:"

"He sought me out at early dawn,
While weary nature slept,
And 'skinned' me for my 'bedding down,'
Because 'I had not swept,'
Because 'my bowl was not upturned,'
For 'dirt in fire-place;'
Then with his horny finger on
My mantel tried to trace
His ugly name, and, with a sneer,
Said, 'Dusty, Mr. Case.'"

—Mr. BEECHER has been a growing man in point of salary, as he has deserved to be. From The History of Plymouth Church we learn that his salary was at first, in 1847, $1500, to be increased on the third year to $2000. In 1859 the salary was $7000; in 1865, $12,500; in 1870, $20,000. The pew rent in 1853 was $11,157; in 1859, $26,000; in 1868, $48,000; in 1872, $59,000. In 1868 a quartette was introduced, whose aggregate salaries, with that of the organist, are $7600. The helper—a clergyman who does the pastoral work—and the sextons receive $7700, making the whole amount of salaries $35,300. There are several deaconesses elected annually. The number of members increased from 21 in 1847 to 3300 in 1872. The number of Sunday-school pupils was, in 1872, 1319, besides some 800 connected with mission schools.

—Mrs. UNDERWOOD, daughter of the late REMBRANDT PEALE, has presented to the Mount Holly Association, of New Jersey, his painting of "Washington before Yorktown," valued at $10,000. The frame, eighteen feet in circumference, was made from a black-walnut-tree which grew on the homestead of ROBERT MORRIS, the Revolutionary financier and bosom friend of WASHINGTON.

—Mr. CHARLES WHITNEY, of Binghamton, who has achieved some fame as a reader, has given certain acres of land on the banks of the Susquehanna, near that city, upon which to build a home for literary and artistic people who may become reduced in circumstances by sickness or misfortune. The building is to be begun this summer.

—The Marquis de Noailles, the French minister at Washington, says of M. THIERS: "He is not old. Such men never get old. He had the sagacity of a statesman, the prudence of a man of experience, the resolute courage of a disciplined soldier, and the ardor of a patriotic Frenchman in the greatest trial France has endured. The man combining these qualities is still worthy of the confidence of his countrymen, and I am misled by my own judgment if he is not again called to finish the work he has so auspiciously begun."

—The amount subscribed as a testimonial to GEORGE CRUIKSHANK is $4200, of which RUSKIN gave $500. The venerable artist also enjoys a pension from the government of $475 a year, and $250 a year from the Royal Academy.

—The Shah of Persia, who is peregrinating about Europe, is forty-four years old, and succeeded to the throne when only eighteen years of age. He is absolute ruler within his dominions, and sole master of the lives and goods of all his subjects, both high and low. The whole revenue of the country being at their disposal, recent sovereigns of Persia have been able to amass large fortunes. That of the present Shah is said to be $20,000,000. He is handsome in person, intelligent, and liberal-minded. He takes an active part in the administration of his country, and is most desirous to secure the well-being of all classes of his subjects. He is, moreover, endowed with a highly cultivated mind, is well acquainted with the French language, and takes in several of the leading newspapers of Europe. His reign is remarkable for the introduction of many striking improvements—true marks of progress and civilization—such as the founding of a royal college for the study of all the sciences, the introduction of the telegraph, and the construction of the first made road in Persia. As a proof of his liberality, it may be mentioned that, while adhering strictly to the religion of the Koran, and regarded in Persia as the vicegerent of the Prophet, he not long ago granted to the Nestorian Christians in his dominions a site for a church, but also headed a subscription list with a handsome donation toward its erection—an example which was speedily followed by his own ministers, the Russian, Turkish, and French ministers at the court of Teheran, and the principal merchants of Persia.

—The "personal" tenderness between the Duke of Edinburgh and the Grand Duchess MARIE sprang up at Hesse-Darmstadt, where they met a year or two ago; and during Prince ALFRED'S residence at Sorrento, though nominally staying at the Tasso, he has been constantly at the imperial villa from morning till night. One difficulty as to the marriage has been surmounted. It was proposed as a condition that the Duke should reside a certain period of time every year in Russia, but he refused to bind himself. Besides her fortune of $1,000,000, and an allowance from the Emperor of $100,000 a year, she will bring to her husband a disposition of great sweetness and amiability.

Ladies' Straw Hats, Figs. 1-5.

Fig. 1.—ALPINE HAT. This Leghorn hat has a high sloping crown. The broad rolled rim is turned up high on both sides, and is bound with brown velvet on the outer edge. Wide brown velvet ribbon, edged with a bias strip of faille of the same color, is wound around the crown. On the right side of the hat are two fan-shaped pieces of brown velvet lined with silk, to which are joined a longer loop and two hanging ends of brown faille. A knot of brown faille finishes the loop and ends, and a tuft of white and colored feathers is fastened into the knot.

Fig. 1.—ALPINE HAT.

Fig. 2.—LA VALLIÈRE HAT. This white Neapolitan hat has a moderately high crown. The rim is rather broad, and is turned up in front and down in the back, and forms high revers at the sides. The outer edge of the rim is bound with gathered light blue faille ribbon an inch and three-quarters wide. Around the crown are wound a light blue and a dark blue wide faille ribbon, which form short and long falling loops and ends in the middle of the back. A spray of roses and forget-me-nots trims the hat, and an elastic ribbon serves to keep it in place.

Fig. 3.—JAPANESE HAT. This open-work straw hat is round and very slightly arched. It is lined with purple silk, and is trimmed inside on the outer edge with a pinked ruche of the same. The trimming consists of a cluster of violets, which are arranged in a half wreath around the slightly raised centre, and a purple faille ribbon falling in the back.

Fig. 4.—RUBENS HAT. The broad rim of this English straw hat is turned up high on the right side. The inner edge is faced with velvet ribbon. The trimming consists of a spray of strawberry leaves, flowers, and berries, and a light yellow silk ribbon three inches and a quarter wide, one end of which is fastened outside at the right side, and the other end in the middle of the back on the inside.

Fig. 3.—JAPANESE HAT.

Fig. 4.—RUBENS HAT.

Fig. 5.—RABAGAS HAT. The rim of this black Neapolitan hat is turned up in revers as shown by the illustration, and covered with black velvet, at the same time fastening a piping of pink gros grain on the upper edge. The trimming consists of loops and ends of black gros grain ribbon an inch and seven-eighths wide, loops of pink gros grain two inches and a half wide, a black tulle scarf trimmed with lace, heron feathers, and a spray of pink roses. Two bead agrafes are set on the right side.

ORNAMENTAL GRASSES.

MANY garden folk are very fond of cultivating plants of this class, as many of them are very grand, stately, and graceful in their habit of growth; others are remarkable for the great beauty and delicacy of their inflorescence; and all are of easy cultivation, thriving in any ordinary well-manured soil.

For the information of such of our readers as may not yet have attempted their cultivation we append notices of some of the most desirable sorts. Apart from their use as garden decorations, their flower heads make, when properly dried, very beautiful mantel ornaments, unequaled by any other class of plants for the elegance and airiness of their forms. We particularly recommend them to those whose higher artistic cultivation has taught them to appreciate the beautiful in form rather than in color.

The Gynerium argenteum, or Pampas Grass, of South America, is the largest grass grown. It forms large tufts of leaves about three feet long, which recurve very gracefully, and are of a glaucous green color; the flower stems are from five to ten feet high, furnished with leaves for a portion of their length, and terminated by silvery, silky, branching panicles of flowers, the panicles being from twelve to twenty inches in length. The plant is diœcious—that is, some plants produce male flowers and others female flowers; the first are much less beautiful than the latter. There are some eight or nine varieties now grown in Europe, three of which have variegated leaves, one has light rose-colored, and another has pale violet-colored plumes; but these have not been introduced into this country that we are aware of. The plant is not quite hardy in this latitude, and should be grown in a large tub (a half-barrel, for instance), or, if planted out, should be taken up in the autumn and kept in a warm cellar; at the South it is quite hardy.

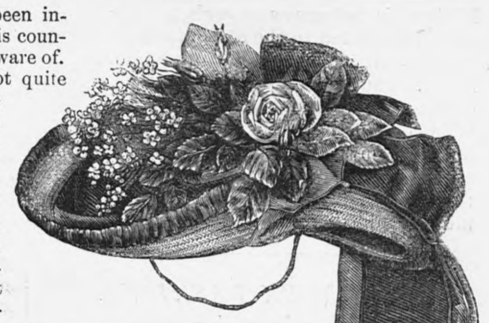

Fig. 2.—LA VALLIÈRE HAT.

Erianthus ravennæ, or Ravenna Grass, is a native of Italy. It is similar in appearance to the Pampas Grass, differing, however, in the form of the plumes. It has long graceful foliage, throwing up flower stems six or seven feet high, terminated by graceful, drooping, feathery-like plumes from fifteen to eighteen inches long; these have a silky appearance, and are of a silvery white color. The plant is hardy in this latitude, but northward would require to be protected with leaves.

Agrostis nebulosa is a very beautiful annual grass, with stems from twelve to fifteen inches high, with from five to ten whorls of long hair-like branches terminated by the flowers, the whole forming a graceful, airy, feathery panicle. These panicles, cut before the seeds are ripe and dried in the shade, can be preserved for a long time, and either in their natural state or dyed are used by milliners and artificial flower makers.

Briza maxima, or Quaking-Grass, an annual with flower stems from twelve to twenty-four inches high, with large calycine scales, which form close, flat, rather long, heart-shaped pendent objects, with delicate flexible footstalks, that allow them to move with the slightest movement of the wind. Another species, B. gracilis, is similar to the above, only differing in being dwarfer and more delicate in habit.

Aira pulchella, in some of the seedsmen's catalogues inserted as Agrostis pulchella. This very elegant and graceful grass is an annual, growing from eight to ten inches high, producing numerous thread-like flower stems terminated by erect, delicate, graceful panicles. These being cut, and dried in the shade, can be kept for a long time, and, like the Agrotis, are used by milliners and artificial flower makers.

Lagurus ovatus, or Hare's-tail Grass, is a pretty dwarf-growing species, whose flower stems are terminated by upright soft and velvety heads of flowers, which, being cut before their complete maturity, are readily preserved for winter bouquets, and are also used for the coiffures of ladies.

Panicum capillaire is the Eragrostis elegans, or Love-Grass, of some of the seedsmen. It is an annual, although it is stated in some catalogues to be a perennial. It grows from eighteen to twenty inches high, and has large panicles of flowers lightly tinted with rose-color on the exterior. It is not as strikingly ornamental as some of the others, but is useful for winter bouquets.

Pennisetum longistylum is generally grown as an annual, but at the South would be a perennial. It is a very elegant species, growing from eighteen to thirty inches high, the flower stems producing long, white, gracefully curved plumes, which are very desirable for winter bouquets. This species requires a light, rich soil, and if the season is dry, should be well watered.

Stipa pennata, or Feather-Grass, is one of the most beautiful of all grasses. It is a perennial, growing from eighteen to twenty inches high. The plumes are long, remarkably light, and flexible, and have a strong resemblance to marabout feathers, and are used by the milliners and artificial flower makers as imitations of them.

Ulalia japonica is a perennial hardy species from Japan, with long variegated leaves. The flower stems are from three to four feet high, very reed-like, and produce loose panicles of flowers; these panicles are hairy and erect until dried, when they become elegantly curled, closely resembling Ich dien feathers. It is a remarkably elegant species.

Hordeum jubatum, or Squirrel-tail Grass, is an annual, growing from twenty to thirty inches high, the plumes being from four to six inches long, sometimes straight and sometimes gracefully curved; the scales of the flowers are terminated by long awns, which are green at the base and of a light rose-color at the summit; these awns have the appearance of bristly hairs.

Festuca glauca is a dwarf-growing species with upright very glaucous green leaves. This plant is admirably adapted for edgings, growing very densely, and not inclined to run or spread. It is of recent introduction to our gardens, and we believe that it will in many cases supersede box edgings. It is perfectly hardy, and is a perennial.

Besides the above-named species, there are others of comparatively recent introduction to be found in the catalogues, some of which may be worth growing; the above selection, however, includes the most striking or picturesque species. Closely allied to the grasses are some species of Bamboo, which stand our winters here with but slight protection, as Bambusa metake and B. fortunii variegata. Arundo donax variegata is a hardy, reed-like plant, with variegated leaves, growing four to five feet high. Gymnothrix latifolia is also a reed-like plant, growing seven to ten feet high, with long recurved leaves. It is not hardy at the North, and should, therefore, be kept in a warm cellar in the winter season.

Ladies' House Dresses, Figs. 1–4.

Figs. 1 and 4.—BLUE FOULARD DRESS. This dress is made of blue foulard, and is trimmed with a revers collar and folds and bows of a darker shade of foulard. Pleated Swiss muslin collar and sleeves.

Fig. 2.—OLIVE FAILLE DRESS. This dress is made of olive faille, and consists of a double skirt and basque-waist, trimmed with olive velvet folds corded with satin, a rosette and ends of similar velvet, and knotted silk fringe. Pleated Swiss muslin and lace collar and sleeves.

Fig. 3.—BLACK SILK AND ÉCRU PONGEE DRESS. Black silk skirt, trimmed with side-pleated ruffles of the material. Over-skirt and basque-waist of écru pongee. The over-skirt is trimmed with box-pleated ruffles of the material, écru lace, and black velvet folds. Similar folds trim the waist. Pleated Swiss muslin and lace collar and sleeves. Black velvet necklace with coral and gold medallion. Hair rolled back from the forehead, and arranged in puffs and curls.

Réséda Poult de Soie Dress, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 404.

THIS dress is made of dark and light réséda poult de soie. The skirt of the darker shade is trimmed in front with pleated ruffles and bows of the same, and in the back with overlapping folds of moiré of the same color. The polonaise is of light poult de soie; the trimming consists of folds, revers, and bows of moiré. The vest fronts are of the darker poult de soie.

Mexican and Polish Debtors.

IN Mexico, as in Poland, debt hangs heavily around the necks of men and women from infancy to senectitude. A Polish peasant is soon too deep in the books of the Jewish brandy-seller to call his soul, or his scythe, or any thing else, his own. He must drink—and indeed he is frequently but too willing to adopt the bibulous method of conciliation—that he may keep in the good graces of a creditor who could pounce at any moment upon the lean cows that draw his wooden plow, and the half-tamed horses which he harnesses to his wicker-work wagon. So he swallows the fiery poison in increasing doses, until, by the time his hair grows grizzled, he may be said to have solved the vexed question, whether or no alcohol be food, by subsisting as much on brandy as on bread.

In Mexico a peon of the pure or mixed Indian blood is never out of debt. His very christening feast, with the priest's fees, the rare treat of roast mutton and tawny wine, the pulque and the sweetmeats, the painted candles, the gun-firing and bell-ringing and dancing on the green to gypsy music, sits weightily on a lad's shoulders as he stands on the threshold of manly life. His old father—for people who work age fast under the hot sun and in the thin air of the high table-lands of Anahuac—has never been able to pay the whole bill for that ceremony. The son wishes to marry, and that entails another festival, with fresh dues to the Church, and a new merry-making. My very good señor, the owner of the big estate on which son and father work, will graciously advance some dollars to young Pedro if he will but take upon himself the residue of the unsettled claims on old Antonio. The cura of the parish will give the young couple his blessing on trust, and will wait to be paid by installments. bor, and thenceforth is always toiling, always in arrear, his pittance of wages constantly anticipated, and he himself for life chained to the soil, and only nominally a free man.

WAITING FOR YOU, JOCK.

WINTER'S agoing;
The streams are a-flowing;
The May-flowers blowing
Will soon be in view.
But all things seem faded,
For my heart it is jaded,
Waiting for you, Jock,
Waiting for you:
Oh, but it's weary work,
Waiting for you!

As soon as the day's done,
My thoughts to the West run;
I envy the red sun,
That sinks from my view.
On you it's a-shining,
While here I am pining,
Waiting for you, Jock,
Waiting for you:
Oh, but it's weary work,
Waiting for you!

I sigh when the day beams;
The pitiful night seems
To cheer me with sweet dreams,
That bear me to you.
Each morn as you flee me,
The fading stars see me,
Waiting for you, Jock,
Waiting for you:
Oh. but it's weary work,
Waiting for you!

Go, robin, fly to him;
Sing ever nigh to him;
Summer winds, sigh to him;
Bid him be true!
Where he sleeps on the prairies,
Oh, whisper, kind fairies,
"Waiting for you, Jock,
Waiting for you!
Oh, but it's weary work,
Waiting for you!"

LADY ANNA.

CHAPTER XV.

WHARFEDALE.

THE visit to Wharfedale was fixed for Monday and Tuesday, and on the Monday morning they started, after an early breakfast. The party consisted of Aunt Jane, Aunt Julia, Lady Anna, Minnie, and Mr. Cross, one of the rector's curates. The rector would not accompany them, excusing himself to the others generally on the ground that he could not be absent from his parish on those two days. To his wife and sister he explained that he was not able, as yet, to take pleasure in such a party as this with Lady Anna. There was no knowing, he said, what might happen. It was evident that he did not mean to open his heart to Lady Anna, at any rate till the marriage should be settled.

An open carriage, which would take them all, was ordered—with four post-horses, and two antiquated postboys, with white hats and blue jackets and yellow breeches. Minnie and the curate sat on the box, and there was a servant in the rumble. Rooms at the inn had been ordered, and every thing was done in proper lordly manner. The sun shone brightly above their heads, and Anna, having as yet received no further letter from her mother, was determined to be happy. Four horses took them to Bolton Bridge, and then, having eaten lunch and ordered dinner, they started for their ramble in the woods.

The first thing to be seen at Bolton Abbey is, of course, the Abbey. The Abbey itself, as a ruin—a ruin not so ruinous but that a part of it is used for a modern church—is very well; but the glory of Bolton Abbey is in the river which runs round it, and the wooded banks which overhang it. No more luxuriant pasture, no richer foliage, no brighter water, no more picturesque arrangement of the freaks of nature, aided by the art and taste of man, is to be found, perhaps, in England. Lady Anna, who had been used to wilder scenery in her native county, was delighted. Nothing had ever been so beautiful as the Abbey—nothing so lovely as the running Wharfe! Might they not climb up among those woods on the opposite bank? Lord Lovel declared that of course they would climb up among the woods—it was for that purpose they had come. That was the way to the Stryd, over which he was determined that Lady Anna should be made to jump.

But the river below the Abbey is to be traversed by stepping-stones, which, to the female uninitiated foot, appear to be full of danger. The Wharfe here is no insignificant brook, to be overcome by a long stride and a jump. There is a causeway, of perhaps forty stones, across it, each some eighteen inches distant from the other, which, flat and excellent though they be, are perilous from their number. Mrs. Lovel, who knew the place of old, had begun by declaring that no consideration should induce her to cross the water. Aunt Julia had proposed that they should go along the other bank, on the Abbey side of the river, and thence cross by the bridge half a mile up. But the Earl was resolved that he would take his cousin over the stepping-stones; and Minnie and the curate were equally determined. Minnie, indeed, had crossed the river, and was back again, while the matter was still being discussed. Aunt Julia, who was strong-limbed, as well as strong-minded, at last assented, the curate having promised all necessary aid. Mrs. Lovel seated herself at a distance to see the exploit; and then Lord Lovel started, with Lady Anna, turning at every stone to give a hand to his cousin.

"Oh, they are very dreadful!" said Lady Anna, when about a dozen had been passed.

The black water was flowing fast, fast beneath her feet; the stones became smaller and smaller to her imagination, and the apertures between them broader and broader.

"Don't look at the water, dear," said the lord, "but come on quick."

"I can't come on quick. I shall never get over. Oh, Frederic!" That morning she had promised that she would call him Frederic. Even Daniel could not think it wrong that she should call her cousin by his Christian name. "It's no good; I can't do that one—it's crooked. Mayn't I go back again?"

"You can't go back, dear. It is only up to your knees, if you do go in. But take my hand. There—all the others are straight—you must come on, or Aunt Julia will catch us. After two or three times, you'll hop over like a milk-maid. There are only half a dozen more. Here we are! Isn't that pretty?"

"I thought I never should have got over. I wouldn't go back for any thing. But it is lovely; and I am so much obliged to you for bringing me here. We can go back another way?"

"Oh yes; but now we'll get up the bank. Give me your hand." Then he took her along the narrow, twisting, steep paths, to the top of the wooded bank, and they were soon beyond the reach of Aunt Julia, Minnie, and the curate.

It was very pleasant, very lovely, and very joyous; but there was still present to her mind some great fear. The man was there with her as an acknowledged lover—a lover acknowledged to be so by all but herself; but she could not lawfully have any lover but him who was now slaving at his trade in London. She must tell this gallant lord that he must not be her lover; and as they went along she was always meditating how she might best tell him when the moment for telling him should come. But on that morning during the entire walk he said no word to her which seemed quite to justify the telling. He called her by sweet, petting names—Anna, my girl, pretty coz, and such-like. He would hold her hand twice longer than he would have held that of either aunt in helping her over this or that little difficulty—and would help her when no help was needed. He talked to her of small things, as though he and she must needs have kindred interests. He spoke to her of his uncle as though, near as his uncle was, the connection were not nigh so close as that between him and her. She understood it with a half understanding—feeling that in all this he was in truth making love to her, and yet telling herself that he said no more than cousinship might warrant. But the autumn colors were bright, and the river rippled, and the light breeze came down from the mountains, and the last of the wild flowers were still sweet in the woods. After a while she was able to forget her difficulties, to cease to think of Daniel, and to find in her cousin not a lover, but simply the pleasantest friend that fortune had ever sent her.

And so they came, all alone—for Aunt Julia, though both limbs and mind were strong, had not been able to keep up with them—all alone to the Stryd. The Stryd is a narrow gully or passage which the waters have cut for themselves in the rocks, perhaps five or six feet broad where the river passes, but narrowed at the top by an overhanging mass which in old days withstood the wearing of the stream, till the softer stone below was cut away, and then was left bridging over a part of the chasm below. There goes a story that a mountain chieftain's son, hunting the stag across the valley when the floods were out, in leaping the stream, from rock to rock, failed to make good his footing, was carried down by the rushing waters, and dashed to pieces among the rocks. Lord Lovel told her the tale, as they sat looking at the now innocent brook, and then bade her follow him as he leaped from edge to edge.

"I couldn't do it—indeed I couldn't," said the shivering girl.

"It is barely a step," said the Earl, jumping over, and back again. "Going from this side, you couldn't miss to do it, if you tried."

"I'm sure I should tumble in. It makes me sick to look at you while you are leaping."

"You'd jump over twice the distance on dry ground."

"Then let me jump on dry ground."

"I've set my heart upon it. Do you think I'd ask you if I wasn't sure?"

"You want to make another legend of me."

"I want to leave Aunt Julia behind, which we shall certainly do."

"Oh, but I can't afford to drown myself, just that you may run away from Aunt Julia. You can run by yourself, and I will wait for Aunt Julia."

"That is not exactly my plan. Be a brave girl now, and stand up, and do as I bid you."

Then she stood up on the edge of the rock, holding tight by his arm. How pleasant it was to be thus frightened, with such a protector near her to insure her safety! And yet the chasm yawned, and the water ran rapid and was very black. But if he asked her to make the spring, of course she must make it. What would she not have done at his bidding?

"I can almost touch you, you see," he said, as he stood opposite, with his arm out ready to catch her hand.

"Oh, Frederic, I don't think I can."

"You can very well, if you will only jump."

"It is ever so many yards."

"It is three feet. I'll back Aunt Julia to do it for a promise of ten shillings to the infirmary."

"I'll give the ten shillings if you'll only let me off."

"I won't let you off—so you might as well come at once."

Then she stood and shuddered for a moment, looking with beseeching eyes up into his face. Of course she meant to jump. Of course she would have been disappointed had Aunt Julia come and interrupted her jumping. Yes—she would jump into his arms. She knew that he would catch her. At that moment her memory of Daniel Thwaite had become faint as the last shaded glimmer of twilight. She shut her eyes for half a moment, then opened them, looked into his face, and made her spring. As she did so, she struck her foot against a rising ledge of the rock, and, though she covered more than the distance in her leap, she stumbled as she came to the ground, and fell into his arms. She had sprained her ankle in her effort to recover herself.

"Are you hurt?" he asked, holding her close to his side.

"No—I think not—only a little, that is. I was so awkward!"

"I shall never forgive myself if you are hurt."

"There is nothing to forgive. I'll sit down for a moment. It was my own fault, because I was so stupid—and it does not in the least signify. I know what it is now: I've sprained my ankle."

"There is nothing so painful as that."

"It hurts a little, but it will go off. It wasn't the jump, but I twisted my foot somehow. If you look so unhappy, I'll get up and jump back again."

"I am unhappy, dearest."

"Oh, but you mustn't." The prohibition might be taken as applying to the epithet of endearment, and thereby her conscience be satisfied. Then he bent over her, looking anxiously into her face as she winced with the pain, and he took her hand and kissed it. "Oh no," she said, gently struggling to withdraw the hand which he held. "Here is Aunt Julia. You had better just move." Not that she would have cared a straw for the eyes of Aunt Julia, had it not been that the image of Daniel Thwaite again rose strong before her mind. Then Aunt Julia and the curate and Minnie were standing on the rock within a few paces of them, but on the other side of the stream.

"Is there any thing the matter?" asked Miss Lovel.

"She has sprained her ankle in jumping over the Stryd, and she can not walk. Perhaps Mr. Cross would not mind going back to the inn and getting a carriage. The road is only a quarter of a mile above us, and we could carry her up."

"How could you be so foolish, Frederic, as to let her jump it?" said the aunt.

"Don't mind about my folly now. The thing is to get a carriage for Anna." The curate immediately hurried back, jumping over the Stryd as the nearest way to the inn; and Minnie also sprung across the stream so that she might sit down beside her cousin and offer consolation. Aunt Julia was left alone, and after a while was forced to walk back by herself to the bridge.

"Is she much hurt?" asked Minnie.

"I am afraid she is hurt," said the lord.

"Dear, dear Minnie, it does not signify a bit," said Anna, lavishing on her younger cousin the caresses which fate forbade her to give to the elder. "I know I could walk home in a few minutes. I am better now. It is one of those things which go away almost immediately. I'll try and stand, Frederic, if you'll let me." Then she raised herself, leaning upon him, and declared that she was nearly well—and then was reseated, still leaning on him.

"Shall we attempt to get her up to the road, Minnie, or wait till Mr. Cross comes to help us?" Lady Anna declared that she did not want any help—certainly not Mr. Cross's help, and that she could do very well just with Minnie's arm. They waited there, sitting on the rocks for half an hour, saying but little to each other, throwing into the stream the dry bits of stick which the last flood had left upon the stones, and each thinking how pleasant it was to sit there and dream, listening to the running waters. Then Lady Anna hobbled up to the carriage road, helped by a stronger arm than that of her cousin Minnie.

Of course there was some concern and dismay at the inn. Embrocations were used, and doctors were talked of, and heads were shaken, and a couch in the sitting-room was prepared, so that the poor injured one might eat her dinner without being driven to the solitude of her own bedroom.

CHAPTER XVI.

FOREVER.

ON the next morning the poor injured one was quite well, but she was still held to be subject to piteous concern. The two aunts shook their heads when she said she would walk down to the stepping-stones that morning before starting for Yoxham; but she was quite sure that the sprain was all gone, and the distance was not above half a mile. They were not to start till two o'clock. Would Minnie come down with her, and ramble about among the ruins?

"Minnie, come out on the lawn," said the lord. "Don't you come with me and Anna—you can go where you like about the place by yourself."

"Why mayn't I come?"

"Never mind, but do as you're bid."

"I know. You are coming to make love to Cousin Anna."

"You are an impertinent little imp."

"I am so glad, Frederic, because I do like her. I was sure she was a real cousin directly she came. Don't you think she is very, very nice?"

"Pretty well."

"Is that all?"

"You go away and don't tease, or else I'll never bring you to the Stryd again." So it happened that Lord Lovel and Lady Anna went across the meadow together, down to the river, and sauntered along the margin till they came to the stepping-stones. He passed over, and she followed him, almost without a word. Her heart was so full that she did not think now of the water running at her feet. It had hardly seemed to her to make any difficulty as to the passage. She must follow him whither he would lead her, but her mind misgave her—that they would not return sweet loving friends as they went out. "We won't climb," said he, "because it might try your ankle too much. But we will go in here by the meadow." Then he turned into a narrow field lying under the high bank of wood, formed by the bending of the river, and immediately opposite to the Abbey ruins. "I always think this is one of the prettiest views there is," he said, throwing himself upon the grass.

"It is all prettiest. It is like fairy-land. Does the Duke let people come here always?"

"Yes, I fancy so."

"He must be very good-natured. Do you know the Duke?"

"I never saw him in my life."

"A duke sounds so awful to me."

"You'll get used to them some day. Won't you sit down?" Then she glided down to the ground at a little distance from him, and he at once shifted his place so as to be almost close to her.

"Your foot is quite well?"

"Quite well."

"I thought for a few minutes that there was going to be some dreadful accident, and I was so mad with myself for having made you jump it. If you had broken your leg, I wonder how you would have borne it?"

"Like other people, I suppose."

"Would you have been angry with me?"

"I hope not. I am sure not. Why should I have been angry with you? You were doing the best you could to give me pleasure. I don't think I should have been angry at all. I don't think we are ever angry with the people we really like."

"Do you really like me?"

"Yes; I like you."

"Is that all?"

"Is not that enough?"

She answered the question as she might have answered it had it been allowed to her, as to any girl that was free, to toy with his love, knowing that she meant to accept it. It was easier so than in any other way; but her heart within her was sad, and could she have stopped his further speech by any word rough and somewhat rude, she would have done so. But she did not know how to answer him roughly. He deserved from her that all her words should be soft and sweet and pleasant. She believed him to be good and generous and kind and loving. The hard things which Daniel Thwaite had said of him had all vanished from her mind. To her thinking, it was no sin in him that he should want her wealth—he, the Earl, to whom by right the wealth of the Lovels should belong. The sin was rather hers—in that she kept it from him. And then, if she could receive all that he was willing to give, his heart, his name, his house and home, and sweet belongings of natural gifts and personal advantages, how much more would she take than what she gave! She could not speak to him roughly, though—alas!—the time had come in which she must speak to him truly. It was not fitting that a girl should have two lovers.

"No, dear—not enough," he said. "You must know that it is not enough between you and me."

It can hardly be accounted a fault in him that at this time he felt sure of her love. She had been so soft in her ways with him, so gracious, yielding, and pretty in her manners, so manifestly pleased by his company, so prone to lean upon him, that it could hardly be that he should think otherwise. She had told him, when he spoke to her more plainly up in London than he had yet done since they had been together in the country, that she could never, never be his wife. But what else could a girl say at a first meeting with a proposed lover? Would he have wished that she should at once have given herself up without one maidenly scruple, one word of feminine recusancy? If love's course be made to run too smooth, it loses all its poetry, and half its sweetness. But now they knew each other—at least he thought they did. The scruple might now be put away; the feminine recusancy had done its work. The expediency of this marriage was known to her as well as to him. For himself, he felt that he loved her in very truth. She was not harsh or loud, vulgar, or given to coarse manners, as might have been expected, and as he had been warned by his friends that he would find her. That she was very beautiful all her enemies had acknowledged—and he was quite assured that her enemies had been right. She was the Lady Anna Lovel, and he felt that he could make her his own without one shade of regret to mar his triumph. Of the tailor's son—though he had been warned of him too—he made no account whatever. That had been a slander, which only endeared the girl to him the more—a slander against Lady Anna Lovel which had been an insult to his family. Among all the ladies he knew, daughters of peers and high-bred commoners, there were none

—there was not one—less likely so to disgrace herself than Lady Anna Lovel, his sweet cousin. So thought the Earl of her whom he now purposed to ask to be his wife.

"Do not think me too hurried, dear, if I speak to you again so soon of that of which I spoke once before." He had turned himself round upon his arm, so as to be very close to her—so that he would look full into her face, and, if chance favored him, could take her hand. He paused, as though for an answer, but she did not speak to him a word. "It is not long yet since we first met."

"Oh no—not long."

"And I know not what your feelings are. But, in very truth, I can say that I love you dearly. Had nothing else come in the way to bring us together, I am sure that I should have loved you." She, poor child, believed him as though he were speaking to her the sweetest Gospel. And he, too, believed himself. He was easy of heart perhaps, but not deceitful; anxious enough for his position in the world, but not meanly covetous. Had she been distasteful to him as a woman, he would have refused to make himself rich by the means that had been suggested to him. As it was, he desired her as much as her money, and had she given herself to him then, would never have remembered, would never have known, that the match had been sordid. "Do you believe me?" he asked.

"Oh yes."

"And shall it be so?"

Her face had been turned away, but now she slowly moved her neck so that she could look at him. Should she be false to all her vows, and try whether happiness might not be gained in that way? The manner of doing it passed through her mind in that moment. She would write to Daniel, and remind him of his promise to set her free if she so willed it. She would never see him again. She would tell him that she had striven to see things as he would have taught her, and had failed. She would abuse herself, and ask for his pardon; but having thus judged for herself, she would never go back from such judgment. It might be done—if only she could persuade herself that it were good to do it! But, as she thought of it, there came upon her a prick of conscience so sharp that she could not welcome the devil by leaving it unheeded. How could she be forsworn to one who had been so absolutely good—whose all had been spent for her and for her mother—whose whole life had been one long struggle of friendship on her behalf—who had been the only playfellow of her youth, the only man she had ever ventured to kiss—the man whom she truly loved? He had warned her against these gauds which were captivating her spirit, and now, in the moment of her peril, she would remember his warnings.

"Shall it be so?" Lord Lovel asked again, just stretching out his hand so that he could touch the fold of her garment.

"It can not be so," she said.

"Can not be!"

"It can not be so, Lord Lovel."

"It can not now—or do you mean the word to be forever?"

"Forever," she replied.

"I know that I have been hurried and sudden," he said, purposely passing by her last assurance. "And I do feel that you have a right to resent the seeming assurance of such haste. But in our case, dearest, the interests of so many are concerned, the doubts and fears, the well-being, and even the future conduct of all our friends are so bound up by the result that I had hoped you would have pardoned that which would otherwise have been unpardonable." O Heavens! had it not been for Daniel Thwaite, how full of grace, how becoming, how laden with flattering courtesy, would have been every word that he had uttered to her! "But," he continued, "if it really be that you can not love me—"

"Oh, Lord Lovel, pray ask of me no further questions."

"I am bound to ask and to know—for all our sakes."

Then she rose quickly to her feet, and with altered gait and changed countenance stood over him. "I am engaged," she said, "to be married—to Mr. Daniel Thwaite." She had told it all, and felt that she had told her own disgrace. He rose also, but stood mute before her. This was the very thing of which they all warned him, but as to which he had been so sure that it was not so! She saw it all in his eyes, reading much more there than he could read in hers. She was degraded in his estimation, and felt that evil worse almost than the loss of his love. For the last three weeks she had been a real Lovel among the Lovels. That was all over now. Let this lawsuit go as it might, let them give to her all the money, and make the title which she hated ever so sure, she never again could be the equal friend of her gentle relative, Earl Lovel. Minnie would never again spring into her arms, swearing that she would do as she pleased with her own cousin. She might be Lady Anna, but never Anna again to the two ladies at the rectory. The perfume of his rank had been just scented, to be dashed away from her forever. "It is a secret at present," she said, "or I should have told you sooner. If it is right that you should repeat it, of course you must."

"Oh, Anna!"

"It is true."

"Oh, Anna, for your sake as well as mine this makes me wretched indeed!"

"As for the money, Lord Lovel, if it be mine to give, you shall have it."

"You think, then, it is that which I have wanted?"

"It is that which the family wants, and I can understand that it should be wanted. As for myself—for mamma and me—you can hardly understand how it has been with us when we were young. You despise Mr. Thwaite—because he is a tailor."

"I am sure he is not fit to be the husband of Lady Anna Lovel."

"When Lady Anna Lovel had no other friend in the world, he sheltered her and gave her a house to live in, and spent his earnings in her defense, and would not yield when all those who might have been her friends strove to wrong her. Where would mamma have been—and I—had there been no Mr. Thwaite to comfort us? He was our only friend—he and his father. They were all we had. In my childhood I had never a kind word from another child, but only from him. Would it have been right that he should have asked for any thing, and that I should have refused it?"

"He should not have asked for this," said Lord Lovel, hoarsely.

"Why not he, as well as you? He is as much a man. If I could believe in your love after two days, Lord Lovel, could I not trust his after twenty years of friendship?"

"You knew that he was beneath you."

"He was not beneath me. He was above me. We were poor, while he and his father had money, which we took. He could give, while we received. He was strong, while we were weak—and was strong to comfort us. And then, Lord Lovel, what knew I of rank, living under his father's wing? They told me I was the Lady Anna, and the children scouted me. My mother was a countess. So she swore, and I at least believed her. But if ever rank and title were a profitless burden, they were to her. Do you think that I had learned then to love my rank?"

"You have learned better now."

"I have learned—but whether better I may doubt. There are lessons which are quickly learned—and there are they who say that such are the devil's lessons. I have not been strong enough not to learn. But I must forget again, Lord Lovel. And you must forget also." He hardly knew how to speak to her now—whether it would be fit for him even to wish to persuade her to be his, after she had told him that she had given her troth to a tailor. His uneasy thoughts prompted him with ideas which dismayed him. Could he take to his heart one who had been pressed close in so vile a grasp? Could he accept a heart that had once been promised to a tailor's workman? Would not all the world know and say that he had done it solely for the money, even should he succeed in doing it? And yet to fail in this enterprise—to abandon all—to give up so beautiful, so enticing a road to wealth! Then he remembered what he had said—how he had pledged himself to abandon the suit—how convinced he had been that this girl was heiress to the Lovel wealth, who now told him that she had engaged herself to marry a tailor.

There was nothing more that either of them could say to the other at the moment, and they went back in silence to the inn.

VISITING COSTUME.

See illustration on page 408.

THIS visiting costume is of blue-gray silk. The skirt has kilt pleating on the front breadths, a ruffle up the side, and gathered flounces behind. The polonaise is embroidered with floss of a darker shade. The mantelet has a talma back and long square fronts, and is embroidered and edged with goffered fringe. The chip Rubens hat has the brim faced with blue-gray silk, with a scarf and ostrich tip of the same shade. Loops of rose-colored faille are high on the left side. The cravat bow is also rose-colored.

WATERING-PLACE COSTUME.

See illustration on page 408.

THIS pretty costume is designed for visiting in country-houses, at watering-places, or for out-of-door fêtes, lawn-parties, and other summer festivals. The skirt is white muslin, puffed on the upper part of the front breadth, with flounces extending all around the skirt. The Pompadour polonaise with vest front is of rose-colored foulard, showing a pale blue lining on the side, and trimmed with a ruffle of rose-color, headed by a band of pale blue silk. The puffed muslin sleeves have blue silk bands latticed between the puffs, and rosettes of rose-color; blue bands and pink rosettes are also on the skirt. Chip Spanish gypsy, trimmed with rose and blue ribbons, and a bouquet of forget-me-nots and roses with brown foliage. Rose-colored foulard parasol, with blue bow and bamboo stick. Linen collar. Tortoise-shell jewelry. Pale blue gloves.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

"LET us go to the Park to-day," was the petition of a bright-eyed little maiden one sunny Saturday morning not long ago. She had been promised "some time." "To-day was 'some time,'" she argued; and we went, though fully conscious that we should be beguiled into spending the entire day within the charmed precincts. Entering at the Sixth Avenue gate, we thought to secure our drive first, knowing that the Park carriages would be crowded later. So we passed to the Fifth Avenue entrance, and for the sake of extra comfort and moderate exclusiveness, secured for our party one section of a carriage. "Just right," was the laconic encomium pronounced upon the day—sunny, cool, clear; balmy air, blossoming flowers, delicate green foliage, and scenery unsurpassed. What more was needful to make a drive delightful? And we recommend the Central Park carriages both for comfort and economy. Before we had finished the circuit, Bright-eyes became alarmingly hungry. Of course she was. In fact, the symptoms began to appear at the very outset, when we first passed the Dairy, where she remembered she had been treated to some delicacies on a previous occasion. So we stopped there on our return, took seats at a little marble table, and presented the child with the bill of fare. But her programme was already made out from memory, the excellent milk furnished being a prominent item. Having lunched, we proceeded to the Museum. Living animals are an unfailing delight to children. They generally hasten by the stuffed, dried, and preserved specimens, wishing they had time to examine them; but they always do have time to crowd around the monkeys, and watch the bears and lions until enticed away. The restless pacing of the "baby elephant," and the curious upturning of his trunk, the roar of the sea-lion, the chatter of the parrots, and even the screeching of the eagles, seemed to fascinate our little charge. At length she was satisfied, and through winding paths, both shaded and sunny, we made our way to the Lake. A gay little boat took us in, and a genial oarsman guided her softly and smoothly over the clear surface. The crowd has become dense upon the Terrace; and far as the eye can reach in every direction the Park is thickly dotted with gayly dressed people, a large proportion being children. We mount the steps, and throw ourselves upon the soft green grass of an elevated slope, from which we have a fine view of the Bethesda Fountain and the moving panorama about us. Bright-eyes skipped about on the grass with the child-multitude, until suddenly the sound of music and the spray of water falling in the sunlight from the fountain attracted her attention. Bethesda Fountain, unveiled this day, was cast in bronze, at Munich, from designs executed by Miss Emma Stebbins, the well-known American sculptress. The work was first commenced in 1864; but after the castings were completed they were detained at Bremen owing to uncertainty of transportation during the Franco-German war. They arrived here nearly two years ago, but the completion of the fountain has been retarded until the present time. Without attempting at this time any detailed description, we simply say the whole effect was very beautiful, as the spray softly fell amidst sweet strains of music and glad voices of children. We would have lingered long in quiet restfulness, but we must begin to turn homeward. A curious building attracts our little companion. "What is it?" "We will go and see." It proves to be a camera obscura, which reveals to us exquisite scenes and panoramas in different parts of the Park with wonderful distinctness. It is a marvel indeed to the young brain, and really makes the child soberly thoughtful as well as delighted. "Ah! must we go?" There is no doubt of it now—we must go. But the day has been charmingly restful, and we slipped out of the gate with many thousands, mentally saying, "What a blessing is our Central Park!"

Ocean Beach, about nine miles south of Long Branch, is one of the new watering-places. It includes about four hundred acres, which have been surveyed and laid out into building lots. It is intersected by twelve main avenues eighty feet wide, which are crossed by drives and smaller streets. There is a lake nearly twenty acres in extent in the centre. A large number of cottages are contracted for, and a neat church is nearly completed.

Several veteran valetudinarians propose, as one of the amusements of Saratoga life, to enter this season into a contest as to which one of them can drink the largest quantity of spring water. It is reported that last summer they swallowed from fifty to one hundred glasses a day without discomfort.

The following curious specimen of a postal card is reported to have been received by the editor of the Old and New Magazine:

"NEW YORK CITY, May 22, 1873.

"Rev. Edward Everett Hale, Old and New:

"MY DEAR SIR,—Having just Been released from a Short period of Confinement, I drop you this to Inform you if you want that nice overcoat ($50 00) which was Professionally abstracted from that noble Edifice the Boston Public Library, last Feb'y, you can find it at the first 'Woodbinery' on Broadway, in that Part of the 'Hub' known as So. Boston, where it is 'up the Spout' for the trifling sum of 7 00—Just enough to enable me to reach my home in 'America's great Metropolis,' where they 'wanted' me for 3 months. Just got out. Pray for me. 'METROPOLITAN.'"

Application was at once made at the office of the Chief of Police of Boston, and the coat was recovered at the place designated.

It is noticed as a singular coincidence that on May 29 several Boston daily papers contained editorial articles on the general subject of fire, or something specially connected with it. The next day came Boston's second great fire.

Rest is every way as essential as food to a healthy body and a sound mind. "Sleep," remarks some writer, emphatically, "will do much to cure irritability of temper, peevishness, uneasiness. It will restore to vigor an overworked brain. It will build up and make strong a weary body. It will cure a headache. It will cure a heart-ache. It will cure a broken spirit. It will cure sorrow."

The late Chief Justice Chase was the last male of his line. He had six or seven brothers, but none of them had male issue, and all died before the Chief Justice. As he died leaving no son, it follows that the name of Chase, so far as his father's branch of the family is concerned, is now extinct.

A brilliant galaxy of names is presented by the American Literary Bureau for the prospective lecture season. Something like a dozen ladies figure in the list of lecturers and readers, among whom are several who have already won a pleasant place in the public estimation. Perhaps curiosity and interest may centre on Wilkie Collins, whose writings have for so many years made him, in one sense, the familiar acquaintance of the public.

Cape May and Atlantic City continue their usual summer rivalry. Philadelphians will need to divide the season between the two places in order to prevent open war. Niagara still holds its reputation for extortion. The Falls must be seen; but every one must pay for it. But it is not true that all the rear windows in the hotels are to be boarded up to prevent guests from looking in the direction of the Falls! Nor are travelers yet compelled, as was rumored, to pay a fixed fee, or wear cotton in their ears to prevent them from hearing the roar of the waters! Nature has advanced in her prices. Formerly one might see Kauterskill Falls, near Catskill, for twenty-five cents; now it costs fifty. The railway to the summit of Mount Washington begins its trips on the Fourth of July, before which time there is scarcely patronage enough to warrant it.

When the Grand Duke Alexis was in this country he and his party were escorted about Hartford by Governor Jewell. The public buildings and industrial establishments were duly pointed out; and passing his own great leather warehouse, the Governor spoke of it, remarking that he was bred a tanner, and that was his business then. The astonished Duke is said to have exclaimed, "What! a tanner and a Governor!" It might now be added concerning the Connecticut gentleman and able diplomatist, "Yes, a tanner and United States Minister Plenipotentiary to the Czar of all the Russias."

At a May meeting—one of the anniversaries, we suppose—of fruit-growers, it was stated that the crop of peaches in all the country on the Eastern Shore of Maryland and the lower counties of Delaware would be enormous, and much larger than for many years, and unless arrangements could be made to send peaches beyond New York, paying prices could not be obtained.

In one single week of May, seventeen thousand immigrants landed at Castle Garden. This is not an unusual number to arrive in one week during the spring and summer season. The seaport towns of Europe are crowded with the ill-paid, the enterprising, the ambitious, who desire to seek in a republican country a more generous reward of industry than they find at home. Undoubtedly the regulations prescribed for the management of affairs at Castle Garden are good, and if properly enforced would protect the emigrants from much hardship and fraud. But they land on our shores friendless and strangers, unacquainted with the language oftentimes, not knowing the value of money here, ignorant of our customs, and in many instances quite uncertain what to do with themselves. Thus they become an easy prey to swindlers, who earn their living by cheating the unsuspecting.

Objectors to the co-education of the sexes say that the first lady graduate from the Michigan University married one of her classmates. Well, what harm resulted? That is the question.

At the Girls' Home, in St. Mark's Place, under the supervision of the Children's Aid Society, a class has been formed for training in efficient domestic work. Only volunteers are received, or those who enter at the desire of parents. A thorough course of instruction and practice is given in all the branches required in ordinary households. The girls are taught to make beds, to sweep, to wait on the table, to make bread and pastry, and cook meats. The course is not completed in less than seven months, and a year is desirable to attain great proficiency. Thus far the class is small. Few young girls have the patience to learn their business thoroughly. They do not easily realize that skilled labor is always valuable in every department, and that good wages and good employers will always be found for such.

The Illinois girl (possessing $30,000) who refused to marry a clergyman because she did not think herself good enough to be a clergyman's wife, refused him when he proposed again, after giving up his profession, because she thought herself too good to marry him then.

The next development of woman's rights will be that they take off their hats and bonnets at church, at lecture, at concert, and opera, just as men do. This is recommended also upon the ground of convenience to the rest of the audience. Some one who has been suffering from the prevailing style of ladies' hat at church, explains his sentiments thus:

"We go to church. We sit in a back seat. Between us and the preacher are twelve seats. On these seats sit twelve ladies. On each lady's head is a hat. The one crowning the lady immediately before us is high, and obscures our view of the minister; the view of number one is obstructed by number two's hat, and so on. Number twelve has a clear view of the preacher, but nervously moves her head from side to side; this inconveniences number eleven, who moves her brain-box also; number ten follows suit, and so do all of us in turn—but have immediately to shift again. We desire to see all hats, bonnets, and head-dresses left in the hat-room at our church, or put in the pocket, or in the muff, or under the seat, or on each lady's thumb, during all future services."

Nothing seems more pitiable than that young children should be forced by the necessities of poverty, or for any other reason, to labor continuously in manufacturing establishments. A Lawrence (Massachusetts) paper gives the following incident: "A gentleman was passing across the Common a few evenings since, about half past ten o'clock, and meeting a little girl scarcely ten years of age, dinner-pail in hand, he accosted her and asked her if it was not late for such a little girl to be out, whereupon she replied, 'Oh no, Sir; this is the time I generally go home, for I work every other week till ten o'clock.' The gentleman became interested, and asked what time she began work, and learned that her daily labors began at half past six in the morning, and that the little tin pail contained her food for the day. He also listened to the old story of a father's intemperance, of a hard-working mother, and of other children at work in the mills."

When the late Chief Justice Chase visited the South, just after the war, he was introduced to a very beautiful woman, who prided herself on her devotion to the "Lost Cause." Anxious that the Chief Justice should know her real sentiments, she remarked, as she gave him her hand, "Mr. Chase, you see before you a rebel who has not been reconstructed." "Madame," replied he, "you are so perfectly constructed that any reconstruction is altogether impossible."

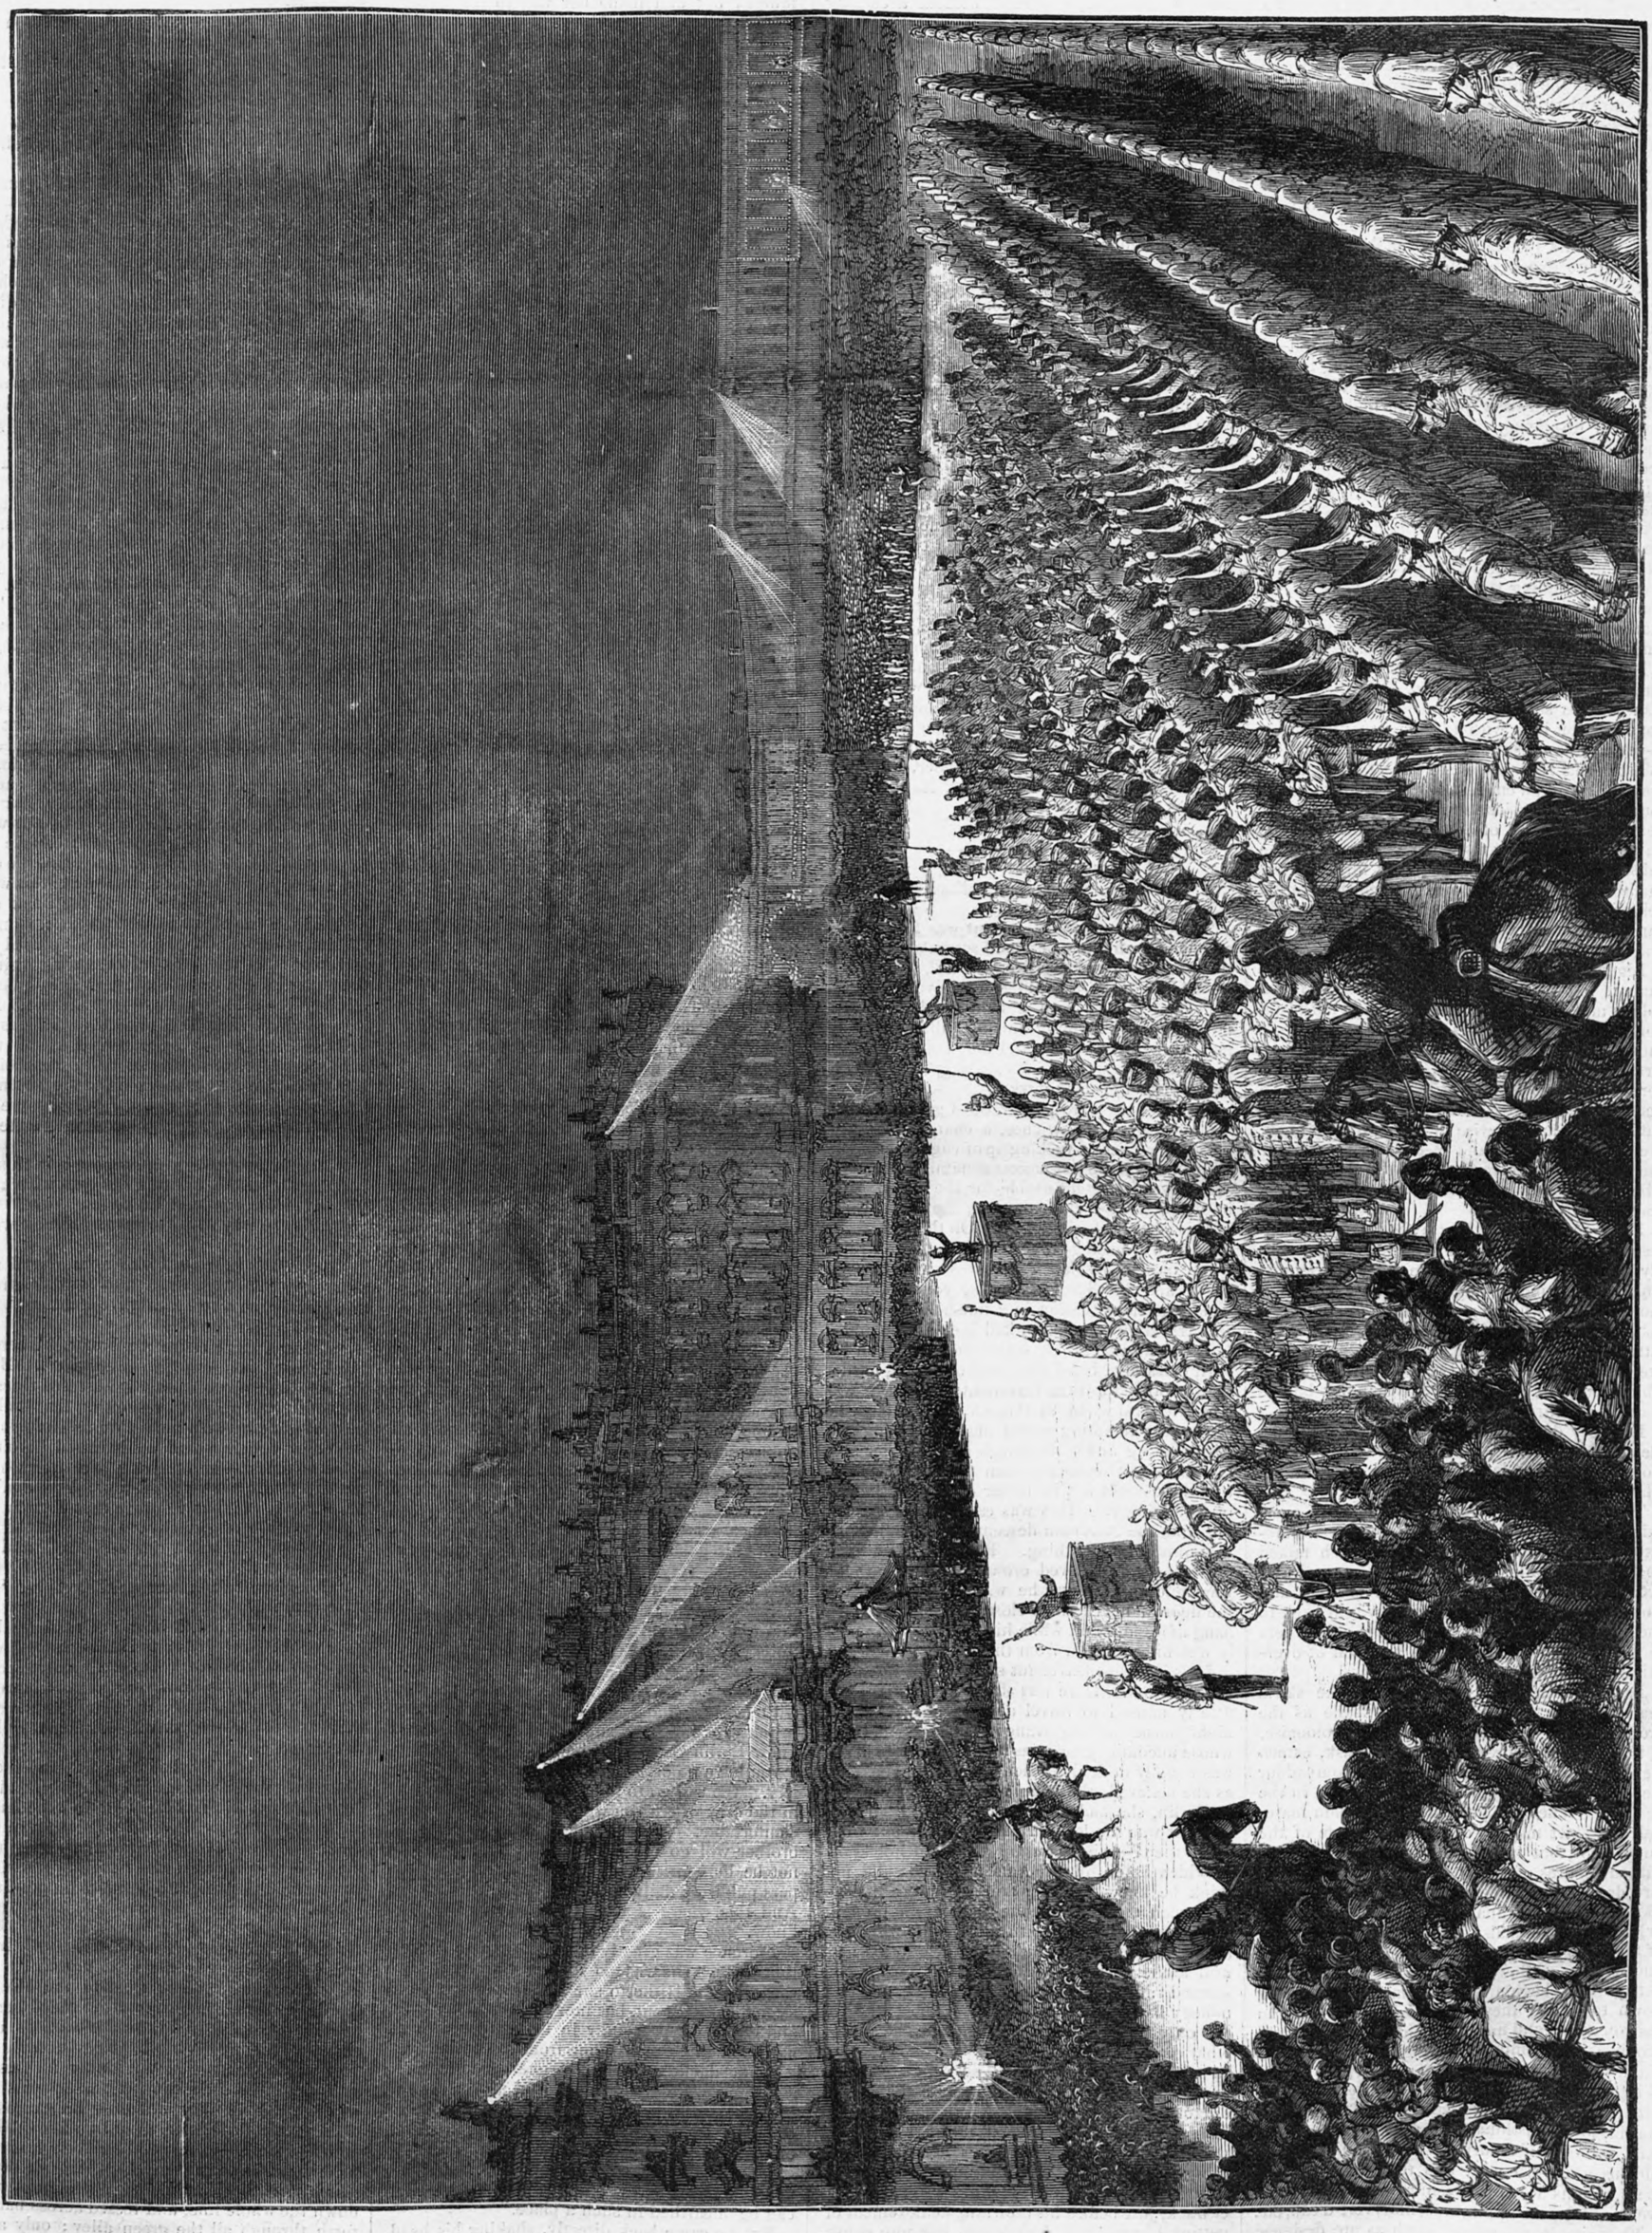
THE VISIT OF THE EMPEROR OF GERMANY TO ST. PETERSBURG.

A MONSTER concert formed a prominent feature in the recent festivities at St. Petersburg, and was something similar to the grand torch-light tattoo with which the Emperor William entertained his cousins of Russia and Austria at Berlin last September. A huge mass of musicians, powerfully reinforced by drums and trumpets, serenaded the Emperor of Germany and his host with a selection of national airs before the Winter Palace. Here, however, torches were supplanted by stars of gas and powerful electric suns, which, shining from the roof of the palace and the adjacent buildings, illuminated the scene. The space before the palace was lined with an immense crowd. Ivan, however, is a much more tractable spirit than Fritz, and the quiet, good-natured demeanor of the assembled thousands was a praiseworthy contrast to the turbulence of the Berliners. There was no pushing and swaying; a few unarmed soldiers easily kept free the space required for the musicians; the people of their own accord formed a lane through which persons might come and go, and not the slightest casualty occurred. The concert began on the arrival of the two Emperors from the opera with the Prussian national anthem (the English God Save the Queen). Of the quality of the music the less said the better, as 1550 musicians, plus 600 trumpets and 350 drums, not to mention three band-masters, are somewhat too unwieldy a number to produce perfect harmony. The Emperors appearing on the balcony, the band played the march of Frederick the Great, some national and classical airs, including Glinka's Life for the Czar; the Wacht am Rhein followed, and the performance concluded with the grand tattoo and hymn.



THE EMPEROR OF GERMANY AT ST. PETERSBURG—MILITARY CONCERT BY ELECTRIC LIGHT BEFORE THE WINTER PALACE.

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

AS the best likenesses are sometimes those which caricaturists draw with a few strokes of their pencil, while exaggerating the most striking features of their models, we can judge of the fashions by the way they are understood and worn by a few elegant extremists, especially such as we meet at the races. At the late races at Chantilly what most struck the eye were the tall bonnets and coiffures and the prodigious bustles displayed by certain leaders of fashion.

The coiffure, by which I mean what is made with the hair possessed or bought by the wearer, is becoming more and more a Louis XIV. peruke, with the curls falling from the crown of the head to the middle of the back in several rows of varied lengths, calling to mind the Falls of Niagara. The front hair on the temples is brushed backward or upward in such a manner as to leave the face completely bare—so much the worse for it if it is not fresh, young, and beautiful. On the sides (behind the ears) begin the cascades of curls, which go on increasing in length to the middle of the back; on this coiffure is perched a round hat, held in place by some inexplicable miracle, and on this hat, which, by-the-way, is very small, is piled every thing imaginable—flowers, ribbons, feathers, birds, and vegetables. The shape of the present hat savors far more of the art of the pastry-cook than that of the milliner. This shape is that of the bun, Savoy biscuit, or any other cake in the form of a tower, when it is not shaped and flattened like a tart, with appropriate trimming of cherries, etc.; for fruits are much worn on bonnets this season, and the imitation is marvelously successful: strawberries, gooseberries, cherries, raspberries—in a word, a complete dessert of red fruits, for fashion itself is becoming radical.

The same characteristic of excessive flattening in one place and excessive inflation in another which is remarked in the coiffure is also seen in the dress. Hoops have disappeared, and the skirt, with its polonaise or over-skirt, falls flat every where except at the bottom of the waist in the back, where are accumulated tournures, draperies, poufs, and loops of ribbon or stuff in such a manner as to produce a truly prodigious volume. I do not say that this is graceful—I only say that it is so. It is by avoiding all exaggeration, while conforming to the fashion in vogue, that really elegant women find an opportunity of displaying their tact and the correctness of their taste. It is certain that the eye accustomed to the pleats, loopings, poufs, drapings, etc., which have been carried to such excess of late years, can not abruptly accept flat dresses in the absence of all trimming; therefore we see all wrappings, without exception, adjusted in the back of the waist, in order to have a pretext for setting there enormous loops of ribbon with square ends, not very long. In this manner are adjusted mantelets, paletots, pelerines, and even points of black or white lace.

I must not omit to mention an attempt which may perhaps prove abortive, but which may also perhaps succeed in dethroning the present bonnets; for it is with fashion as with politics—you are never sure of the moral with either. What seems reasonable and acceptable one day may appear in an entirely different light twenty-four hours later; just as the party which numbers but a handful of adherents to-day may be an immense majority to-morrow. I speak of the substitution of wreaths of flowers for bonnets; to these wreaths is attached a Spanish mantilla veil of black lace. This is worn as yet only in carriages, but it was seen on the heads of several of our most elegant ladies at the late races.

Lingerie is more evident and less masculine than it has been for some years past. Linen collars and cuffs for morning dress are not abandoned, but their shape is no longer copied from those designed for men. As to the collar, it is straight as usual, but is folded back in two small corners in front, and entirely covered with a hem-stitched pleated band of fine linen. The cuffs, which are likewise of hem-stitched linen, are plain at the top and pleated on the side of the hand which corresponds to the little finger. These cuffs are larger than th old-fashioned plain cuffs.

For a more dressy toilette the lingerie is represented by pleated bands of white muslin, simply hemmed without lace, lace not being admissible on this kind of lingerie. These bands are more or less wide for the neck, according to taste, but very deep for the sleeves. When the latter are slashed to the elbow, the pleated bands are completed by one or two puffs trimmed with ribbon bows of medium size; a similar bow is worn at the throat.

For very dressy occasions precisely the same pleated bands and the same puffed sleeves are worn, but the whole is made of white silk tulle, which is extremely becoming.

The attempt at long dresses without over-skirts, or mixed dresses with over-skirts simulated by trimmings, which was so much talked about a few months ago, has proved a total failure. The dresses were made, it is true, and worn, but were almost immediately sent back to the dress-makers with instructions to adapt them to the reigning fashion by the addition of over-skirts and polonaises.

Fashion exacts this summer that the skirts shall be plain, but of the same shade as the ground of the material used for the polonaise, if the latter is figured, printed, damask, cameo (several shades of one color), or Pompadour (several different bright colors associated in the design). When the polonaise is of plain material, the skirt may be of a darker shade of the same color, but in all cases the skirt is plain, without figures of any kind. A great many foulard dresses are made in the following manner: Skirt of plain Havana brown (or any other color) foulard, a polonaise of Havana brown foulard of the same shade as the skirt, but with bouquets and wreaths of flowers of several shades of Havana brown, beginning with black and shading down to white; these dresses are charming in mauve, green, and maize. Polonaises with white grounds and Pompadour designs are worn over plain, very light gray, almost milk white, skirts. White, moreover, is very frequently combined with gray this summer, using the first, if it is muslin, for the polonaise, and the second for the skirt. For half-mourning black silk or velvet ribbons are worn with this toilette; otherwise these ribbons are of the fashionable colors, which are still very pale—pink, blue, lilac, vert-d'eau, etc.

Very simple polonaises, such as are designed for traveling and mourning dresses, are less draped, caught up, and puffed up than others of their kind. They are trimmed solely with a bias fold of silk, and are neither open nor closed in front, but are merely held together here and there by bows formed of two loops and two short ends of ribbon of the same color as the bias folds. These bows are set on at regular intervals from the throat to the bottom of the polonaise. Blouse-polonaises, not adjusted at the waist either in the front or the back, but only confined by a belt, are also seen, but less frequently. This garment is called the Creole blouse this season. It is also made much shorter, so as to form a kind of casaque, and of white or printed muslin, with a skirt of the same material. This is only a summer or country dress, which fashion permits without according it an official character.

I will proceed to describe a few dresses, which will serve as types of the summer fashions: Skirt of rather dark bluish-gray faille, trimmed on the bottom with a deep flounce edged with a bluish-gray bias fold of a lighter shade, and headed with a ruche edged with a similar bias fold. Over-skirt of striped foulard of dark and light bluish-gray. Plain waist, with vest front and flat square basque in the back of faille of the same color as the skirt. A bias fold of the same faille edges the over-skirt. The sleeves of the waist are of the same foulard as the over-skirt, with cuffs like the skirt.

Plain dark vert-de-gris foulard skirt, pleated perpendicularly in the front and trimmed with flounces in the back. Polonaise of light vert-de-gris crêpe de Chine, embroidered with dark vert-de-gris bouquets, the embroidery being executed with floss silk. The polonaise is trimmed with wide guipure of the same color, with embroidered bouquets of the same shade as the skirt. Above this guipure is a bias fold of foulard of the same shade as the skirt, and under this bias fold is narrow guipure, not embroidered, of the same shade as the polonaise. High basque-waist open in front. The polonaise is looped on the right side by a sash of faille ribbon of the same color as the skirt.

Trimmings (galloons and laces) embroidered with jet are worn more and more. The watered ribbons so much in fashion a few months ago are wholly abandoned. Scarfs are made of fine wool, imitating the Roman scarfs—that is, with stripes of several bright colors, red, yellow, black, green, and white, which will be worn at the sea-side in the guise of sashes. Sashes of all kinds are often fastened to a bow on the left shoulder, called the page bow.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

LEFT BEHIND.

"GET in, gentlemen and ladies! get in! get in!"

The conductor's hoarse shout was followed by a general rush and a pell-mell scramble all along the line of carriages; first, second, third class were filled in the twinkling of an eye, the doors shut and locked with a bang, and the train, prancing and curveting among walls and buildings, picked its way in and out, holding breath preparatory to settling into its long, steady swing over miles of open country.

Inside there were preparations going on too: a munching of sandwiches, a changing of stiff hats and bonnets, a tucking up of rugs and shawls, indicated that the passengers generally were making themselves comfortable for the night. But in the first-class compartment, No. 31, nothing of this sort was taking place. On the rack above were two traveling-bags, two packets of wraps, while on the cushion below was only one very quiet and bewildered-looking young damsel. This was the situation in a nutshell: the damsel's traveling companion had been left behind.

It was an excessively stupid proceeding on his part, certainly; but if there was one thing harder than another for Jack Davenant to resist, it was a crowd. So when, at this station just past, he saw a very tempting crowd indeed pressing and gesticulating under the lamps on the other side of the line, it seemed to him that the few minutes' halt could not be better employed than in investigating it. This was easily enough done, but, like the Avernian descent, revocare gradum was quite another thing. By a dextrous flank movement his beloved crowd got him into its very midmost, where he was struggling when the door of his carriage closed with that sudden bang aforesaid, and while his sister was anxiously watching for him from the opposite window.

Miss Florence Davenant sat still and reviewed the situation. Here was she, a girl of eighteen, utterly unused to travel alone, embarked on a night journey among strangers, in a strange land, whose uncouth speech—as it still seemed to her—was equally difficult to her ear and tongue. If, as she believed, the train went straight through to Berlin, she had only to sit quiet and go with it—that was the least of her troubles; but what to do then?—where to go? She did not know to which hotel John had meant to go; did not think he knew himself; and how were they to find each other when the next train brought him?—for that the next train would bring him all right she had not doubted, after the first natural anxiety, remembering that the crowd had seemed rather curious than threatening, and that nobody had shown any excitement about it. No, the only question was, what should she do?—what could she do?

"Ten minutes' stop!" The door was flung open, and the words thrown in by a flying conductor, already out of sight down the line, and Miss Florence roused herself out of the musings which had completely absorbed her to the perception that they were halting in a large station, and that she was intolerably thirsty. Her brother Jack, just before his crowning achievement of getting himself left, had teased her into drinking a glass of beer, which fiery beverage, to an unaccustomed palate, had parched her lips and throat to a dry heat that gave her some idea of the desert thirst she had read about. Fortunately she was not in a desert. She looked out eagerly, but at this time of night no small purveyors to the public were jingling their trays up and down; scarcely a figure was to be seen all along the platform. A few lamps glimmered through the darkness, some outside, some behind dim window-panes, one of the latter tantalizing her with glimpses of a ghostly array of bottles and glasses about the presiding genius who leaned among them, with a mouth so expressively open that one could almost see the melody that must be issuing from it. Florence sat debating with herself a minute or two, till, in desperation, she jumped out and made her way to the lighted window. It was a shabby sort of place inside—in fact, though she did not know it, the third-class waiting-room—and she half stopped, doubtfully, but the disreputable-looking sleeper, waking up with that suddenness peculiar to such public functionaries, demanded her pleasure, first yawning and then staring in her face while he served her. She set the glass down in a nervous hurry, and asked what was to pay.

"A kiss, my pretty Fraülein," answered the man, laying his grimy hand on her arm. She screamed, and just then a neat blow from somewhere sent the grinning head spinning down among its own bottles, with a great crash of glass. Florence started round to find herself face to face with a young man of very gentlemanly appearance, who addressed her first in German, and then, as she looked bewildered, in excellent English.

"You have missed your way, I think," said he. "Can I be of any assistance?"

"Oh, thank you," said she, rather confusedly. "If I were only back in the carriage—".

"I will take you there if you permit. These are not the most delightful sort of people for a young lady to encounter alone," said the newcomer, glancing contemptuously toward the fallen hero, who by this time had picked himself out of the bottles, and was feeling himself gingerly, as if to make sure there was nothing worse than glass broken, evidently not quite understanding what had happened to him. The stranger did not wait for him to make sure, but hastened Miss Florence away and put her back in No. 31. Then hesitating, with his hand on the door, he said, with a smile,

"I beg pardon—I was not aware—I put my things in here; but, if you wish, I can look for another carriage."

Miss Davenant did not know exactly what she ought to say; but, partly because it occurred to her that he had an equal right with herself there, and partly that her loneliness made her rather reluctant to lose this friend in need, she begged him not to inconvenience himself on her account. So he sat down opposite, in Jack's place, and just under Jack's pile of traps.

"By-the-way," said he, lightly, as he settled himself. "First punish and then hear! What was that blackguard saying to you?"

"I think he meant to—to kiss me," answered Florence, startled by the suddenness of the question into a more direct reply than she would otherwise have given.

"Is it possible!" said the young man, with a quick glance and smile, instantly suppressed, however.

There are many varieties of mouth in the world—good, bad, and indifferent—some which seem fit only to drop pearls and diamonds, and others toads and snakes, like the rival princesses of the fairy tale. Now Florence Davenant's mouth happened to be an eminently kissable one. It would have been difficult for any masculine observer, at least, to look at its sweet rosy arch without remembering that, as the old song has it, "lips were not made for speech alone." So the young lady's champion at this moment was conscious of a certain guilty sympathy with the fellow he had knocked down, which caused him to bite his own lips lest they should betray his amusement and its cause to the dark eyes opposite. He need not have feared; those dark eyes were utterly innocent of any such suspicion, and were only speculating, as they furtively studied his face, as to the propriety of asking advice from this good-natured, good-looking German, who was so very gentlemanly, and spoke English so remarkably well. That last consideration weighed down the scale, and she confided to him the difficulties in which careless brother John had involved her. The stranger, who had rather wondered to see so young and pretty a girl taking such a journey by herself, listened with interest, and begged to offer his services, in that missing gentleman's place. "And as I know Berlin very well," he added, with a smile, "you have no occasion to feel the slightest anxiety. We will go to the Hôtel du Nord, the best in the city, where you will be perfectly quiet and comfortable. Very likely that is where your brother will go too; but, at any rate, you can not be long in finding one another, as the papers publish a daily list of all the hotel arrivals. And then there is your banker's register, you know."

Florence was greatly relieved by these suggestions, which she was too young a traveler to have thought of. Hitherto she had not been able to sleep for worriment, but now she closed her eyes, and dozed off peacefully in her corner with an agreeable sense of freedom from responsibility.

It was daylight when she woke. The morning sunbeams were giving a cheerful aspect even to the desolate little station, about which some of the hungrier passengers were prowling in search of something to break their fast with.

"I think I'll go and forage too," said her neighbor. "I have some curiosity to see what can be unearthed in such a place."

But he came back directly, shaking his head. "Can you make a breakfast off beer and forty different kinds of sausage?" he asked, gravely. "If not, I'm afraid you must content yourself with a roll, and save your appetite for the Minden buffet. It won't be Delmonico's exactly, but—"

"Why, you know New York?" interrupted Florence, delightedly. "You have been in America?"

He did not answer immediately, being just then too busy with his traveling-sack, the disposition of which seemed to give him some trouble. "I beg your pardon," he said then, turning round, and resuming his seat opposite her. "Been in America? Oh yes! certainly I have been there."

"I might have guessed as much. You speak English so well you might almost be taken for one of us."

"Do you think so, really? But then I—" He stopped short, smiling to himself.

"You have had a great deal of practice, I suppose," supplemented Florence.

"Well, yes; I began very young."

"Yes, that makes a great difference. And then, you know, English is not nearly so difficult as German."

"I did not find it difficult, certainly," answered the young man.

The discovery that he had some knowledge of the things and places with which she was most familiar made the new acquaintance seem quite like an old friend, with whom she could chat at ease, and, indeed, it was a very animated discussion that was interrupted by the whistle of the train nearing Minden station, scattering a picturesque group of peasant women, decked out for their visit to the town in holiday costume—short striped petticoats, wide white ruffs and caps, and scarlet cloaks finely set off by the young green of the springing grain fields.

"Confess," said Miss Davenant's vis-à-vis, "you see nothing like that in America."

"No," admitted Florence, "nor like that, either," pointing to another group of women, prematurely bent and withered, sunburned and wind-blown out of all feminine likeness, laboring like so many beasts of burden by the road-side.

"The medal has its reverse, certainly," said he, smiling at the retort. "But here we are. Now to try if the land flows with something besides beer and sausages."

It must have done so, judging from the smooth, satisfied faces which the train took away, so different from the sharp, hungry visages it had brought half an hour before. Miss Florence settled herself comfortably in her corner again, and took out her novel, whose heroine she had left in difficulties just as Jack had left her, but finding by-and-by that, by those ingenious arts which it is the novelist's privilege to exercise, page after page flowed on without seeming to bring the crisis any nearer, tired, too, of seeing the letters waltzing madly together, she tossed the book aside with a little impatient jerk that sent it from the cushions to the floor. Her vis-à-vis picked it up and kept it in his hand, instead of returning to the paper he had been reading. "May I be permitted?" he said, turning over the leaves. Florence saw him smile and raise his eyebrows ever so little—at her taste for sentiment, she thought, with school-girlish sensitiveness on such points.

"Of course that seems pure waste of time to you," she said, aggressively. "I suppose you never read any thing lighter than Fichte and Kant."

"Now why should you suppose any thing so horrible?" said he, meeting her eyes with a suppressed gleam of fun in his own.

"It is the way with Germans," she answered, sententiously.

"Indeed!" said he, looking more and more amused. "But, you see, that is your error in considering me a representative German."

"And aren't you?"

"I fear I can't claim the honor. There are black sheep, you know, in every flock. But as for thinking novel-reading a waste of time—on the contrary, I was just regretting that it should be time gone by with me; I do so envy you the power of weeping over a distressed heroine in three volumes!—or laughing over her, which I used to find quite as good fun. You don't believe me, I see; but to prove that I know what I am talking about, shall I tell you the dark young man's secret in this very book, and how he turns out?"

"No, pray don't," interrupted Florence. "You have read it!"

"Upon my word, I have not read it; but I have read its brothers and sisters, uncles, aunts, and cousins, and recognize the family likeness. You believe in the dark young man at present, but when you find him a delusion and a snare in the third volume—as you will—remember, please, that I told you so."

He was certainly laughing at her, thought Florence, recalling his look and smile, and having no notion of quietly submitting to be laughed at, she returned to the charge valiantly; and as the battle-ground was continually changing, by the time they reached their journey's end each had learned the other's opinions on a good many points.

Had Jack come? That was naturally his sister's waking thought the next morning. If he had, it was not, at any rate, to the Hôtel du Nord; so her German friend informed her, and offered to accompany her to the banker's, on the chance of finding her brother's name on the book.

It was a beautiful May morning, all fresh and stirring. The long rows of linden-trees under whose shadows they walked—the glorious lindens that, a little later, would be full of flowers and fragrance—were nodding their leafy heads together, whispering myriad-tongued secrets, which the knavish wind caught up and carried down the whole line, and tossed across back and forth through all the green alley; only as, fortunately, these secrets were in the tree language, they were lost on any but leaf ears. The magnificent street was full of color and movement, coming and going, like an army passed in review by the great Frederick mounted high up yonder on his bronze war-horse. Florence's eyes wandered from sculptured to living form, and thence to tree and garden, fountain and statue and palace, with ever renewed enjoyment. The hum of the varying crowd, the fresh toilettes, the bright, healthy faces, all were in pleasant harmony with the season's brisk air and springing verdure. It would be perfect—if only Jack were there.

But Jack was not there; at least his name nowhere appeared on the banker's register, though Florence, in her anxiety to make sure, began her search at a date of several days before it could by any possibility be there. But at last even she had to give it up, and left the office listening rather disconsolately to her companion's attempts at comfort. And yet, had she but known it, the missing Jack himself was at that moment pursuing her along the Friedrich Strasse, causing more than one head to turn curiously after the "verrückter Engländer" who went bowling along a crowded pavement in that fashion. Unfortunately Jack Davenant was not of a build for this sort of thing, and after a few paces felt himself completely blown; so, pulling up at a street corner, he beckoned one of the omnipresent "commissionnaires" waiting for a "job," and panted out, in very broken German indeed, "See the young lady—with tall man—white jacket and red rose—catch 'em—give you a thaler!"

A thaler for half a minute's run! The lean, long-legged varlet set off at speed. Miss Davenant's escort felt a touch on his shoulder, and faced round on a fellow who touched his commissionnaire's cap with a grin, while he said, in a mixed jargon, helped out by signs, "Entschuldigen, S'! The dicke Herr vill mitspeak."

"Jack!" cried Florence, in an ecstasy, flying back to meet the rotund figure toiling after his light-heeled Mercury.

"Well, Floy," said he, catching both her hands, "a pretty race you have run me! Who—Van Huysen!" he interrupted himself, quitting his sister and grasping the new-comer in turn. "Of all people in the world! Where did you drop from?"

"You know him!" involuntarily exclaimed Florence, in her astonishment.

"Know him!" repeated Jack, staring at her; "know him! Well, I should think so—eh, Van?"

"A little," answered Van, with a smile. Then turning to Florence: "I must apologize for not telling you before, but I did not myself know until I saw the name in your novel, and then, after that compliment to my English, I really had not the heart— The fact is, Jack," as Jack's bewildered face called for an explanation, "your sister took me for a German."

"For a German—you!" and Jack burst out laughing. "What on earth put such a ridiculous idea into your head, Floy?"

"Now I think it was very natural," hastily interposed Van Huysen, auguring ill to himself from the young lady's silence and heightened color. "One naturally looks for Germans in Germany. Besides, I spoke to her first in German."

"That reminds me," put in Jack. "What stroke of good luck brought you to my sister's help?"

"I should think it was time you remembered to ask," said Florence, with a little toss of the head. She was a good deal provoked with herself for her stupid mistake, and a little with its object. How he must have laughed! Nay, how he had laughed under her very eyes, she thought, recalling smiles and tones which had puzzled her at the time. But what right had he to look and speak so like a real German and yet not be one at all? She felt the need of visiting her vexation on somebody, and Jack offered himself; so it was in a perceptibly ill-used tone that she said, "I should think it was time! I might have been half-way to the world's end for any thing you could tell."

"Don't harp on unpleasant facts, Miss Floy.—Think of it, Van. I take this young woman from school, make a martyr of myself among outside barbarians in order to put the last finishing varnish on her education, and in return she seizes the very first opportunity to disappear, leaving me to worry myself to skin and bone."

"As we see," laughed Van, looking down at friend Jack's jolly proportions.

"I was just on my way," pursued Jack, gravely, "to the Ober-what-you-call-'em, chief of police here, with your photograph, Floy. If I hadn't met you quite promiscuous here, you might have had the pleasure of recognizing your face on a yellow poster, with a reward attached, which would have served you right for leaving me in the hands of the Philistines."

"By-the-way, Jack," said Florence, "what did the crowd turn out to be?"

Jack's face assumed a look of deep disgust. "A beggarly swindle! A blind fiddler scraping away for a pair of groschens. I never saw such people as these," went on Jack, looking round him with a superior air; "they are the most curious race under heaven. If a German baby cuts its finger, the whole neighborhood turns out to see it bound up."

"Followed by Yankee inquisitiveness in the person of John Davenant, Esquire," added Van Huysen.

"Yankee to yourself, Sir! I happen to be a New Yorker, with a New Yorker's inquiring mind, which, I take it, is a wholly different thing. But have the goodness to inform me where we are bound for at present? Where are you staying? Oh, the Hôtel du Nord, Unter den Linden, eh—among the kings and kaisers? All very fine if one goes in for grandeur, which I don't. Shall I not take mine ease in mine inn? My lucky stars sent me up there in the Koenig-graetzer Strasse," said Jack, vaguely nodding his head backward to indicate the direction, "the Hôtel West End—or Vest End, as these German fellows say—regular cockneys, aren't they?—a place where they make a lobster-mayonnaise! By Jove!" said Jack, solemnly, "it's almost worth while being a lobster, to have such an apotheosis!"

"For shame, Jack," laughed Florence, her little cloud now quite over, "to prefer a lobster-salad to that beautiful Unter den Linden!"

"'Fine words butter no parsnips,' as the poet says, meaning that one can't lunch off a row of lindens nor an emperor's palace; though, as for that, I wish you distinctly to understand that the Vest End has got its palace too, exactly opposite, in a big garden, at present white with—with—"

"The snowy buds of spring," suggested Van, encouragingly.

"Just so! Or the royal washing, I'm not prepared to say which. But you can come and see for yourselves."

And as, in fact, Jack could not be torn from the mayonnaise artist, the other two, on the Mohammed-and-mountain principle, did come to take up their abode opposite Prince Albert's garden, of which the wall, overhung with white acacias and snow-balls in full bloom, bounded the breakfast-table view very agreeably under the warm May sunshine. That month—which would seem to be sent principally for the confounding of poets and almanac-makers—can make itself on occasions unutterably odious in Berlin. But this season was a happy exception. There were no cold, sour looks; the cheery sun rose and retired in unvarying good humor, and the blue German skies smiled benign approval on the trio of sight-seers who went forth day after day with a perseverance worthy, so Jack opined at last, of a better cause. In spite of the fascinations of the West End, he was the one to get restless first. It was one morning in the garden aforesaid—where Florence and Van were given to "mooning" about in a way rather trying to a sociable third person—in that pleasant, shady, rose-embowered spot where the old hound, "most faithful and regretted of friends," lies buried, that, after a frightful succession of yawns, "Haven't we had about enough of this?" demanded Jack, suddenly. "What say to making a move, you two?"

They two, with suspicious unanimity, intimated that they were well enough contented where they were.

"Strange," said Jack, with an air of profound reflection, "how little we know ourselves! If you remember, Floy, you were so sure of disliking Berlin, and now you seem rather to have a notion for ending your days here—like that old beggar there," poking at the tablet at his feet.

"Perhaps," retorted Van Huysen, on behalf of Florence, who, for some reason or other, had colored very much at Jack's remark, "your sister doesn't like to make any move, for you'll get yourself left behind again."

"Humph!" said Jack, who may not have been as blind as some people seemed to think. "Maybe 'twould be my best plan too. I've an idea, do you know, that about the most obliging thing I ever did in my life was that same getting myself left behind. Eh, Floy, what do you think?"

"I'm sure I don't know what you mean, Jack," answered Florence, with a face on fire.

Jack looked hard at her, and was impolite enough slowly and deliberately to wink his right eye. "Then let's go get some lunch," said he. Which they did.

The omelette soufflée was tender, sweet, ethereal as a dream of spring; the mayonnaise composer had surpassed himself; it was almost a pity such works of genius should be wasted on any body as inappreciative as Florence Davenant appeared. Fortunately, Jack made good her deficiencies.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Amateur Coachmen.—The Beginning of the End of "Sir Roger."—Disclaimers.—The Guild of Literature and Art.

IN New York, I hear, you have a Four-in-hand Club, or something answering to it, which shows that other things travel besides ideas. The utter want of imagination that such an institution betokens, even when original, is deplorable. If our young aristocrats drove six horses, or four abreast, or four in a line, there would be some scintillation of novelty about it; but the present rage is merely the reproduction of mail-coaches when the use of them has departed. All London went to-day to see "the meet of the drags" at the Powder Magazine in Hyde Park; but, after all, the spectacle was nothing more than—indeed, it was exactly the same as—the starting of the mails in the old times from the General Post-office, which used to happen every morning. The only difference is that there are more ladies who take outside places. The seats are not comfortable, and unless these damsels be above the usual height, their legs (if delicacy will permit the allusion) are apt to dangle; but then it is such a satisfaction to the female heart to be driven, no matter where, by my Lord Tom Noddy. At one time Mr. Thomas Carlyle used to see in the devotion of our aristocracy to horseflesh a proof of its inaptitude for any thing else, but, unlike Pluto in the case of his young disciple, I suppose he now regards "their matchless skill to curb the steed and guide the wheel" as evidence of their political worth. It is not too much to say that the rising generation who are born to govern this country take a far deeper interest in driving four-in-hand than in any political or social question whatsoever. What is the most inane feature of these "meets" is the number of tall, solemn swells who sit behind the drivers, and of course have no share in handling the ribbons. What can the satisfaction be to them? And how particularly uncomfortable, I notice, looks the tall, solemn swell for whom there is no room in the front seats, and who has to sit behind fronting the two grooms! Besides the Four-in-hand Club, there is the Coaching Club, which is merely a reproduction of the same thing, except that its members are so indiscreet as to use a uniform with a dreadfully close resemblance to livery, and which makes the drivers more like the real thing than they suspect. The horses are as sleek and shining, the harness as glittering, as in the elder club; the men as irreproachably dressed, and as ineffably dull. But I must not permit it to be supposed that all our "gilt youth" are as useless as these show coachmen: these are but the drones; the true bees are fully as numerous (though there are five-and-thirty of the club drags in the Park to-day), and do absolutely both horse and drive the coaches in the summer-time from London to a score of different places—Brighton, Windsor, Tunbridge Wells, etc., etc.

An easy method of becoming personally acquainted with our young nobility is to secure the box seat on any of these routes, whereby you are sure to sit next to a noble lord, and may have the pleasure of giving him half a crown, which it is humor to accept with the true coachman's salute. It will probably soon become the fashion for at present unemployed members of our "governing families" to play the guard and toot upon the horn. Curiously enough, this absurd fashion of driving coaches is considered to be a complete novelty and an ebullition of original genius, whereas there was precisely the same crop of harmless lunatics among our great-grandfathers. Captain Gronow tells us how they used to imitate the regular stagers with such particularity that, finding they could not expectorate (or whistle to their horses, I really forget which) in the true professional manner, they were wont to bore a hole in their front teeth in order to effect it. For the convenience of officers at Aldershot camp, who chance to be in town on only one day's leave, Lord Guildford and the Hon. Mr. Herbert (not Auberon, of course) have started coaches which leave London at three in the morning!

The Chilian witnesses so long expected by the prosecution in the Tichborne case have at last arrived; and one of them, in whose house the claimant staid for three months at Melipilla, has recognized him in court as Arthur Orton. Clearer evidence of the public conviction of his being an impostor it is impossible to have than this—that this disclosure, made to his very face, caused no particular sensation. The whole matter is, indeed, a foregone conclusion, and "Sir Roger's" only chance of escaping the punishment he has so richly deserved lies in the death of one of the twelve jurymen—an accident that, considering the enormous length of time over which the trial must extend, is almost as likely to occur as not.

You would have thought that the topic of our university boat-race ought to be exhausted by this time; yet the other night at dinner I heard it once more warmly contested that Oxford ought by rights to have won, though, as you know, their opponents had an easy victory. I did not pay much attention to the controversy, because it is my experience that no athletic encounter of any kind, from a prize-fight to a hopping match, has ever taken place the result of which has been accepted by the losing side as decisive; but presently I heard the partisan of the dark blue affirm that not only ought Oxford to have won, but that he could prove it. Then I did prick up my ears. "Yes," said he, "I will make you all admit that they would have won had it not been for the bridge." "For what bridge?" asked the universal voice, contemptuously. "For the *Cam*bridge." I thought it was a very vulgar sell; don't you?

The New Magdalen, which, I believe, made its first appearance in America in Harper's Magazine, has just been produced at our Olympic Theatre, and has been pronounced a great success, the author having been called upon the stage before the play was concluded, as well as afterward: at the same time, there is much exception taken to the morality of its teaching.

Are "disclaimers" common in your New York press, or are you wise enough across the Atlantic to let your friends discriminate? Our Times is full of them. Whenever John Smith is taken up on a charge of murder, or steals a handkerchief, or is overcome with liquor in the public streets, a perfect army of John Smiths write to the papers, each eager to assert that it is not he who has done these things. In the case of a rogue in grain, we can imagine him to be solicitous not to have any offense attributed to him beyond those for which he knows himself responsible; but what a simpleton must that honest man be who, when any thing inconsistent with his character and position happens to be committed by a namesake, hastens to clear himself, as though he deemed that all who know him must else believe him the offender. It would be hardly more foolish to write, "Probable as the fact may seem from what is known of my character and antecedents, I do assure you that in this case the similarity of names is a mere coincidence."

In the Times of this morning Mr. Brownlow North, "the well-known lay preacher," begs to intimate that he is not the Mr. Brownlow North alluded to in a paragraph headed "Amateur Walking Match," which appeared on Monday. People as a rule do not entertain a high opinion of professional "lay preachers," but, save for this "disclaimer," who would have ever connected this eloquent and serious gentleman with the feat of walking five miles within the hour with a seven-pound brick in each hand! And yet, I dare say, this indiscreet individual is credited by his admirers with the possession of the most exclusive intelligence respecting "fate, free-will, foreknowledge absolute," and is no "small potato" in his own field.

"The Guild of Literature and Art," established by the late Mr. Dickens and Lord Lytton from the proceeds of their amateur acting, is about to be "wound up" in Chancery—a phrase which signifies the reverse of "set agoing"—and its assets divided between the Literary Fund (to which it was started in opposition) and the Dramatic Authors Society.

SKETCHES ON THE LINE OF MARCH.

See illustrations on page 413.

OUR sketches this week will give some idea of the difficulties encountered by the Orenburg column of the Khivan expedition. The road itself presents enormous obstacles, even under the most favorable conditions, but it was this year rendered more impassable than ever by the immense quantities of snow that had fallen, and which continued to increase until the beginning of April. This winter is said by the inhabitants to have been the hardest experienced for a hundred years. When the weather did break, the country was inundated with the melted snow; but even this was a change for the better, as it insured a plentiful supply of water, and enabled the troops to obtain some slight amount of forage. Two of our views represent the mountain fortress Fort Ak-Tubin, and the Emba River and fort, where the detachment took a breathing halt toward the end of March; and a third illustration their camp and dépôt during their stay, the troops having built tents of mud—a far more agreeable habitation than the bell tents represented in our sketch of the camp on the frontier of Chan-Diert-Kul, which must have been but poor protection against the inclemency of the weather. Far more comfortable are the Turcoman tents, in our illustration of a "Night Camp of the Russian Troops," where the soldiers have secured tents similar to those used by the nomad tribes of Turkestan. These tents are formed of canvas stretched over a wooden framework, and are stated by M. Vámbéry to be singularly comfortable, cool in summer, genially warm in winter, and well able to withstand the terrible hurricanes that sweep across the steppes. Even in our sketch they have a warm and cozy appearance, when contrasted with the snow lying deep outside. Two other cuts illustrate the Tsteshes station, on the line of march from Orenburg, and the tomb of Tlesches, a renowned chief of the Kirghese, which is situated near the river Temir. From the difficulties of its march, as well as the distance to be traversed, the Orenburg column has been behind the western detachments, which are said to have succeeded in reducing Khiva to submission without assistance. The Orenburg detachment, however, was evidently more intended to awe and keep quiet the various unruly tribes of the surrounding districts than to take any part in the subjection itself of Khiva, unless, indeed, in the event of failure of the western columns.

MR. GLADSTONE IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

See illustration on page 412.

WE present our readers this week with a portrait, drawn from life, of an illustrious person whose name has lately been more than ever in men's mouths. Mr. Gladstone, the subject of our sketch, was born in the year 1809, and is the son of a Liverpool merchant. He is of Scotch descent, and his grandfather, Mr. Andrew Robertson, was Provost of Dingwall. Mr. Gladstone was an Eton boy, thence passing to Christ-church, Oxford, where he brilliantly distinguished himself, obtaining a double first class when he was in his twenty-second year, and three years later graduating as Master of Arts. Fourteen years after he had left college, when he was already a great man in Parliament, Oxford conferred upon him the degree of D.C.L.; and thus, if he were not known by other titles, he might be addressed as "Dr. Gladstone, M.A.," which, as Mr. Pepys says, "it is pretty to know." Macaulay, in his review of Mr. Gladstone's famous essay on "Church and State," speaks of the author as "a young man of unblemished character.....who ever since he was one-and-twenty has been a distinguished debater in the House of Commons." This is not quite accurate, as the future Premier was in his twenty-third year when Newark first returned him to Parliament. He sat for Newark till 1845, when Oxford University returned him as its representative, and retained him till the memorable election of 1865, when he undertook that momentous tour through South Lancashire which gave birth to the "Upas-tree" pledge, and resulted in his triumphant election for the division. In 1868, however, South Lancashire repented of its choice, and refuge was found for the Premier in Greenwich, which borough he has since continued to represent in Parliament. Mr. Gladstone's political rise was very rapid, he being appointed a Lord of the Treasury in 1834, Under-Secretary for the Colonies in 1835, Vice-President of the Board of Trade in 1841, President in 1843, Secretary of State for the Colonies in 1845, Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1852, and Premier in 1868. As leader of the House of Commons he has been excelled by some in tact and temper, but by none in eloquence, and in the high-mindedness and purity of purpose that command esteem and respect. His is the most familiar figure in the House, not alone by reason of the height of his official position, but by the constancy of his attendance, and the frequency of his participation in the debates. Day after day he is in his place at half past four, and rarely leaves till the House is up, at whatever hour of the morning the deliverance may be effected. There is one regularly recurring epoch of the evening, known as the dinner hour, when the House is almost empty, and when honorable members who can not "catch the Speaker's eye" in the full tide of debate struggle for precedence and deliver long speeches, which, happily for the British public, are never reported. At this "hour"—which usually means two, and sometimes three—the leading members of the House take their ease at their dining-tables, returning about nine or ten o'clock, like giants refreshed, and prepared to carry on the business of the nation till any hour of the morning. But Mr. Gladstone is in his place even then—with legs stretched out, hands folded before him, head laid back on the cushion of the seat, and the pale, weary-looking, deeply furrowed face, in which only the closed eyes seem at rest, turned upward to the flood of light that falls from the glass roof. He seems as if he slept; but when presently, or a couple of hours after, he gets up to close the debate, it will appear that he has heard every word, and is ready with an answer conceived in subtle argument, and expressed in flowing eloquence. Unlike his great rival on the opposite bench, Mr. Gladstone is often himself carried away by the passion his eloquence inspires in his hearers. When Mr. Disraeli is going to speak he approaches the table with cool deliberation, lays his hands on the dispatch-box before him, and rarely moves, except to put his hands in his coat-tail pockets and slowly balance himself as he proceeds to utter a sentence more telling than the average. Mr. Gladstone, when on great occasions he is moved to follow a member addressing the House, leans forward, sitting on the uttermost edge of the seat, regards the Speaker with a terribly eager face, and when he receives the signal that gives him leave to rise, leaps up, and, holding on to the dispatch-box, begins to speak in a voice which betrays the emotion that long practice only just enables him to master. But he always does master it till, later on, when he has cleared the way by argument, he gives himself up to the passionate denunciation of a wrong, or the earnest invitation to do what he holds to be the right thing, and then his splendid voice fills the chamber, and the noble emotion that possesses him is communicated to his entranced audience. The House of Commons without Mr. Gladstone would be like the play of Hamlet with the Queen's son left out, and, perhaps, the most striking tribute that could be paid to the value of an individual statesman was rendered by the manifestation of blank despair which lately appeared in the columns of some of the English journals when the writers felt themselves called upon to refute the supposition that a liberal government might be formed without the co-operation and leadership of the right honorable member for Greenwich.

THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—[A SKETCH FROM LIFE.]

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. J. L.—Chambéry is thick cambric, and washes well; Chambéry gauze is a fine grenadine. Bands, cuffs, pockets, and collar of blue Chambéry are put on white sailor suits; embroidery is far more dressy and expensive.

MRS. R. R.—Materials for making point lace are sold at the fancy stores here.

MRS. C. B. H.—If you make your new black silk with a châtelaine polonaise, you can wear the over dress with your other dresses. Black silk will be best for a sleeveless jacket to wear with your black and white dress; a purple jacket or a white polonaise would be pretty with the purple dress.

MRS. L. L.—The sailor blouse is not fastened to the dress skirt. It has a rubber string in a hem at the bottom that gathers it loosely around the waist, while the part above it hangs over on the hips in a bag-like, easy, sailor fashion.

ANTEROS.—The Cryptogram is published in book form by Harper & Brothers, and sent by mail on receipt of $1 50.

LEILA.—A sleeveless jacket and over-skirt of brown foulard would be pretty with your Japanese silk. Use ruffles or fringe instead of lace. Use wooden button-moulds covered with brown foulard.

PERPLEXED.—A lace shawl is a safer investment than a sacque, and more becoming to tall figures. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 22, Vol. VI.

ALICE.—Read "How to make Black Silk Dresses," in Bazar No. 19, Vol. VI.

CANADIAN.—Brown yak lace worth $1 25 to $1 75 will trim your dress prettily.

MISS M. E. B.—You did not inclose 25 cents for pattern. Flounce the back of your silk, and trim the front with long puffs. Make a heart-shaped basque. We do not reply by mail.

INQUIRER.—Merely face the collar, cuffs, and pockets of your Turkish traveling polonaise. Do not trim it on the edge, but hem it.

A. D.—Grenadine skirts are not lined with silk, but are worn over a silk petticoat, or else the grenadine skirt may be dispensed with, and flounces of grenadine set on the silk. Roll a hem on the edge of the flounce, and gather it at top with a puff above it. Make a basque on thick silk lining throughout.

MRS. M. E. F.—Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 19, Vol. VI., for trimming mourning silks, also Bazar No. 21, Vol. VI. Use the Loose Front Polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 23, Vol. VI., for your Australian crape suit.

M. Q.—The pattern of Loose Front Polonaise illustrated in Bazar No. 23, Vol. VI., is what you want. It is double-breasted, but you can fold back the fronts and make a single-breasted garment from it. Price 25 cents.

BAZAR.—We have no patterns of under-skirts. The Supplement of Bazar No. 16, Vol. VI., contains the pattern you want, which is one of the most stylish costumes of the season. We have no pattern of the basque in No. 18. The waist and sleeves of cashmere polonaises are lined with thin silk or farmer's satin when not close-fitting, otherwise thick lining silk or else silesia is used.

JANE G.—We can not insert diagrams at the request of each subscriber to suit individual wants.

A. W. A.—We have no pattern of demi-polonaises. Silk lace or thread is more appropriate than yak for grenadine. Sashes matching the dress in color are worn on the streets. Boys do not wear Normandy caps. Get a lace turban for your baby.

G. F. P.—Crimped tape fringe is worn in light mourning. A grenadine polonaise and lustreless silk skirt will be suitable for you.

COIFFURES.

IF any one thinks that because the so-called chignons have been abandoned, false hair is no longer worn, he is greatly mistaken. More real hair is purchased, and more worn at the present time, than ever before, especially in this country, because more persons can afford to pay for it here than elsewhere; and the impression having been pretty widely distributed that substitutes were unhealthy, as well as uncleanly, even the poorest women contrive to save enough to buy the small genuine "switch," which on Sundays, and all important occasions, adds the crown to their achievements in the hair-dressing line.

In order to learn something reliable of the present condition and prospects of the hair trade, we called upon Mr. L. SHAW, who has recently removed his store and manufactory to 364 Bowery, corner Fourth Street. Mr. SHAW is probably the largest dealer in human hair in the city; his operations are on a grand scale, and afford him facilities for purchase and preparation not usually possessed by wholesale or retail dealers. Through the medium of a partner who resides abroad, agents are constantly employed traversing the countries of Bohemia and Switzerland, engaged in the purchase of the beautiful hair of the peasant girls of those countries, whenever it can be obtained for money. This is shipped direct to New York, Mr. SHAW using none but hair of his own importation, prepared in his own factory, made up by his own hands, forty-five of whom are constantly employed in making up, mounting, and the like, goods which, when finished, are guaranteed.

Mr. SHAW also guarantees, in like manner, that all waterfall curls sold by him are made of naturally curly hair, and not of straight hair scalded and baked, as is generally the case, or of part straight and part curly hair, which, in a short time, requires to be all baked over together to keep in place, and is then quickly reduced to dry, brittle threads.

His curls require only to be dampened and brushed over a stick to be restored to original freshness and beauty; are lightly yet thoroughly and beautifully mounted, and, considering the cost of curly hair, very moderate in price. The principal forms in which hair is used are braided switches, coronet braids, long "waterfall" curls, back sets of curls, smaller centre sets, to use in conjunction with braids, and frizettes for the forehead. A very nice switch thirty-two inches long can be purchased for $10, smaller coronet braids at proportionately lower prices. Long curls, to match a $10 switch, costs $6 per pair. There are very long and even curls, of a choice quality of hair, as high as $20 per pair.

Gray hair is a great spécialité nowadays, and the nearer white the more rare and desirable it is. Mr. SHAW pays great attention to this, and has many fine specimens of human hair in beautiful silvery shades of gray.

A common method among dealers, in order to produce low-priced "human hair," is to mix an ounce of good hair with an ounce of Chinese and an ounce fine, dyed goat's hair. So cleverly is this done, that it is almost impossible for any but an expert to detect the trick. The purchaser congratulates herself on getting a really choice article at a ridiculously low price, and does not find out her mistake until the dyed hair begins to crop out and drop off.

A great advantage to ladies purchasing at a large establishment, like that of Mr. SHAW, consists in being able to obtain the exact shade of hair required. Mr. SHAW is extremely particular upon this point, and labors with the conscientiousness of an artist to fulfill conditions in this respect. His establishment, corner of Fourth Street and the Bowery, is interesting in many respects, and we advise ladies to pay it a visit before going to the country.—[Daily Graphic.]

EVERY mother who has a crying baby, or children subject to croup and stomach-complaints, can rely upon Castoria to keep the child well and give it rest. There are but few nurses in New York who do not use Castoria. It should be in every house.—[Com.]

TAKE YOUR DYEING AND CLEANING to the New York Dyeing and Printing Establishment, Staten Island; 98 Duane St., 752 Broadway, and 610 Sixth Ave., New York; 164 and 166 Pierrepont St., Brooklyn; 40 North Eighth St., Philadelphia. No other offices.—[Com.]

THE PRIDE OF THE GREAT WEST.—The Wilson new Under-Feed Sewing-Machine is extremely simple in its construction, elaborately finished in its design and ornamenting, combining great capacity and adaptation to every variety of family sewing and light manufacturing. It embraces all of the important and essential elements embodied in sewing-machines patented within the past twenty years, together with late and important improvements and patents of eminent mechanical experts and inventors in the employ of the Wilson Company. Cleveland has reason to be proud of the Wilson machine. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The Company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

WEBSTER'S PATENT
Button-hole Worker.
Pat. June 27, 1871. Awarded first premium at the Am. Institute and Md. Institute Fairs, 1871.

It is one of the most important inventions of the age. The most perfect Button-hole Worker ever invented! So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Every stitch is taken with the most perfect mechanical accuracy. Is used entirely independent of the sewing machine, and will last a lifetime. Does away with pricking the fingers, straining the eyes and with imperfect and irregular worked button-holes. They give universal satisfaction. Ladies who use them say that they are worth their weight in gold. Over eleven thousand sold during the first week of their introduction. Local and traveling agents wanted everywhere. They sell at sight, and give over 100 per cent. profit. Sample Button-hole Worker and sample Button-hole Cutter packed in a neat case, with full directions for use, together with sample of our new and novel way of canvassing, sent to any address on receipt of 65 cents. Orders by mail receive prompt attention. Address WEBSTER M'F'G CO., Manufacturers, Ansonia, Ct. Please state in what paper you saw this.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

FACETIÆ.

SOCIETY belles are in a flutter in consequence of the intelligence that the King of the Sandwich Islands is coming here. Well, he is a marrying man, and the girls will have a good chance. A dozen more or less is nothing in the eyes of a Sandwich Islander.

An Illinois editor speaks of an "eighty-year-old octogenarian" in his town "who has seen the snows of threescore years and ten." What was the matter with his eyes during the other ten years? Or didn't it snow for ten winters? This is something the public is interested in.

The boy with the big watch said time hung heavy on his hands.

What is the difference between a nasty pill and a jolly picnic?—One is a little swallow, the other a great lark.

A SECRET.—The surest way to get on in life is to grow old.

A new Texas paper announces its religious position thus: "In religion we are conservative, and we intend to adhere to the cash system."

"A prudent man," says a witty Frenchman, "is like a pin; his head prevents him from going too far."

CUT TO THE QUICK.—A well-known journalist recently visited the steam sawmills of Messrs. Blank & Co., and entered so minutely into the working of a circular saw erected there that he got confused as to the distinction between an elm log and a human trunk. His widow thinks that after such a testimony to the efficacy of their machinery, the firm ought to find enough elm planking for a full-sized adult coffin. Her husband's opinion we have yet to learn.

A CURIOUS HYBRID ANIMAL—The cricket-bat.

HARDER STILL!

BEGGAR (to dyspeptic old gentleman, whose temper is a trifle irritable). "Please give a copper to a poor fellow who hasn't tasted food all day."

DYSPEPTIC OLD GENT. "All day! What's that? Why, I haven't digested any for a week!"

HUNKS ON HIS HEAD-STONE.

Weep not for me, relations dear;
You'd onions need to force a tear.
I left you all I had to leave:
Had it been nothing, you might grieve.
But now all's yours that once was mine,
So therefore don't pretend to whine.

DEXTERITY.—The youthful mind is observant and inquiring, but it lacks experience. Young Tomkyns borrowed a gun to go sparrow-shooting, and not understanding the breech-loading system, began to ram down the cartridge. He has since frequently observed how lucky it was that in an idle hour he learned to write with his left hand.

AN ENTER-PRISING MAN—The burglar.

When you see a horse start off for a walk, shout "whoa!" at the top of your voice, and flourish your hat and handkerchief. It soothes and tranquillizes his feelings amazingly.

SPRING THOUGHT FOR EPICURES—De aspara-gustibus non est disputandum.

A RESPONSE.—An editor says his ancestors have been in the habit of living a hundred years. His opponent responds by saying that "that was before the introduction of capital punishment."

COMPLIMENTS.

HOSTESS (wishing to be polite). "Good-evening, Mr. Lovibond! So sorry your wife couldn't come too!"
HOST (wishing to be politer). "Nobody here is likely—haw—to regret Mrs. Lovibond's absence half so much—haw—as Mr. Lovibond does!"

TOO GOOD.

Abroad I take my devious way
When flowers their petals now unfold;
With hyacinths and tulips gay
My neighbor's garden I behold.

Had I the leisure and the means
(Perhaps 'tis best that I have not),
I'd grow the like; and I'd rear greens
And parsnips for my lowly pot.

Sweet blossoms! I enjoy their sight
As much as e'er their owner can.
But is my pleasure wholly right?
Their owner is another man.

Should not the pleasure they impart,
Since they belong to him alone—
Oh, tell me, my misgiving heart!—
Be none of mine, and all his own?

Methinks that, as I pass along,
To look upon them I may dare,
And smell them too, and yet not wrong
My neighbor when his joy I share.

I relished oft a school-mate's cake,
Saying within myself, "How nice!"
I robbed him not. I could partake
His happiness without a slice.

I loved; was not beloved again.
My love became another's bride.
But soothed was momentary pain
With balm which sympathy supplied.

In fancy I reversed the case;
My rival I imagined me;
My own self put in that man's place—
And felt—and feel—more glad than he.

RUNNING BROOKS.—The books in the running brooks were probably volumes of water.

Rasper, being told he looked seedy, and asked what business he was in, replied, "The hard-wear business; look at my wardrobe."

A sagacious papa exceedingly mortified his daughter by ordering to be printed on her wedding-cards, "No presents, except those adapted to an income of $1500."

A member of Congress got out this sentence: "Mr. Speaker, the generality of mankind in general are disposed to exercise oppression on the generality of mankind in general," when he was pulled down to his seat by a friend, with the remark, "You'd better stop; you are coming out of the same hole you went in at."

The following dialogue occurred in the Faubourg St. Honoré, Paris, between a patriarchal gentleman and his granddaughter:

"What makes your hair so white, grandpapa?" inquires the maiden.

"I'm very old, my dear; I was in the ark," says grandpapa, humorously, but with a reckless regard for truth, which does not prepossess us in the old man's favor.

"Oh," says the child, regarding her relative with a fresh interest, "are you Noah?"

"No, I am not Noah."

"Are you Shem, then?"

"No, I am not Shem."

"Are you Ham?"

"No, I am not even Ham."

"Then you must be Japhet," says mademoiselle, at the end of her historical tether, and growing rather impatient of the difficulty that surrounded her aged relative's identification.

"No, I'm not Japhet."

"Then, grandpapa, you're a beast!"

A woman in Pittsfield, Massachusetts, advertises her husband for sale for a hundred dollars. He is recommended as strong, healthy, and good-looking. Such a chance for a bargain as this does not often occur. There is only one thing that looks suspicious—so low a price for so fine an article makes a careful purchaser wonder if there is not something more than meets the eye in the advertisement. The legal proprietor of this gentleman must be very much in want of money, or very little in want of a husband.

SINGLE VIRTUE.

Bright eyes are soon bedimmed, spoiled form and face.
Ailments, expenses, cares, vex married life.
Whate'er I've done amiss, in any case,
I never coveted my neighbor's wife.

A young lady of Philadelphia was recently struck with the uselessness of her life, and immediately went to work with vigor to learn plain sewing. At latest dates she hemmed one side of a—in fact, any future husband's pocket-handkerchief, which the proud parents have framed and hung in a conspicuous position.

THE MODERN "FLYING DUTCHMAN"—At Atcheen.

QUERY.—Can a geological clergyman with a collection of ores, etc., be called a cabinet minister?

Must not a man be in a state of pecuniary embarrassment if he pops the question and also pledges his betrothed before he marries?

A genuine Highlander, looking at a print from a picture by one of the old masters, in which angels were represented blowing trumpets, inquired if the angels played on trumpets; and being answered in the affirmative, made the remark, "Hech, Sirs! I wonder they dinna borrow a pair o' guid loud bagpipes."

As a school-master was employed the other day in Scotland in his "delightful task" of teaching a sharp urchin to cipher on the slate, the precocious pupil put the following question to his instructor: "Where diz a' the figures gang till when they're rubbit out?"

STATISTICAL.—A great poet has remarked that the course of true love never did run smooth. Little Bigsby quite agrees with him. He was taking quiet but surreptitious tea with the fair Lucinda Pickletub, when her father returned unexpectedly. Bigsby wishes to place at the disposal of the Statistical Society the interesting information that there are sixteen large and hard knots on old Pickletub's holly walking-stick.

THE RETORT COURTEOUS.

A lady wished a seat. A portly, handsome gentleman brought one, and seated the lady.

"Oh, you're a jewel," said she.

"Oh no," he replied; "I'm a jeweler. I have just set the jewel."

SWEET HOME—A bee-hive.

ONLY A WORD.

A BUSINESS-LIKE POEM.

"Come," was the only word she said:
The only word—but oh, her look!
I read it like some fairy book;
And, as I read,
The swimming blaze of perfumed light
Grew faint. I watched her sudden flight
Like one enraptured in a trance;
Then swiftly cleft the whirling dance,
And followed blindly where she led.
Through jeweled throng she swept in pride.
She stood alone, and by her side
I stood! She felt her magic power.
Came music soft and sweet.
I plucked a choice exotic flower:
I longed with worlds my love to dower—
To cast them at her feet.

She spoke again. She whispered "Go!"
My blood rose hot! I cried,
"Go, darling! Yes, from land to land,
O'er raging seas, o'er barren strand:
A wanderer from clime to clime,
On to eternity through time—
Be this my lot, supreme, sublime!
No joy shall charm, no spell entice.
Repeat thy mandate. Ready, see,
I stand prepared to fly for thee!"
She said, "Go—get a strawb'ry ice!"

THE DESCENT OF MAN.

FIGURATIVE PARTY. "So long as I am a Man, Sorr, what does it matther to me whether me Great-Grandfather was an Anthropoid Ape or not, Sorr!"

LITERAL PARTY. "Haw! wather disagweeable for your Gwate-Gwandmother, wasn't it?"

GENTLE TEMPTATION.

"Not come while we are so gay? Oh, but there's Nothing going on just now, I assure you! To-morrow there will only be the Park in the Morning, and then some People come to Luncheon, and afterward Mamma wants me to go and pay Visits with her and do some Shopping, and you won't mind Mrs. Muff to Five-o'clock Tea, and we may possibly go to the Flower-Show for an hour or two. There will be only Ten at Dinner, and we sha'n't leave for Aunty's Dance until long after your Bed-Time, you know, Grandma dear!"

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 27.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 5, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Ladies' Garden Hats, Figs. 1–5.

Fig. 1.—DOTTED ORGANDY GARDEN HAT. This hat is made of dotted white organdy, lined with light blue lustring, and trimmed with white lace and bows of light blue silk ribbon. A lace ruche trims the front edge.

Figs. 2 and 4.—FIGURED ORGANDY GARDEN HAT. This hat is trimmed with a pinked violet silk ruche, white lace, bows of violet silk ribbon, and a bunch of violets. To make the hat cut of organdy on the bias one piece each from Figs. 58 and 59, Supplement; for the rim of the hat cut a strip of organdy fifty-six inches and seven-eighths long and five inches and three-quarters wide, and sloped off toward the ends to a width of four inches and a half. Having sewed up the ends of this strip, fold the straight edge down on the under side an inch and a quarter wide, and sew through the material seven-eighths of an inch from the fold for inserting a wire; in the original this wire is thirty-two inches and seven-eighths long. An inch and a quarter from the first piece of wire hem a piece of wire twenty-seven inches and a quarter long into the material. Gather the organdy on the free outer edge to a width of twenty inches, and join it there with the crown, which has first been lined with white stiff lace and laid in small pleats all along the outer edge. Set on a piece of wire along the seam. Edge the trimming piece (Fig. 59) with lace, arrange it on the hat as shown by the illustration, and trim the hat with the ruche, bows, and flowers.

Fig. 3.—WHITE SWISS MUSLIN GARDEN HAT. This hat is trimmed with ruches of the material, pink gros grain, and a bunch of roses. To make the hat cut for the crown of Swiss muslin, and stiff lace for the lining, one piece on the bias from Fig. 57, Supplement. For the rim cut of double Swiss muslin, with the fold on the front edge, one piece from Fig. 56, Supplement. In the front edge of this piece hem a piece of wire thirty-six inches long, an inch and three-quarters from the front edge a piece of wire twenty-nine inches and three-quarters long, and into the back edge a piece of wire twenty-two inches and a half long; sew up the ends of the Swiss muslin from 58 to 59, and join the rim and crown according to the corresponding figures, having first gathered the crown from the middle of the front to ✳. Trim the rim on the outside, as shown by the illustration, with kilt-pleated ruffles of white Swiss muslin, and on the inside with a pink gros grain ruche an inch and a quarter wide. Finally, set on the remainder of the trimming as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 5.—FIGURED BLACK LACE GARDEN HAT. This hat is trimmed with a veil of the same, black gros grain ribbon, black lace, a jet agrafe and jet grelots, and a spray of variegated flowers.

Fig. 1.—DOTTED ORGANDY GARDEN HAT.

Fig. 3.—WHITE SWISS MUSLIN GARDEN HAT.
For pattern see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 56 and 57.

FIGS. 1–5.—LADIES' GARDEN HATS.

IMITATION OF GROUND GLASS.

WINDOWS may be rendered opaque in imitation of ground glass by putting spotted or figured net upon them. The net should be cotton, or what is called bobbin net, not fine, and rather stiff. The pane of plain glass is first covered with the varnish used in diaphanie, after which a piece of the white net is cut to the size and shape of the glass, and covered also with the same varnish on one side. A flat brush is best for putting on the varnish. After a few minutes the net is laid on the glass, the varnished side being placed against it, and when dry the whole is revarnished; it then becomes perfectly hard, and will bear washing as well as ground glass. Care must be taken to keep the net smooth upon the glass, and not allow it to wrinkle, and a little exactitude is required in fitting it closely up to the wood-work.

PRAISE.

CLOVER blossom, tell me true,
Why was your perfume given to you?

"That all might know," the flower confessed,
"How God blesses the lowliest."

Robin-redbreast, let me hear
Wherefore your voice is so sweet and clear?

"A thankful heart," then whistled he,
"Is the secret of all melody."

Smiling corn field, speak me fair,
How did you come by your yellow hair?

"When the sun gave me kiss after kiss,
What return could I make but this?"

Stars illuming the depth of night,
Where did you borrow your kindly light?

"From the fountain whence all beauty flows
A drop was given to us that glows."

Brooklet, running away in the sun,
Where did you gather your bubbles, each one?

"God's snows and rains have lent unto me
That which I hasten to give to the sea."

Where did you find the colors seven
That paint your picture, rainbow, in heaven?

"When first God said, 'Let light begin,'
These were the colors that entered in."

A FEMININE INSTINCT.

ALL the world is well agreed that one of the most charming things to be found in civilized life is a perfectly dressed woman. She is not only an object of natural beauty, but an object of art as well. To her lovely curves and colors are added flowing draperies and soft contrasts and reliefs; the bloom of her cheek and the snow of her brow may be fine in themselves, but the bloom is brightened and the snow is heightened by the skillful combinations of the toilette, and she is fit to rank with pictures, and the work of artists generally, in proportion as her tints are harmoniously blended and her face-powders well distributed.

Nor is the art of dress a difficult one to any woman living. It was born with EVE; it will die only when EVE'S last daughter returns to dust; for a natural instinct directs every woman toward it, the instinct which furnishes her with her whole armory of offense, and teaches her on whom to use it—the desire to please, and the necessity for conquest.

Womankind, indeed, does its best to reverse that general order of nature which makes the male animal the finer, which gives the splendid plumage to the cock, the bristling mane to the lion; for the decrees of fashion, which, whether emanating from the throne or the workshop, woman has always had a hand in shaping, have at last restricted man to a mere straight line, a shadow; while woman herself—in the amplitude of her multitudinous draperies; in her ruffles and fringes and flounces; in her laces, where a hoar-frost has fallen on a whole floral kingdom; in her jewels, where the sunshine of centuries has crystallized; in her magnificence of hair, that many dead women have abdicated first—is atoning to the female creature of all the animal races for the enforced insignificance of her untold generations. This is nowhere more apparent than at a wedding—where the poor groom seems only a lackey of the occasion, while the bride trails her silk, and is odorous with her orange blossoms, and blooming beneath her veil, till she eclipses in her snowy splendor that of the great white peacock of Oriental courts itself.

Of the fact that the love of dress is inherent in the feminine nature we have seldom met with a more excellent illustration than Mr. DARWIN gives in telling us that the female of the inferior organizations always selects the handsomest and strongest of her lovers; so that to her appreciation of contour and color we really owe it that strength and beauty have been perpetuated in the male line. And if this is true of one class of organizations, we can assume it to be so, in some degree, of another, and accordingly believe that it is due to such facts that woman has been forced, for her own part, to resort to factitious aids, and to call in the mercer and milliner to help her in holding her rival within bounds, through the means of those stern dictates that have robbed him of chapeau and plume and chains and knee-buckles and velvet doublets and slashed sleeves and lace ruffles, and have so reduced him to his lowest terms generally, in which condition we see him to-day.

It may fairly be conceded, then, that the love of dress—that is, of a beautiful appearance—is instinctive with women, and therefore, within its own limits, healthy. Those who have the time and opportunity are able to raise this instinct from its first primitive yearnings, and develop it and gratify it with the appliances that have now reached the science of an art. Doubtless that art is yet no nearer perfection than the human race itself is near perfection. The fearful paints with which the savage woman streaks herself when her lord fails to return from the war-path are only the initial germs of the rose that blooms on the fine lady's cheek in rouge when she goes out on her love-path; and that rouge itself is but a groping after the beauty given by health and righteousness; and when the human race has, in any appreciable measure, approached that perfection which it desires, the fine lady will have learned what course of diet and sleep and exercise, of cleanliness and godliness, will be needful to produce the velvet bloom that no rouge can rival, and that at sixty shall be as fresh, after its own fashion, as at twenty.

We may doubt the declaration, if we choose, that there is to be a music of the future that shall dwindle MOZART and MENDELSSOHN into rude pipings—pipings only less rude than those of TUBAL CAIN; but if, in spite of our doubt, such is to be the consummation of the divine art, we can be assured that there is to be a dress of the future also, which shall be a fit singing-robe for us to wear while joining in that music or while listening to it. And probably we shall arrive at that dress by the same gradual processes by which we arrive at all other improvement; certain it is that we shall not reach it by sitting down contentedly and admiring what we have, with the complacency of an Esquimau in admiring her sealskins. It may be that the Greek woman's flowing lines, her soft wools and linens, will rise again and declare themselves as matchless as all the rest of Greek art is believed to be; it may be that the poet's millennium will some day come, and find us clad with > "A cap of flowers and a kirtle

> Embroidered all with wreaths of myrtle,
> * * * * * *
> A belt of straw and ivy buds,
> With coral clasps and amber studs."

But whichever reigns at last, we are confident that it will be only because that shall have been found to be the best dress which effort and ingenuity can contrive. It is doubtful, though, if the Greek dress ever gains the ascendency again, for it was the dress of slavery—the dress of a civilization where modest women could not walk unveiled on the public ways with decency; beautiful as its lines and textures were, it had ineradicable defects, and we see it still in kindred and slightly baser shapes among the semi-civilizations of Moor and Turk and Arab, where women are still held in that vile bondage which regards them not as individual souls, but as objects of luxury.

Nor are we by any possibility ever likely to return to the attire of the Middle Ages, with its grotesque barbarities; for, in fact, every generation does away with some superfluity and introduces some necessity, and the old saying that all fashions return once in seven years has only a single shred of truth. For all progress of growth is supposed to be in a spiral form, round and round, but always one step higher; the leaves grow so on the stem, the stars roll so in their orbits, and history in repeating itself always repeats itself on that spiral. Fashions, then, when they recur, it will be observed, recur on a plane higher than when they came before. Just now we stand, as we may say, on the spiral exactly over that of the Watteau period. We have the paniers, the petticoats, the powdered hair, of that time; but, as all can see who examine the paintings which represent that era, with an essential difference of modesty and taste that promises well for the future. One extreme always produces reaction into another, and the two together, as in the resolution of forces in mechanics, produce a medium; and in the application of philosophy to the fashions we may notice that this medium line is always the starting-place for a new departure, the point d'appui of a new flight, which is always a positive advance on what has ever gone before. Of late years we have learned, then, that various shades of the same color may be introduced into a costume, as we see them on almost every flower that blows, all lighter shades radiating from the deep rich heart of the primitive color. Coupled with the discovery and use of so many new tints—which discovery, however, belongs more to science than to fashion—this is a good ascent for one generation to have made; but we have really made a far greater one in determining the length of street dresses, fashion still persisting in rebuking those who would return to the street-sweeping trail.

And with these attained, we may hope for still further advances; but we must remember that they are to be made quite as much through the influence of individual opinion and example as through the power of any central genius for new shapes and combinations. But whatever the future fashions may be, only that woman will be well dressed who follows them just as much as, and no more than, they accent her own style and beauty; who balances the colors of her dress to relieve her complexion; who remembers the color of her eyes when she buys her ribbons; and who understands that neither purple nor fine linen is absolutely necessary to produce a perfectly dressed woman.

THE THOUGHT-QUICKENING PROCESS.

WE often find ourselves looking forward for the result of the next few generations, wishing to know about it, as we wish to know the end of an exciting romance; but never more keenly than when we have seen a school that is kept, as some schools are nowadays, on principles that we can not call new, since they are as old as SOCRATES, but which, be they new or old, evoke all that is brilliant in a child, in the place of those principles of routine, certainly as old as stupidity itself, which can be beaten into any blockhead, and which, in the tiresome iteration of their processes, are enough to make a dunce of any prodigy.

Indeed, if the children that are to follow us do not constitute a race of vast superiority, it will not be the fault of their teaching. Not that we claim to see the germs of future wings already sprouting on the infantile shoulders, or expect our posterity to be armed with tipstaves charged with the magic vril, nor that we wish every child to be as learned as the little five-year-old pedant of our acquaintance who cried at the table because his father was helped to a right angle of pie, while he was condemned to an acute angle; but that we believe the gentle stimulation of this method of instruction so well develops the powers of thought that when the intellect has reached maturity it will be ready at once to work on what it finds, rather than be forced to waste its best years in learning how to utilize its ability.

Take, for instance, the single study of geography as we lately saw it taught. Every one remembers the tears and trouble which that simple and delightful study used to cost, till the memory refused to note any distinction between cape, peninsula, or promontory. But by the system of which we speak all that painful memorizing from statements in language beyond childish comprehension is rendered unnecessary, and the whole thing becomes something as charming as it would be on the field.

The first act of the scholars, for example, is to make a "map"—of a table or a bench—upon the blackboard, or, rather, the teacher makes it, obediently to their instructions. This map is then to be transferred from blackboard to slate. It was easy enough to measure the table by a chalk and string, and order a line of that length to be measured and drawn on the board; but it is a different thing to transfer that line to their slates, and thus learn at once the significance of the "scale." This done at last, though, a map of the school-room is made; then one of the way to school, with the streets and paths diverging from it. From this arises the necessity of knowing the points of the compass—nothing being taught till its need is felt—and the instruction is given in a calisthenic exercise, in which the children are formed in a hollow square, facing outward, and the sides of the square are marched to their respective points till they are understood and remembered, upon which their application to the map on the board is mere play. When sufficient elementary knowledge has thus been acquired, intelligence is called more positively into play, and the children are told, for instance, as one way of doing this, that they may colonize an island. A rough sketch, a sort of land in the distance, being made on the board, every point in the shape of the island is left to be arranged by the children, who are to give reasons for their decisions. Some would have it a smooth plain, such as a hoop could be trundled on all day; some are for mountains and adventures. Mountains carry the day, and determine the nature of the shores. The reason assigned for the choice of mountains is that they are places for mines; iron and copper, if not silver and gold, will be wanted in the colony—mines will afford them; pasturage will be wanted for cattle, too—the mountain-sides will give it; rain will be wanted—the mountain-tops arrest the clouds and produce it; lastly, as the teacher suggests, rivers will be wanted. Shall the rivers flow from the sea into the mountains? Criticism is invited. Who ever heard of water's running up hill? The teacher draws a river, starting nowhere in particular and going any where in general, and requires the pupils to say why it is not right, till they see that nature does nothing at hap-hazard; and rivers, as well as other things, always run from some cause to some end, so that in this island they must rise among the hills in the springs that the rains and vapors make and swell, and then flow downward to their outlet where they feed the sea. And here, if the teacher is able, a digression explains the dead rivers of California and the rivers lost upon the desert. But why do they want rivers at all on the island? For roads, one says; for fishing, says another; to drain the lands; to water them; to turn wheels; to carry merchandise. As voice after voice resounds, a zest springs up, till the scene is as eager, if not as clamorous, as the Gold Room. And what kind of rivers is wanted for these things? is next asked. For carrying merchandise, let us say. A stream full of eddies and rapids that a vessel must skirt and struggle with, or a deep and quiet one that upbuoys the vessel which the wind carries along? And for turning wheels—shall it be a slow and sluggish current, or a swift one full of falls? All these things having been settled, the map of the island drawn in a satisfactory manner, and the colony being supposed to be on the way to it, the teacher asks if it is desirable to plant the colony in the interior or on the sea-shore; and the subject being well weighed, and the opposing reasons given, it is resolved to have it on the sea-shore, on account of the unexplored and uncleared nature of the interior, and from considerations of safety and of accessibility—all of which the children appreciate quite as much as they would the exploits of Hans or the escapes of Gretchen in their story-books. In this method the colony being established, so far as its geographical condition is concerned, it is proposed to send off a second colony to a point farther in the interior. Shall they strike out at a venture? Follow the river, cries one. Follow the river, by all means, and have your way open behind you. But how far?—to the source?—to the falls? To the falls. There they are, to move machinery, to saw lumber, to grind corn; ships can go up no farther; the tide rises no farther. The falls, then, are at the head of tide-water. And thus the imagination is kindled, the intellect is used, and a fact and a series of facts are made alive with meaning—facts which never had any meaning at all before. Sometimes this kind of exercise alternates with one which affords as much pleasure as the old game of "Dr. Busby." This is a game played with cards, evenly distributed, and on the back of each of which is written the name of a town or city, and on the face, in double rows, a statement of the usual imports and exports of the place. Any one can prepare these cards by the help of a school gazetteer. The scholar who begins the game, examining the cards allotted, finds that Rio Janeiro, it may be, has rose-wood and diamonds and tapioca to export, with other tropical staples, and is in sore need of linen for her ladies, cotton goods for her slaves, cordage for her ships, and straightway demands these articles. Liverpool can furnish them, and take Rio Janeiro's goods in payment. If, then, the scholar having the card Liverpool does not immediately cry "Here!" the Rio Janeiro merchant can take that card without further ado. If, however, the possessor of it does cry "Here!" then Rio Janeiro can not take it unless able to give its name—Liverpool. But supposing it taken, the Rio Janeiro merchant then looks at the Liverpool card and sees hardware to spare there, and cutlery and cotton goods; an immense business to be done, in short, in all sorts of exports and imports; and if Monrovia, glistening like the lady in the dentist's chair with gold, gums, and ivory, does not answer at the call for them, or for palm-oil and feathers and spices, then Monrovia also goes to swell the stock of the first merchant. But if, on the contrary, Rio Janeiro, having asked for the Liverpool goods, or for the Monrovian or other, can not give the name of the place furnishing them—Liverpool or Monrovia, or as the case may be—then the Rio Janeiro card is forfeited to the owner of the card with that place on the back, who then proceeds to make exchanges until brought up with some round turn which affords opportunity to the next. Thus a knowledge of the world and its balances and counterbalances is gained that books could hardly teach, and that are usually only half learned in the maturer life of the men of business. And by this method of instruction, not alone in one science, but in all, and which a mother or sister can use as well as a public teacher, study becomes amusement, and the thought-producing qualities of the brain are early strengthened and ripened for service.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

RIDING-HABITS AND HATS.

BLACK cloth continues the favorite material for riding-habits, and severe simplicity of trimming is necessary to give them style. The English habit, plain and scant, is the first choice with ladies of taste. Experienced tailors say they can make this close-fitting dress of five and a half yards of cloth, as the skirt should be only fourteen inches longer than the ordinary dress skirt (though something depends on the height of the horse), and the body can be made of pieces sloped out of the gored breadths. These skirts have the right side made longer than the left, in order that it may hang evenly below after the right knee is thrown over the pommel of the saddle. Modistes, however, require six or seven yards of broadcloth, or else the lighter quality known as ladies' cloth. They gore the front and sides, and pleat them to a belt; the back widths are straight and held in French gathers, as pleats would not adjust themselves well in the saddle. These skirts are ordinarily from a yard and a half to a yard and three-quarters long; they measure about three yards and three-quarters in width around the bottom. They are faced with the material about four inches deep, and bits of lead or shot are sometimes put at intervals in the facing to keep the skirt down. The English habit waist has a short square jockey basque, with two or three flat pleats behind, held down by buttons; it is lined with white farmer's satin, and quilted throughout, being very slightly wadded, except where padding is necessary to make a shapely bust. The sleeve is perfectly tight-fitting and without cuffs. A few equestriennes are having oxidized silver buttons on their habits, but the preference is for small button-moulds covered with cloth or else very heavy repped silk. The standing white linen collar and flaring cuffs are fastened by antique silver buttons and brooch in horseshoe shape, or else oblong shields with the wearer's initials cut in. Spotted and striped percale lingerie is also worn with riding-habits. The gloves, of undressed kid, are long-wristed and cut in one piece, without buttons.

Fashionable hatters supply equestriennes with a silk hat with narrow rolling brim, and crown nearly five inches high: the price is $7. Hats as tall as those worn by gentlemen are also seen on lady riders in Central Park. The hair is combed straight up to the crown of the head, and made in a small coil that is entirely concealed by the stove-pipe hat. Sometimes hats for country use have a buckle of oxidized silver on the left side, a small ostrich tip, and a long flowing veil of black grenadine. The Mountaineer hat of black straw will also be worn out of town. This has a tall steeple crown, with narrow brim on the right side, while the left is turned up high against the crown. A long black ostrich plume sweeps around the crown.

REDINGOTES.

The redingote becomes daily more like the French great-coat, after which it is named. A new fancy about to be introduced by men dressmakers is to face the redingote front down the inside, turn it backward, and let the garment fall open its entire length, just as gentlemen wear their spring overcoats. Another masculine model will have a double-breasted vest introduced, and a third will have the lower edges of the fronts turned up high in three-cornered revers in Watteau style. The original redingote, however, and that which meets the greatest favor at present, is the loose front double-breasted polonaise illustrated in Bazar No. 23, Vol. VI. The newest among these are of East India goods called bamboo cloth, a light washing fabric made of bamboo fibres, and resembling écru linen, but far cooler, as it is very loosely woven. Such redingotes have pearl buttons and self trimming, and are to be worn with a black silk skirt and sash. The garment costs $35. A parasol of this material is deeply fringed, lined with colored silk, and has a bamboo stick: price $12. Plain linen redingotes cost $7 50 ready-made. Sea-side redingotes are made of dark navy blue flannel, faced with white cassimere, and embroidered in two shades of blue in nautical designs of chains, stars, anchors, etc., mingled with wreaths and vines. A mountaineer redingote is of green cloth, on which Alpine horns are wrought: an umbrella with a substantial staff accompanies this. Camel's-hair cloth and English water-proof are also used for sea-side and tourists' redingotes. Blue, brown, and green are the colors.

WATERING-PLACE COSTUMES.

For the watering-places are polonaises made entirely of stripes of bronze on black velvet, alternating with écru yak insertion. The back is caught up by a sash of double-faced satin, black and écru. Price $225. Sleeveless jackets of black guipure insertion, with velvet or else moiré stripes, and richly dotted with jet, are sold to be worn over black and colored silk dresses. Pink or blue watered ribbon bows brighten these jackets, and make them correspond with the dresses with which they are worn. Price $60 upward. Evening mantles are white Sicilienne Dolmans, wrought with seed-pearls and elaborately fringed.

ÉCRU LINEN FANCY-WORK.

Ladies going out of town for the summer take with them the simple and pretty new linen-work for whiling away rainy days and other time spent in-doors. This is merely écru linen stamped with an arabesque braiding pattern, and instead of being braided, the design is button-hole stitched with silk or linen of the same shade, or else white, and the interstices are cut out, leaving a most effective open-work, or appliqué, which is brought into relief by being placed over blue, green, or rose-colored silk or satin. Cushion and sofa-pillow covers are made in this way, also lamp-mats, toilette sets, chair seats with a middle stripe for the back, lambrequins for brackets and mantels, and borders for tables.

POINT RUSSE.

Point Russe is the favorite embroidery for summer idlers, as it is so simple—being merely "back-stitching"—that it will not divert attention from morning flirtations on the piazza. Pale drab and leather-colored cloths are used, and wrought with delicate colors of silk in imitation of antique embroidery. Cushion covers, lambrequin drapery, shields mounted for shaving-paper stands, and seats for small chairs, are ornamented in this way. Chair seats, commenced, with materials for finishing, cost $10 or $11. Stripes for the backs of chairs have monograms designed upon them.

BRAID LACE, ETC.

At the fancy stores boxes of braid lace containing designs for making half a dozen squares of lace, with the necessary braid and linen thread, cost $3 50. Wrought guipure net squares are shown for cushion covers and for tidies. Rows of guipure squares, intended as transparents for chair stripes, cost from $10 to $18. Fayal mats as fine as spider-webs, made by nuns in convents, are for toilette mats and various purposes. The lace mat costs 85 cents. Linen Java canvas, embroidered in double cross stitch, is made into various pretty things for the toilette and bedroom. White Marseilles slipper cases and night-dress bags already made, with various pockets, are shown with leaf and vine patterns for braiding traced upon them, to be done in scarlet or blue braid by the purchaser. Slipper cases cost $2 50.

BABIES' AFGHANS.

New afghans for babies' carriages are made of white cloth and blue or pink satin in alternating stripes. The cloth is embroidered in point Russe stitch, the satin is quilted, and the lining is white merino. The cost is about $36. Others are of California flannel, snowy white, soft, and as thick as if tufted. A wide fringe of blue worsted is tied on the edge, and a large monogram, or else the word "Baby," is wrought in the centre in blue forget-me-nots and pink rose-buds. Price $15. A light afghan for summer use is made of Java linen, with "Baby" embroidered in scarlet wool. This will wash well, and costs $15. Begun, with materials furnished for completing it, the price is $6 or $7.

PHAETON ROBES.

Pretty summer afghans for ladies' basket phaetons are made of squares of guipure alternating with squares of embroidered linen, and edged with guipure lace. The lining is of colored silk, linen, or percale. Other robes are of gray cloth, bound with blue velvet, and ornamented in the centre with an appliqué blue velvet monogram from eighteen to twenty-four inches square: price $28 to $30. Simpler cloth robes of pale gray are faced with blue merino, and have an appliqué merino ornament in the middle: these cost from $14 to $16. The coolest lap robes for carriages are of thick white or écru linen, bound with colored braid, and a braided monogram for ornament: price from $12 to $15.

BOYS' CLOTHING.

The regular roundabout jacket, double-breasted and without pleats behind, is revived for boys of from six to ten years. They are fashionably made in dark blue cloth, with mohair braid à la militaire across the front, and with knee pantaloons of the same. This jacket dispenses with the vest which boys are proud to wear, yet find so warm in summer. Price $24. White ducking, striped drillings, and satin jean are the wash materials for boys' suits. White suits cost from $6 to $12; suits of drilling, from $4 to $8. For tiny boys just in trowsers there are very simple well-made suits of thick gray and brown linen, having only a loose jacket, short and jaunty, fastened with pearl buttons; plain untrimmed knee pantaloons. These suits cost $4 50 or $5. Shirt waists of linen for the little fellows have blue lines down each side of the box-pleat in front and on the large sailor collar: price $2 25.

BOYS' HATS.

Dressy hats for little boys are white straw, with round high crown and upturned brim; the edge is widely bound with light blue ribbon; there is also a band, and a half rosette with two ends turned upward: price $4. Larger boys wear the same shape in fine Milan braid, trimmed with darkest Napoleon blue ribbon band and binding. High stiff-crowned straw hats are also very fashionable: price $2 50. New sailor hats for boys have the brim curled, and not bound, but partly faced underneath with blue ribbon: they cost $4. Soft, rough-looking Mackinaw straws cost $2 50. A novelty is a soft Mackinaw hat with large round crown and dish brim—that is, turned down. It has a brown, blue, or black band, but no binding. The price is $2 50. Wide-brimmed sun-hats of imitation Leghorn cost $1 to $1 50.

PERSONAL.

WHEN CHARLES DICKENS was in Richmond in 1842 he was requested by an American friend to write an epitaph for an infant son of Mr. THORNTON, of that city. He was unable at the moment to comply with the request, but evinced the kindliness of his nature by sending the following notes, which, with the epitaph, are now first published:

"BALTIMORE, Twenty-third March, 1842.

"MY DEAR SIR,—Your note was brought up to my chamber at Richmond two hours after I had gone to bed. I will cheerfully comply with the request of the little child's parents. I will think of the subject as I go to Pittsburg, and send you his too early epitaph (which should be very short and simple) from that place. In haste,

"Faithfully yours,
(Signed) "CHARLES DICKENS."

"CINCINNATI, OHIO, Fourth April, 1842.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I have not been unmindful of your request for a moment, but have not been able to think of it until now. I hope my good friends (for whose Christian names I have left blanks in the epitaph) may like what I have written, and that they will take comfort and be happy again. I sail on the seventh of June, and purpose being at the Carlton House, New York, about the first. It will make me easy to know that this letter has reached you.

"Faithfully yours,
(Signed) "CHARLES DICKENS.
"Dr. F. H. DEANE."

This is the Grave
of
A little Child, whom God in his goodness called to a bright Eternity when he was very young.
Hard as it is for human affection to reconcile itself to Death in any shape
(and most of all, perhaps, at first,
in this),
His Parents can even now believe that it will be a consolation to them throughout their lives, and when they shall have grown old and gray, always to think of him as a Child in Heaven.

"And Jesus called a little child unto him, and set him in the midst of them."

He was the son of A. and M. THORNTON, christened CHARLES IRVING.

He was born on the 20th day of January, 1841, and he died on the 12th day of March, 1842—having lived only thirteen months and nineteen days.

—THOMAS W. DOBBIE is the name of the bright young lad who has won the appointment of cadet at West Point from the district represented by Hon. D. B. MELLISH, of this city. There were eight competitors from the public schools. He is very alert in his movements, and during the examination was careful to understand clearly the question before answering.

—The exact ailment of the Pope has at last been officially announced. It is cerebro-spinal exhaustion, the result of liability to epileptoid seizures, with paroxysms of coughing due to subacute bronchitis, and indications of locomotor ataxy. Now we know precisely what it is.

—Miss MARY CARPENTER, who comes from over sea to aid in diffusing better notions of discipline and reform in our correctional institutions, has been received with much cordiality, and has gone straight at the work she had in hand. She says that the ticket-of-leave system so successfully carried on by Sir WALTER CROFTON was a good thing, and tended greatly to reform convicts; that criminals must have inducements to avoid crime, and be convinced of the danger of pursuing it. They have numerous societies in England to aid in this work. No convict prison could any more clear a country of crime than a hospital could prevent disease.

—The Earl of Leicester, a special favorite of Queen VICTORIA, has received the insignia of the Order of the Garter. His father, "COKE of Norfolk," was the greatest agriculturist in England, and lived to be ninety. When seventy he married a second time, his bride being younger than his granddaughter, and had six children, of whom the present Lord LEICESTER is one. He, like his father, is devoted to country life, and up to a recent date had never taken his seat in the House of Lords, although a peer from boyhood. In common with Lord PORTMAN, lately raised to a viscounty, he has been of great service in the management of the Prince of Wales's Duchy of Cornwall. Lord LEICESTER'S property is reputed worth a clear £50,000 a year, and his seat, Holkham, is surpassed by few. Inscribed on its walls are the words: "This seat, on an open, barren estate, was planned, planted, built, decorated, and inhabited, in the middle of the eighteenth century, by THOMAS COKE, Earl of Leicester"—who was the maternal great-uncle of the new K.G.

—Prince ADALBERT, of Prussia, who died recently, married, in 1851, THERESE ELLSLER, sister of the noted danseuse, FANNY ELLSLER. THERESE was a woman of great strength and magnificent proportions, and used to support her sister in her most difficult poses. She was ennobled by the King of Prussia, who conferred on her the title of Baroness von Barnim.

—Major WELLS J. HAWKS, who died recently in Virginia, though born in Massachusetts, had for thirty years lived in Virginia. At the commencement of the rebellion he entered the Confederate service, and became commissary of Stonewall JACKSON'S corps. It will be remembered that just before the death of General JACKSON he was heard to say, quickly, "A. P. HILL, prepare for action; tell Major HAWKS to send forward provisions for the troops."

—When General SHERIDAN was at the gory reunion at Indianapolis a few weeks ago, he narrated, with the humor and dramatic effect for which he is becoming noted, the following right nice anecdote, in which a lady played the most conspicuous part: "There has been a great deal said of the battle of Winchester, a little affair in which I had a hand. Well, it was a pretty square fight; but do you know that battle was fought on the strength of information which I obtained from a young lady in the town of Winchester; and if the rebels had known she was giving it to me, they would have hung her in a minute. I was very anxious to get information of the rebel strength and movements, so as to know just when and where to strike them, but I did not know how to get it. Finally, I heard of a Union young lady in Winchester who could be relied on if I could get word to her. Her name was Miss WRIGHT. I think she is in the Treasury Department at Washington now. But the trouble was to communicate with her. One day I heard of an old colored man, living outside of my lines, who had a pass to go into Winchester to sell vegetables. I sent for the old man, and on talking with him found him loyal, as all the colored folks were, you know. Finding he could keep a secret, I asked him if he would undertake to deliver a letter to a young lady in Winchester. The old fellow said he would; so I wrote a letter on thin tissue-paper, and rolled it up in tin-foil. It made a ball about as big as the end of your thumb, and I told the old man to put it in his mouth, and deliver it to Miss WRIGHT, in Winchester. He went off, and in about two days came back with an answer rolled up in the same piece of tin-foil. I found I had struck a mighty good lead, and I followed it carefully till I got all the information I wanted. The girl gave me more important information than I got from all other sources, and I planned the battle of Winchester almost entirely on what I got from her. She was a nice girl, and true as steel."

—Governor BEVERIDGE, of Illinois, has appointed Miss FRANCES E. WILLARD, president of the Evanston College for Ladies, a commissioner from the State of Illinois to the "Woman's Centennial Jubilee," to be held in Philadelphia in July, 1876.

—Bishop VAIL, of Kansas, Bishop LEE, of Delaware, and Dr. PADDOCK, bishop elect of Massachusetts, are natives of Norwich, Connecticut. A great many good men come from there or thereabouts.

—Dr. VON DÖLLINGER has been appointed president of the Bavarian Academy of Science, and conservator-general of scientific museums, in place of Baron LIEBIG, deceased. It is one of those nice, soft places which royalty now and then places at the disposal of men who have found no royal road to learning.

—Queen VICTORIA is in possession of a curious needle. It was made at the celebrated factory at Redditch, and represents the Column of Trajan in miniature. This well-known Roman column is adorned with scenes in sculpture immortalizing TRAJAN'S exploits in war. On this diminutive needle scenes in the life of Queen VICTORIA are represented in relief, but so small and finely cut as to require a magnifying-glass to see them. The Victoria needle can moreover be opened; it contains more needles, adorned with scenes in relief.

—The poor of Vienna like Lord ODO RUSSELL, the British embassador. He has on several occasions distributed money and food to the sick and needy, and quite recently all the hospitals were dressed with flowers at his order and expense.

—In 1864 Prince FREDERICK, uncle of Duke FREDERICK, who took the title of FREDERICK VIII., as pretender to the ducal crown of Schleswig-Holstein, married Miss MARY ESTHER LEE, daughter of DAVID LEE, a wealthy man of this city. Prince FREDERICK was then over sixty, and a widower. It was his intention to confer his rank and title on his bride, but some legal technicality prevented. A short time, however, before his second marriage the Emperor of Austria had made him Prince of Noer; so his wife became Princess of Noer, but his relatives would not acknowledge her as Princess of Schleswig-Holstein. So she has lodged a complaint in the highest court of the kingdom, at Copenhagen, against the King to compel him to recognize her as a connection of the royal family.

—Lord SELBORNE, High Chancellor of England, is a very religious man, and has for many years been a Sunday-school teacher. In a speech recently delivered to the villagers of Selborne on entering his new family mansion he said: "Depend upon it, there will always be high and low, rich and poor. We can not get rid of those differences; but we should remember that the true source of happiness is within us, and not without. It is not in the possession of more or less of worldly advantages that happiness depends; it is in the heart, and in the relations of the heart to God and man. I do not agree with some of my friends who in private letters say it may be presumed that I have now reached the highest point of my ambition. That is not so at all. My ambition is not high place. My ambition is, if it be possible, to do some good in the position to which I am called, and if I can not do good in that position, I would rather leave it and try some other. For we must all remember that there is, after all, one other final step which all of us have to take, and which, if it lead to the very lowest place in our Master's kingdom, will be an advancement and promotion inexpressibly greater than any that we could receive on earth; whereas, if it lead to no place there, all other honors will be of no avail." Lord SELBORNE has made it the rule of his life, even when a law-officer of the crown, never to do any work on Sundays.

—Lord HOUGHTON has published a pleasant book entitled Monographs, in which he gives the raciest possible sketches of many notable people whom he has met. His lordship is perhaps better known as Mr. RICHARD MONCKTON MILNES, whom, some twenty-four years ago, Mr. DISRAELI, in Tancred, described as Mr. Vavasour, "a social favorite;" "a poet, and a real poet, quite a troubadour, as well as a member of Parliament; traveled, sweet-tempered, and good-hearted; very amusing, and very clever. With catholic sympathies and an eclectic turn of mind, Mr. Vavasour saw something good in every body and every thing.... Vavasour liked to know every body who was known, and to see every thing which ought to be seen. His life was a gyration of energetic curiosity, an insatiable whirl of social celebrity. There was not a congregation of sages and philosophers in any part of Europe which he did not attend as a brother. He was present at the camp of Kalisch in his yeomanry uniform, and assisted at the festivals of Barcelona in an Andalusian jacket. He was every where and at every thing; he had gone down in a diving-bell and up in a balloon. As for his acquaintances, he was welcomed in every land; his universal sympathies seemed omnipotent. Emperor and king, Jacobin and Carbonari, alike cherished him. He was the steward of Polish balls, and the vindicator of Russian humanity; he dined with LOUIS PHILIPPE, and gave dinners to LOUIS BLANC." The London papers pronounce it one of the cleverest books of the season, and society is quite in a rave about it.

Serpentine Braid and Crochet Fringe for Curtains, Bed Spreads, etc.

THIS fringe is worked with white linen serpentine braid half an inch wide and with white crochet cotton, No. 30. First work the separate rosette inside of a scallop in the following manner: For the outer circle of the rosette of serpentine braid cut a piece of braid ten points in length, sew the two end points on each other, so that a circle of nine points is formed, and work on one side of the braid 1 sc. (single crochet) on each point and 2 ch. (chain stitch) after every sc. The inner circle of serpentine braid (consisting of seven points) is worked in a similar manner, in connection with the first circle, however, laying it on the middle of the latter; and in working each sc. surround 1 st. (stitch) of the crochet edge inside of the first circle, and after each sc. work 1 ch. only. Cut off the thread and fasten it. On the outer edge crochet five rounds as follows: 1st round.—On the extremity of each point in the outer circle of the rosette work 1 sc., then always 5 ch., 1 dc. (double crochet) in the hollow between every two points, 5 ch.; at the end of the round 1 sl. (slip stitch) on the first sc. of this round. 2d round.—3 sl. on the first 3 ch. in the preceding round, then always alternately 5 ch., 1 sc. on the middle st. of each ch. scallop in the preceding round. 3d round.—3 sl. on the first 3 ch. in the preceding round, then always alternately 7 ch., 1 sc. on the middle st. of each ch. scallop of the preceding round. 4th round.—4 sl. on the first 4 ch. of the preceding round, then always alternately 9 ch., 1 sc. on the middle st. of each ch. scallop. Arrange two new rows of braid in curves, each curve counting 18 points on the upper edge and 20 points on the under edge, till the pattern is repeated, and in the next round join these rows with the work, observing the illustration. 5th round.—5 sl. on the first 5 ch. of the preceding round, * 4 ch., 1 sc. on the point marked × in the first row of the braid (see illustration), 4 ch., 1 sc. on the middle st. of the next ch. scallop in the preceding round, 4 ch., 1 sc. on the next point of the braid, 4 ch., 1 sc. on the middle st. of the same ch. scallop in the preceding round on which 1 sc. has already been worked, 4 ch., 1 sc. on the next point of the braid, 4 ch., 1 sc. on the middle st. of the next ch. scallop of the preceding round. Repeat eight times from *, as shown by the illustration, but in beginning the fifth repetition from * work the first sc. after the 4 ch. on the 18th point of the second row of braid. Fasten the last sc. of this round to the last of the 4 sl. which were worked first in this round. Cut off the thread and fasten it. The middle four of the ten points of both rows of braid which were left unnoticed at the beginning of the border (and Fraises, Figs. 1-4.

THE fraises or frills shown by Figs. 1-4 are designed to be worn with a linen collar, in the manner described by Madame Emmeline Raymond in her Paris letter in our last number. Fig. 1 shows a fraise with the collar underneath.

Fig. 1.—LINEN COLLAR AND FAILLE AND CRÊPE LISSE FRAISE. The collar, the corners of which are slightly turned down on the outside, is set on a muslin chemisette. The chemisette and collar are cut from Figs. 61 and 62, Supplement. For the fraise make of double light blue faille a pleated ruffle an inch and seven-eighths wide, sloped off toward the ends to a width of an inch and a quarter; lay the ruffle in double box-pleats in the middle of the back, and in single box-pleats toward the ends; then make of double crêpe lisse a ruffle two inches and a quarter wide, and sloped off toward the ends to a width of an inch and a half. Set these two ruffles together into a narrow double binding, edged on the under edge with a box-pleated crêpe lisse ruffle an inch and a quarter wide. The seam of this ruffle is covered with a roll of faille half an inch wide. On each end of the fraise fasten a piece of bias faille two inches and seven-eighths wide and fourteen inches and a half long. These ends are tied in a bow in adjusting the fraise.

Fig. 2.—LACE AND GROS GRAIN FRAISE. This fraise consists of a bias binding of pale green gros grain an inch wide and sixteen inches long, which is joined on the upper edge with a box-pleated tulle ruffle three-quarters of an inch wide, trimmed with lace half an inch wide. The front of the fraise is furnished with a jabot, which is arranged of box-pleated gros grain strips and gathered lace an inch and seven-eighths wide, on a net foundation, as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 3.—LACE AND CRÊPE DE CHINE FRAISE. This fraise is made of gathered white lace an inch and an inch and seven-eighths wide, and red crêpe de Chine. The illustration plainly shows how to arrange the fraise.

Fig. 4.—LACE AND RIBBON FRAISE. For this fraise cut of Swiss muslin a straight strip seven-eighths of an inch wide and sixteen inches long, and edge it on both sides with double box-pleated lace an inch wide. The seam of this lace is covered with blue silk ribbon an inch and a quarter wide, the ends of which project twenty-nine inches and three-quarters long each, and are tied in a bow in adjusting the fraise. In the middle of the front of the fraise set a bow of blue silk ribbon and a small spray of flowers.

Box for Playing-Cards.

See illustration on p. 420.

THIS box with overlapping lid is made of pasteboard covered with Russia leather. The inside of the box is divided into four shelves, which are designed to hold the different games. The lid is ornamented on the upper side with a medallion of gray silk, which is embroidered with chenille of various colors (see medallion Fig. 2 on this page), and in the front with small porcelain cards, as shown by the illustration.

Match-Safe.

See illustration on page 420.

THIS match-safe is made of pasteboard, covered with velvet, and ornamented with oxidized metal. The front is ornamented with a medallion, which is worked on a foundation of white silk gauze in dovetailed satin stitch and point Russe with chenille of various colors. Figs. 1 and 2, on this page, show two designs suitable for the medallion. The case is furnished on the top with an apparatus of yellow metal for cutting off the points of cigars. The sections for holding matches are covered on the inside with silver paper.

Corner and Edging of Collar in Tatting Application on Batiste, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on p. 420.

FOR each corner work, first, the requisite number of rosettes in tatting, using tatting cotton, No. 80, with two threads (shuttles), as follows: 1st round.—With one thread only work one of the four-leaved figures, which consists of four leaflets close together, each leaflet counting 6 ds. (double stitch—that is, one stitch left, one stitch right), 1 p. (picot), 6 ds.; having finished the four leaflets of the figure, cut off the thread and tie the beginning and end of the thread together, so that the figure is closed tightly. 2d round.—Tie both working threads together, and work, first, with one thread only, one ring of ∗ 6 ds., fasten to the p. of a leaflet in the first round, 6 ds.; turn the work, then work on the foundation thread one scallop of 2 ds., five times alternately 1 p., 2 ds.; turn the work, one ring, one scallop, and one ring more like the preceding, fastening the rings to the same p. to which the first ring was fastened. Repeat three times from ∗, but in each repetition from ∗ fasten the rings to the next following leaflet in the first round. Finally, cut off the threads and fasten them. Fasten the following rosettes always to those worked previously, observing the illustration. Button-hole stitch the rosettes on a piece of batiste of the requisite size, and cut away the material underneath the rosettes. Set the finished corners of the collar into a double batiste binding an inch wide; border the free upper edge of the binding with tatted edging (see Fig. 2) worked in the following manner: 1st round.—With one thread only one ring of 6 ds., 1 p., 6 ds.; ∗ after a thread interval of a quarter of an inch work one ring like the preceding, but instead of forming the p., fasten to the p. of the preceding ring; close to this again one ring like the first. Repeat from ∗. 2d round.—Tie both threads to the beginning of the first round, and work on the foundation thread one scallop of 2 ds., five times alternately 1 p., 2 ds.; ∗ turn the work, with the working thread only work one ring of 6 ds., fasten to the p. of the first leaflet in the preceding round, 6 ds.; turn the work, one scallop like that described before; turn the work, one ring like the preceding, fasten to the same p. that the first ring was fastened to. Repeat from ∗, but in each repetition from ∗ fasten the rings to the next following p. of the first round.

Medallions in Chenille Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE medallions are suitable for ornamenting memorandum-books, visiting-card cases, match-safes, etc. They are worked on a foundation of silk or silk gauze in satin stitch and point Russe with chenille of various colors. The medallion Fig. 2 is seen on the box for playing-cards, and Fig. 1 on the match-safe, illustrated on page 420.

shown by the illustration. The flowers of the raised parts are cut of red, white, and blue cloth, and the leaves of green cloth in several shades; the leaves are furnished with half-polka stitch veins of green silk. Sew the flowers and leaves on the foundation raised, as shown by the illustration, and join them with stems and vines, which are worked partly in half-polka stitch, partly in herring-bone stitch, with green and brown silk. The calyxes of several flowers are worked in satin stitch with green silk, and the filaments of the flowers in knotted stitch with yellow silk. For the arabesque figures sew on fine silk cord in four shades of gray, with long stitches of silk of the same color; the remaining figures of the design are worked in button-hole, satin, and half-polka stitch with gray silk of several shades.

Corner and Edging of Collar in Guipure Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 420.

BOTH corner and edging are worked on fine linen in guipure embroidery. To work the embroidery transfer the design to the linen, and baste the latter on a foundation of enameled cloth. Stretch the threads as shown by the illustration, and cover them with button-hole stitches of fine white cotton, at the same time working a picot each at the corresponding points. Border the design figures with button-hole stitches, and cut away the material underneath the stretched threads. After finishing the embroidery, set the corners and edging on a linen binding seven-eighths of an inch wide.

PRACTICAL HINTS TO HOUSE-KEEPERS.

BY CATHERINE E. BEECHER.

IN most books of recipes there are several different ones for corning, for curing pork hams, and for other uses, while an inexperienced person is at a loss to know which is best. The recipes here given are decided to be the best, after an examination of quite a variety, by the writer, who has resided where they were used, and she knows that the very best results are secured by these directions. These also are pronounced the best by business men of large experience.

The gentleman who uses the following recipe for curing pork hams says it has these advantages over all others he has tried or heard of, viz., the hams thus cured are sweeter than by any other method, they are more solid and tender, and are cured in less than half the time. Moreover, they do not attract flies so much as other methods.

RECIPE FOR MOLASSES-CURED HAMS.—Moisten every part of the ham with molasses, and then for every hundred pounds use one quart of fine salt and four ounces of saltpetre, rubbing them in very thoroughly in every point. Then put the hams thus prepared in a tight cask for four days. Then rub again with molasses and one quart of salt, and return the hams to the cask for four days. Repeat this the third and the fourth time, and then smoke the hams. This process takes only sixteen days, while other methods require five or six weeks.

The following is the best recipe for the ordinary mode of curing hams, and the brine or pickle thus prepared is equally good for corning and all other purposes for which brine is used. Some persons use saleratus instead of the saltpetre, and others use half and half of each, and say it is an improvement.

THE BEST RECIPE FOR BRINE OR PICKLE FOR CORNING HAMS, BEEF, PORK, AND HUNG BEEF.—Four gallons of water; two pounds of rock-salt, and a little more of any other kind; two ounces of saltpetre; one quart of molasses. Mix, but do not boil. Put the hams in a barrel and pour this over them, and keep them covered with it for six weeks. If more brine is needed, make it in the same proportions.

BRINE FOR BEEF, PORK, TONGUES, AND HUNG BEEF.—Four gallons of water; one and a half pounds of sugar; one ounce of saltpetre; one ounce of saleratus. Add salt; and if it is for use only a month or two, use six pounds of salt; if for all the year, use nine pounds. In hot weather rub the meat with salt before putting it in, and let it lie in it for three hours to extract the blood. When tongues and hung beef are taken out, wash the pieces, and when smoked put them in paper bags, and hang in a dry place. In very hot weather rub the meat well with salt before it is put in the pickle, and let it lie three hours for the bloody portion to run out. Too much saltpetre is injurious.

BRINE BY MEASURE, EASILY MADE.—One gallon of cold water; one quart of rock-salt, and two of blown salt; one heaping table-spoonful of saltpetre (or half as much of saleratus with half a table-spoonful of saltpetre); six heaping table-spoonfuls of brown sugar. Mix, but not boil. Keep it as long as salt remains undissolved at bottom. When scum rises, add more salt, sugar, saltpetre, and soda.

The above drawing is some guide for a family smoke-house. It may be set on the ground without a stove, and a slow smouldering fire kept on the ground. A stove of sheet-iron, with a slide to regulate so as to make a slow draft, those who have tried it say is best when managed aright, not otherwise.

DIRECTIONS FOR SMOKING HAMS.—Make a small building of boards, nailing strips over the cracks to confine the smoke. Have within cross sticks on which to hang the hams. Have only one opening at top, and one in the middle of the floor. Set it up so high that a small stove can be set under it, with the smoke-pipe entering the floor. Change the position of the hams once or twice, that all are treated alike. When this can not be done, use an inverted barrel or hogshead, with a hole in the bottom for the smoke to escape, and resting on stones, and keep a small smouldering fire. Cobs are best, as giving a better flavor, and brands or chips of walnut wood are next best. Keeping a small fire a longer time is better than quicker smoking, as too much heat gives the hams a strong taste, and they are less sweet.

TO SALT DOWN BEEF TO KEEP THE YEAR ROUND.—One hundred pounds of beef; four quarts of rock-salt, pounded fine; four ounces of saltpetre, pounded fine; four pounds of brown sugar. Mix well. Put a layer of meat on the bottom of the barrel, with a thin layer of this mixture under it. Then pack the meat in layers, and between each put equal proportions of this mixture, allowing a little more to the top layers. Then pour in brine till the barrel is full.

TO SALT DOWN PORK.—Cover the bottom of the barrel with common salt one inch deep. Then pack tight in layers, having half an inch of salt between all the layers. In each layer have large lumps of salt, so that the brine can circulate from their remaining undissolved. A barrel of pork will require a bushel of coarse and fine salt. Pack the rind next to the barrel, and leave out lean and bloody pieces for sausages. If white scum and bloody matter rise, scald the brine and add more salt. Put a board with a stone on it on the top layer to keep it under the brine. Never let any of the pork be out of the brine. The pork is not ready to use under six weeks.

TO KEEP HAMS ALL SUMMER.—Sew in coarse cloth, and pack in cold, dry ashes, but so that none of it touches the hams. Keep them in a cool, dry place, but not to freeze.

TO CLEANSE CALF'S HEAD AND FEET.—Wash clean, and sprinkle pounded rosin over the hair; dip in boiling water and take out immediately, and then scrape them clean; then soak them in water for four days, changing the water every day.

TO PREPARE RENNET.—Take the stomach of a new-killed calf, and do not wash it, as it weakens the gastric juice. Hang it in a cool and dry place five days or so, then turn the inside out, and slip off the curds with the hand. Then fill it with salt, with a little saltpetre mixed in, and lay it in a stone pot, pouring on a tea-spoonful of vinegar, and sprinkling on a handful of salt. Cover it closely, and keep for use. After six weeks take a piece four inches square and put it in a bottle with five gills of cold water and two gills of rose brandy; stop it close, and shake it when you use it. A table-spoonful is enough for a quart of milk.

TO SALT DOWN FISH.—Scale, cut off the heads, open down the back, and remove most of the spine, to have them keep better. Lay them in salt water two hours to extract blood. Sprinkle with fine salt, and let them lie overnight. Then mix one peck of coarse and fine salt, one ounce of saltpetre (or half an ounce of saltpetre and half and ounce of saleratus), and one pound of sugar. Then pack in a firkin. Begin with a layer of salt, then a layer of fish, skin downward. A peck of salt will answer for twenty-five shad, and other fish in proportion.

FOR THE UGLY GIRLS.

No. XIV.

AMONG the recipes, more or less valuable, which come to light in the older collections, this for the toothache, by Boerhaave, is too useful to be lost. Even beauties have the toothache sometimes, especially after going home from the Academy of Music on a snowy night with only a tulle scarf folded about their heads, or after sitting with their backs to the window in a half-warmed parlor during a ceremonious call. Use before beauty, mesdemoiselles; and with no more excuse I proffer the Esprit Odontalgique, which should be kept in every dressing-room, ready for the slightest signs of that most terrible malady, of which nobody dies.

Alcohol of thirty-three degrees, one ounce; camphor, four grains; opium in powder, twenty grains; oil of cloves, eighty drops. The effectiveness of this lotion will be seen at a glance, and no other authority for its use will be wanted than that of the learned and excellent physician who gave its name.

Very properly follows the recipe for gray pastilles for purifying the breath, which they do, not merely by disguising it, but by reaching the root of the difficulty, and arresting decay in the teeth, and neutralizing acidity of the stomach when dyspepsia is at work. The mixture is very simple: chlorate of lime, seven drams; vanilla sugar, three drams; gum-arabic, five drams—to be mixed with warm water to a stiff paste, rolled, and cut into pastilles. Madame Celnart archly advises all good wives to let their spouses know that these lozenges entirely remove the traces of tobacco in the breath. As a good wife will hardly interfere with a favorite habit of her husband who is fond of smoking, the least any gentleman can do is to render his presence as acceptable as possible after the indulgence. Another pastille, preferable on some accounts to the above, but owing its efficacy to the same principle, is: chlorate of sodium, twenty-four grains; powdered sugar, one ounce; gum-adraganth, twenty grains; perfumer's essential oil, two drams. Powder the chlorate in a glass mortar; put the powder in a cup, and pour in a little water; let it settle, and pour off. Repeat the process three times with fresh water, filtering what is poured off each time, and mix the gum and sugar with it, adding the perfume last.

A gargle for the mouth which combines all the virtues of "Eau Angelique," and every other wash of heavenly name, is made of the chlorate of lime in powder, three drams; distilled water, two ounces. Reduce the chlorate in a glass mortar with pestle of the same, add a third of the water, stir, and pour off, as directed before, till all is added. To this add two ounces of alcohol, in which is dissolved four drops of the volatile oil of roses and four drops of perfumer's essential oil. Half a tea-spoonful of the solution in a wine-glass of water is to be used at a time as a tooth-wash and gargle for the mouth and gums.

With the best intentions of physical neatness, many persons are unable to make the impression of their company wholly agreeable. They may remember with advantage that attention to rinsing the mouth with this fluid six times a day is not too much pains to make themselves acceptable to others. There is no surer passport to esteem than an innocent, cleanly, taintless person, which wins upon one before moral virtues have time to make their way. If you think this is said too often, study the personal appearance of the well-bred people you meet for the next month. The result will satisfy you that those who are as neat as white cats are as one to fifteen of the careless, easily satisfied sort. Slight disorders of the system make themselves known by the sickly odor of the insensible perspiration, quite sensible to others at once, though the person most interested is the last to become conscious of it. The least care permissible, even in cold weather, to those who would make their physical purity as sure as their moral state, is bathing with hot water and soap twice a week from head to foot. Carbolic toilette soap is the best for common use, as it heals and removes all roughness and "breakings out" not of the gravest sort. Ladies whose rough complexions were a continual mortification to them have found them entirely cleared by the use of this soap. The slight unpleasant odor of the acid present soon disappears after washing, and it may be overcome by using a few spoonfuls of perfume in the water. An excellent preparation for this purpose, or by itself, is Bacheville's Eau des Odalisques. The French recommend it highly for frictions, lotions, and baths. It is made in quantity for free use after this method: Two pints of alcohol, one of rose-water, half a dram of Mexican cochineal, four ounces of soluble cream of tartar, five drams of liquid balsam of Peru, five drams of dry balsam of the same; vanilla, one dram; pellitory root, one and a half ounces; storax, one and a half ounces; galanga, one ounce; root of galanga, one and a half ounces; dried orange peel, two drams; cinnamon, essence of mint, root of Bohemian angelica, and dill seed, each one dram. Infuse eight days, and filter. For lotions, add one spoonful of this to six of water. It is also useful for freshening the mouth, adding twenty-four drops of it to four tea-spoonfuls of tepid water. For diseased gums, double the dose, and gargle with it many times a day.

The Pâte Axérasive of Bazin, the celebrated perfumer, has the distinction of being highly commended by the French Royal Academy of Medicine as better for toilette use than soaps which contain so much alkali. Take powder of bitter almonds, eight ounces; oil of the same, twelve ounces; savon vert of the perfumers, eight ounces; spermaceti, four ounces; soap powder, four ounces; cinnabar, two drams; essence of rose, one dram. Melt the soap and spermaceti with the oil in a water bath, add the powder, and mix the whole in a marble mortar. It forms a kind of paste, which softens and whitens the skin as no soap known is able to. It is best to make toilette waters and pastes of this kind in quantity, as they improve with age. It will be found that it costs about one-fourth as much to make them as to buy the same quantity at the perfumer's, and one has the advantage of having a far finer article. Never use a cheap soap for the toilette. Such is almost always made of rancid or half-putrid fat, combined with strong alkalies, which dry and crack the skin, sometimes causing dangerous sores by the poisonous matter they introduce from the vile grease they contain. Never allow such soap to touch the flesh of an infant. To do so is little better than absolute cruelty. White soaps are the safest to use, as they only are made of purified fat.

The feet ought to be washed every night and morning as regularly as the hands. It preserves their strength and elasticity, and helps to keep their shape. What person of refinement can take any pleasure in looking at his own feet presenting the common appearance of distortion by shoes too tight in the wrong place, and the dry, hardened skin of partial neglect? One's foot is as proper an object of pride and complacency as a shapely hand. But where in a thousand would a sculptor find one that was a pleasure to contemplate, like that of the Princess Pauline Bonaparte, whose lovely foot was modeled in marble for the delight of its owner and all the world who have seen it? As nice care should be given to a foot as to a hand, beginning with a bath of fifteen minutes in hot soap-suds, followed by scraping with an ivory knife, and rubbing with a ball of sandstone, which will be found most useful at every toilette for a dozen purposes. The nails may be left to take care of themselves, with constant bathing and well-fitting shoes, unless they have begun to grow into the flesh, when all that is to be done is to scrape a groove lengthwise in each corner of the nail, as has been said before. The whole foot should be oiled with purified sweet-oil or oil of sweet almonds before going to bed after such a bath. A pair of stockings should be drawn on to preserve the bedclothes from grease-spots. This oil will soak off the old skin, renew the growth about the nails, and wear away the scaly tissue apt to gather there, while rendering the soles soft and pliant as those of a young child. A daily change of stockings is as desirable for those who walk out as a fresh handkerchief every morning—but how many people consider it necessary? It may sound audacious to suggest that when laundry-work is an item, a lady would show her ingrain refinement by washing her own Balbriggan hose as truly as by stinting herself to two pair a week on account of washer-women's bills. As for the vulgarity of wearing colored stockings "because they show dirt less," it is only named to be repudiated, except in the case of children, who are quite capable of going through with a box of white stockings in a day, looking none the cleaner for it at the end. Our boot-makers are in fault, too, about the lining of shoes, which ought to be changeable when soiled. Soiled, indeed! When are common shoes ever clean within? Our manufacturers are the opposite of the French, whose workmen wear fresh linen aprons, and wash their hands every hour, for fear of soiling the white kid linings at which they sew. The time will come when we will find it as shocking to our ideas to wear out a pair of boots without putting in new lining as we think the habits of George the First's time, when maids of honor went without washing their faces for a week, and people wore out their linen without the aid of a laundress. Cleanliness means health in every case, and a plea must be offered for the neglected members, whose only favor in our eyes seems that of being diminutive as possible.

THE OLD DESK.

AND so to the dance they all are gone,
And I sit here by the fire alone.
What shall I do to beguile the time?
They will not return till morning chime.
I'll open, to pass the hours away,
A desk that's been locked for many a day:
A little desk all blotted and scarred,
Oft by my childish fingers marred:
A little grave, where buried lie
Fond records of the days gone by—
Of friends beloved when my heart was young,
Of griefs that often my heart have wrung.
See in the yellow paper there
My father's and my mother's hair.
They lie together in loving fold,
One dusky tress and a ring of gold;
And the date is fifty years ago.
Here are two more—but white as snow.
This lock was shorn from a sister's head
When she lay so calm in her coffin-bed:
This from the friend who, through wind and storm,
Had failed me never—brave heart and warm
Reading these faded letters o'er
May while away an hour or more.
What does this little box disclose?
A faint, sweet scent—a withered rose.
Again through the mist of years I see
The garden fair with flower and tree—
The fitful sky—the summer shower—
The rich fresh smell of mould and flower.
I recall the arbor, with ivy green,
Where we sheltered longer than need have been;
The dewy rose-bud given and taken;
And then a blank—and I awaken.

This little letter, the last of all,
I open while softly the tear-drops fall—
A child's note, written in spirits gay,
Proclaiming a coming holiday.
Ah! little son, thou wilt come no more
With thy merry laugh to thy father's door.
He still must struggle in life's hard school,
But thou art under a gentler rule.
I close the desk and I turn the key,
O'erwhelmed by the tide of memory.
With the loved and the lost I pass the time,
Till the dancers return with the morning chime.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Warring with Women.—The Garter and the Bath.—A War Correspondent in two Places at once.

OUR agricultural difficulty is entering upon a dangerous phase. A certain farmer in Oxfordshire having engaged laborers at the old starvation prices, his own men being out on strike, the wives of the latter assembled and "obstructed" the former (as it is legally termed) upon their way to work, not by force of arms, but by mere length and activity of tongue, for which heinous offense the whole sixteen of them, many with their babes at their breasts, having been brought up before two Justice Shallows of the neighborhood—both clergymen!—have been sentenced to imprisonment with hard labor! This is a declaration of war to the knife indeed, since it is the first conviction under the new "strike" and "obstruction" act, and put in force against women and children. The whole agricultural world is in a ferment, and a world still larger, that of the metropolis itself. Even the Times, that great bulwark of the squirearchy and the Church, lifts up an indignant voice against this outrage alike upon common-sense and the feelings of an oppressed class. Indeed, the Oxfordshire decision shows the laborers what sort of justice they are to expect from local authority in the struggle between them and their employers. For them the phrase of "justice's justice" will have a more significant meaning than ever, while the whole country will be compelled to consider, what long ago ought to have been settled out of hand, the question of permitting law to be administered by an unpaid magistracy who are themselves interested in the very questions which they are called upon to decide. Their existence, as I have told you on a previous occasion, is a reproach to our system of criminal judicature, otherwise sound and pure enough; and what this example particularly instances is its worst feature—the appointment of the clergy to the bench. Whether it is that the theological mind is incapable of entertaining ideas of natural rights, or whether the unhappy tendency of ministers of the Church of England to bow the knee to wealth and (especially) station causes them always to kick the beam that is on the side of power, I know not; but certain it is that whenever a decision of unusual harshness is given by a country magistrate, you will find in three cases out of four that he is a divine. A minister of religion ought to be upon no side, but should do his best to heal the differences between class and class. Whereas these men are partisans, and scarcely ever on that side—the weaker—to which the merciful and tender dictates of Christianity should induce them to lean. It is certain, indeed, that the cause of the laborer will gain many an adherent through the folly of these country Minoses, but still no well-wisher of the Church can welcome the means. The after-dinner advice given by Bishop Ellicott, that agitators—i. e., persons who assist in forming agricultural leagues—should be ducked in horse-ponds, is far surpassed by this new clerical scandal, but it will not be lost sight of on that account; the former was an indiscretion, which also betrayed an evil animus; the latter is a crime. Nay, if "a blunder is worse than a crime," this is worse, for it is surely a blunder to war with women and children before the men are conquered.

I have spoken above of an injustice that should bring the blood to the cheek, but here is an injustice of another sort, that will make you smile. The Earl of Leicester has had bestowed upon him the order of the Garter, the highest honor that England—or, rather, the crown of England (for there is a difference)—has to bestow, while Professor Owen has been created a Companion of the Bath, that is, the lowest grade of our lowest institution of honor. You will ask, perhaps, upon what ground these honors are bestowed among us. I can not tell you; but it is a pity that they should be bestowed at all, if in this ludicrous fashion. No human being since Queen Elizabeth's time has ever so much as heard of any Earl of Leicester (and this man is no descendant of the lord of Kenilworth). He has the Garter simply because he is an earl, which has always been held a sufficient reason, except in poor foolish Lord Fife's case, to whom the late Lord Derby is said to have refused "the Thistle" upon the ground that he would eat it. This resolute persistence even of a so-called liberal government to build upon the old aristocratic lines even in the conferring of titles of honor, which cost nothing, and, as in this case, require no revenues to keep them up—which is always the excuse for not ennobling men of merit who are poor—is the more remarkable since the general tendency of society not only in feeling, but in social circumstance, is toward democracy. The mother-in-law of our Princess Louise is, or was, a tea-taster, and no less than two noble lords have entered banking houses (as partners, not, of course, as clerks) during this very year. Even the military, who at one time were almost exclusively aristocratic in their sympathies, are beginning to appreciate the advantages of commerce. Our most famous floral dépôt is owned and personally superintended by a late army captain, while perhaps the best rifle manufacturer in England, Reilly, was a post-captain in the navy. In the competition which the government instituted for the best weapon this gentleman was refused permission to partake, upon the ground that he was "in the service." So, with a pluck that could only have arisen from a thorough confidence in the merits of his own invention, he threw up his commission and became a civilian, for which sacrifice, as it has turned out, he has been amply remunerated.

American books have sometimes dedications prefixed to them, I perceive, although you have no noble lords at whose feet to lay them "by special permission, and with the most profound respect of their obedient servant, the author." I wonder whether in the history of your literature you have such a thing as a shifting dedication—such as that of which I am about to tell you. I mention no names, lest I should seem to be scandalous, but leave you to guess the hero of the story for yourselves. A certain now popular English author dedicated his first book in some such terms as these: "To Douglas Jerrold, the great humorist of modern times, this book is respectfully dedicated by his humble friend and admirer, So-and-so." Now So-and-so's book proved a success, and though it was rumored that it was not unindebted for some portion of this to the literary influence of the dedicatee, yet So-and-so, deeming himself strong enough to run alone, revised in the second edition his dedication thus, "To Douglas Jerrold, the great humorist of modern times, this book is dedicated by his friend and admirer." The second edition was quite as successful as the first, and on a third being called for, the incense to its literary godfather had altogether disappeared, and only this fact was left recorded: "This book is dedicated to Douglas Jerrold." This is what nurses call, in the case of children, "feeling their feet." Can you guess who was the child in question?

I have yet another literary secret for you, which I only dare hint at; but in this case I will give you the initials of the offender, which have not as yet been disclosed by any newspaper in England, though all of them are expatiating upon the offense.

You know, perhaps, that in the present invasion of Khiva no English war correspondents are permitted to accompany the Russian army: this was felt to be hard, since the ground was new; indeed, as a matter of fact, until Mr. Wyld (the map man) published his chart of the seat of war the other day, no one knew for certain where Khiva was, except the Daily Telegraph. That enterprising newspaper announced that it had got a special correspondent to go to Khiva and to tell its readers all that happened in the war. This very much disgusted the rest of the London press, and still more so when the articles of this adventurous gentleman began to appear. These were kept back by the D. T., and always printed without date or address, lest the identity of the correspondent should be established, and the Russian general command him to be knouted or sent to Siberia as an interloper. In the third article, which is a very graphic one, he meets "on the verge of an everlasting steppe" an old man "whose ancestors swept through Russia like a whirlwind six hundred years ago," and with this old man there is a deal of "business."

Unfortunately it struck somebody that he had read something like this before in a number of All the Year Round, published eighteen days previously, and which purported to describe the roads between Balaklava and Sebastopol. The traveler in that district also met "on the verge of an everlasting steppe" an old man "whose ancestors swept through Russia like a whirlwind six hundred years ago," and with this old man there is a deal of "business," and, alas! the same business!

The united press have at once burst into full cry against the until now envied Telegraph, and demand "not sentiments" (of which the D. T. has an immense stock on hand for all occasions), "but an explanation." They now suggest that this correspondent, who is in two places at once, was perhaps in neither of them, but all the while in Hastings, Sussex, where Mr. G. A. Sala is now residing. It is creditable to the real offender that his writing was attributed to George Augustus, but not so creditable to that great special correspondent that he should be supposed to be writing letters from Hastings and dating them "The Caucasus" and "Khiva." He has denied it, of course; and in the mean time every one "pauses for a reply" from the Telegraph, which does nothing but foam at the mouth, and protest that its correspondent is in Khiva, and is a gentleman, and a graduate of Oxford. For the first time the Times has noticed the existence of the print that boasts of "the largest circulation in the world" by a leading article of intense and withering satire. Upon the whole, it is the grandest newspaper row that ever I remember, and nobody seems to have any explanation to offer but myself. The facts are simply these: the D. T. correspondent is gone to Khiva; being not only a newspaper writer but a literary man, he contributes to All the Year Round, and has used some of his "padding" for both journals in order to get double pay. It was his hope that nobody would recognize the very "curious coincidence" of the two articles, and is probably totally unaware at this moment what a hornets' nest he has brought about the ears of his employers. The old man "whose ancestors swept through Russia six hundred years ago" will probably lose the Telegraph 20,000 subscribers. The initials of the correspondent will be found (if I am not much mistaken) to be "D. K." But he has no connection with your R. KEMBLE, of London.

RECEPTION DRESS.

See illustration on page 428.

THIS elegant toilette, which is designed to be worn at day receptions, consists of a white silk petticoat, puffed lengthwise in front, and an over dress of mauve silk, open in front, with a train of medium length. The skirt of the over dress is edged with two ruffles, turned in opposite directions, and separated by a bias fold. A wide upright frill of mauve silk encircles the neck, and a pleated sash forms a pouf at the back of the skirt. White silk hat, trimmed with violet feathers and ribbon, and bound with black velvet ribbon, a long end of which falls behind. Mauve silk parasol.

CARRIAGE DRESS.

See illustration on page 428.

WHITE muslin skirt, trimmed with four flounces, and ornamented in front with a trellis of violet ribbon. Over dress of leaf brown foulard, edged with violet ribbon, with revers at the side faced with violet silk. The sleeves of the over dress are short, with under-sleeves of puffed white muslin, and violet ribbon trimmings. Leaf brown bonnet, with violet ribbon and pink roses. Leaf brown silk parasol.

MODERN SMUGGLING.

THE progress of modern civilization, it has often been said, has a very decided tendency to eliminate the romantic and the picturesque from most of the affairs of life. In nothing, perhaps, is this more strikingly observable than in the change which it has brought about in the matter of smuggling.

The ideal smuggler of old was a brave, resolute desperado. The modern smuggler is an individual of a very different type. From the rugged, weather-beaten hero, the smuggler has degenerated into a cunning cheat, scarcely more dignified or interesting than a mere thief.

But even the vagaries of the low petty thief, though they may not be very dignified, may yet be amusing, and so very frequently are the artifices of the modern smuggler. The articles which prove the greatest temptation to him are, of course, those which are burdened with the heaviest duty, and the ingenuity displayed in the attempts to get ashore with undetected stores of tobacco or spirits, for instance, appears to be simply unbounded in its resources. That such attempts succeed in a vast number of instances can admit of little doubt, notwithstanding the vigilance and acuteness of a large staff of officials. There is no part of a ship or its cargo, or of the personal effects or the wearing apparel of the crew and passengers, which it would not be necessary to examine before it would be possible to pronounce with certainty that there was no concealment of goods liable to duty. Even the very rigging is to be regarded with suspicion. Ropes have been found to be made of tobacco, and the same material has constituted the pulley wheels inside the blocks. The log of wood hanging over the ship's side by way of "fender" has been sometimes discovered to be merely a shell filled with the fragrant weed. A log of wood, indeed in almost any form is to be eyed with misgivings.

Cargo in the most unlikely forms must be carefully scrutinized if deception is to be detected. Baskets of fruit have been found with lace at the bottom, and eggs have been imported in cases the thick ends of which have been drilled so as to afford carriage for a large number of cigars. A bundle of willows has been known to conceal eight or nine pounds of cavendish in the centre, and a similar deception has been practiced in the importation of a hogshead of arsenic, and a crate of live ducks, the tobacco in the latter case being hidden beneath a false bottom to the crate.

False bottoms and lids are among the commonest and clumsiest of smugglers' devices. Only amateurs would risk forfeiture and fine on their chance of escaping detection in this way. A much more business-like attempt to impose on the myrmidons of government was once discovered in an importation consisting of a number of broomsticks. The custom-house officers of course passed such a consignment, and very much to their credit too. The fraud was discovered by one of them being accidentally broken, when it appeared that they were hollow and full of cigars.

One of the most ingenious and audacious attempts at imposition by means of an article of wearing apparel was an effort to pass eighteen hundred-weight of cavendish tobacco in the form of soles attached to the boots of the crew of a vessel.

In concealment by means of dress the ladies are by far the most enterprising. At one time the skirts of a lady are found to conceal twenty-one pounds of tobacco, carefully distributed in receptacles made for the purpose, and supported by bands or braces passing over the shoulders.

Not only the garments of passengers, however, but the simplest articles carried in the hand, are often used for the purpose of illicit concealment. A venerable-looking old gentleman, with gold-rimmed spectacles and a broad-brimmed hat, is thoughtfully pacing the deck, evidently conning over the chapter he has just finished in the solid and serious looking volume under his arm. The officer who would doubt the respectability of that old gentleman would be only one degree less suspicious and uncharitable in his disposition than the man who would question the bona fides of a broomstick. There are, however, men to whom, alas! even a broad-brimmed hat is not an absolute guarantee of respectability, and who have so little reverence for learning as actually to seize a classic-looking volume on suspicion. On examination it is found that that old gentleman is a smuggler of watches. He has a large book, the leaves of which have been stuck together in a solid mass, and the body of the volume has then been hollowed out into a receptacle large enough to contain sixty or seventy Geneva watches, which, at the time this deception was practiced, were liable to an ad valorem duty of twenty per cent.

Very little knowledge of the world would be sufficient to convince any one that there are plenty of people in it who would be ready enough to smuggle if they could arrange to do it with tolerable safety, and on a scale sufficiently extensive to make it worth their while; but it might reasonably be supposed that the petty trickery by which a few dollars could be realized would be confined to the lower orders. According to official testimony, however, this would be a great mistake. Smuggled cigars, like stolen kisses, appear to be capable of affording a special satisfaction, and in all grades of society there are to be found individuals who are not above practicing paltry frauds on the revenue.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

EARLY in the season, before the midsummer heat has weakened the enthusiasm of the benevolent, or sucked up the strength and vitality of young children in the city, New York and Brooklyn have reinaugurated the system of picnic excursions for poor children. It will be remembered that last year the plan was tried in New York with great success, and thousands of poor, sick, and wearied children caught a saving breath of health and pleasure by this means. It was later in the summer when the "Fresh Air Fund" of Brooklyn was organized, and there was but little time to accomplish what was desired. By the arrangements of the present season it is proposed that a systematic effort be made for the refreshment of the working-children of the city, and that all poor children may secure the benefits of these summer excursions. Many prominent merchants and business men of Brooklyn, having in their employ children who have no regular vacation, have agreed to give them two holidays during the summer without loss of salary, provided these days are spent under the care of those who have charge of the picnic excursions. This enterprise has commended itself to the benevolent community. Careful arrangements will be made to secure the individual comfort of each child, and to give such special care as the little ones will require. It is hoped that free contributions to the fund will enable the managers to carry out all their plans with perfect success.

The new route across the Atlantic which was proposed some time ago, and has been considered and investigated by a special committee appointed by the Dominion Parliament, is designed to reduce the passage by three days. The plan was that the line should be from Valencia, Ireland, to St. Johns, Newfoundland, a distance of 1640 miles; thence to New York in thirty-one hours, via St. George and Shippegan. The objection has been raised that the port of Shippegan could only be used during the summer months; and therefore it is suggested that Louisburg, Cape Breton, be substituted. Louisburg Harbor is open throughout the year, it will be a probable junction of railways and steamboats, and there are some 130,000 people in the eastern part of Nova Scotia who would thus be relieved from their comparative isolation from the rest of the world.

The vessels of the Cunard Steam-ship Company will hereafter take a specified course across the ocean, each way, during all seasons of the year. The route is strictly defined, with a view to lessen the chances of collision. Thus the ocean voyage is to be made as free as possible from dangers.

The following brief statement will interest those who watch the reduction of our national debt: In April last the debt of the British nation amounted to $3,929,000,000; that of the United States at the close of the same month was, principal and interest, $2,258,583,467. During the last four years the British debt has been reduced $98,400,000, while the debt of the Union for the four years from March, 1869, to March, 1873, was decreased $368,082,559.

The "Great Eastern" is the name of the principal hotel in Calcutta, and it is the property of a large trading company. One singular arrangement of this hotel is for each guest to have his own servant, who waits upon him at table, and attends to most of his personal wants. In India sleeping cars or carriages are provided for those who travel "first class" at night; but, strange to say, the carriages are not provided with bedding, but every traveler who desires to sleep provides himself with pillow and blanket.

Our readers may be interested and amused by the following extract from a private letter, written by a lady, under date of Boston, June 8, 1873:

"Mr. S——, the young ladies, and I attempted to hear Mr. Beecher, who preached this morning in Park Street Church. I think I never had such an experience before. It was ten o'clock when we reached the church, and apparently the doors were not opened. Of course there was a large crowd before the door, but no larger than I expected to see, and without much difficulty we got up the steps, and inside the doors, which were just then opened. There was then a flight of stairs leading to the audience-room. The scene that ensued after we succeeded in getting up those stairs is beyond description. There were no policemen or ushers. The church seemed full, probably by other doors. We were suddenly wedged in a mass of people who seemed insane in their endeavors to push through. I was thoroughly alarmed lest we should be trampled upon. I managed, by using all my strength, to keep near Mr. S——. In loud, authoritative tones he, leaning over the stairs, commanded the crowd, who were still endeavoring to come up, to draw back and leave a passage for those who must get back, saying that many were fainting and being trampled to death. This produced some effect, and in a little while he and I reached the sidewalk. I breathed freely, and felt thankful. Soon A—— and L—— joined us; but it was an hour from the time when we went before S—— could get out. I never saw such a badly managed affair; or, rather, it was not managed at all. The various incidents that happened were amusing to recall, after our fright was over and we were on safe ground. As we came out a stout lady was forcibly pushing her way through. Mr. S—— remonstrated at her persistent pushing, telling her the state of things within. 'I don't care,' said she, in a loud voice; 'I've got a pew, and I am bound I will have it! What business have all these people here?' Near us a man, whose garb betokened him from the country, spoke out, 'I have come a hundred miles to hear Mr. Beecher; do let me get in.' I fear his request was of no avail."

Dumas the elder and a wealthy financier were once conversing upon the remuneration of men of letters.

"I," said Dumas, "am certainly the best paid. I receive thirty sous a line."

"Indeed, monsieur," said a by-stander, "I have never worked for less than a million a line. What do you think of that?"

"You are joking."

"Not at all."

"What are you, then?"

"Constructor of railways."

The author laughed; but was a little vexed, nevertheless.

Since Viscountess Beaconsfield's death, Mr. Disraeli has been unable to keep up the same position that he maintained during her life. Her fortune, which was large, has passed into the family of her first husband. Mr. Disraeli still receives his pension of £2000 a year as an ex-cabinet minister, and, some years ago, an eccentric old lady in Devonshire left him her fortune, amounting to about £25,000. But a public man has many demands upon his purse. Mr. Disraeli is now a solitary man, and keeps aloof from public and social life as far as possible. His feeling seems to be that he would gladly retire from politics altogether, were it not for the solicitations of his friends. He recently wrote, in answer to an invitation, "Although, at the request of my friends, I am endeavoring to assist in conducting the Parliamentary business of the conservative party, I am otherwise living in seclusion."

"What consumptives want is air, not physic—pure air, not medicated air—and plenty of bread and meat." So said the late Dr. Marshall Hall, of England.

Money-making property holders at Niagara propose making a spacious park on the American side of the Falls, so that nobody can get a view of them until he has paid a fee for admission to the inclosure.

"Autumn in the Sierra" is the name of Bierstadt's new painting, which is now on exhibition in San Francisco. It is a large canvas, six feet by ten, and is an actual view on the head waters of the south fork of King River, with Mount Brewer in the distance. The point of view is 8000 feet above the sea, overlooking the narrow valley of the river, seen winding and foaming far below, while the peak rises 5000 or 6000 feet above. The special characteristics of the scenery peculiar to great elevations in the Sierra are clearly and finely drawn, and the whole painting impresses one by its unity, simplicity, and grandeur.

Tea is undoubtedly a refreshing and often a useful beverage; but it is only recently that we have learned that it may be put to even more commonplace uses than restoring the exhausted system of man or woman. Cold tea is now recommended as the best liquid for cleaning varnished paint, window-panes, and mirrors. We infer that it is cold tea warmed over; for our informant says, after referring to "cold" tea:

"Wash off the specks with warm tea, and rub the panes dry; then make a paste of whiting and water, and put a little in the centre of each pane. Take a dry cloth and rub it all over the glass, then rub it off with a chamois-skin or flannel, and your glass will shine like crystal."

"When death enters a house," says Miss Thackeray, in her last novel, Old Kensington, "there is a moment's silence; then comes the silent tumult that follows death: every body scared and bustling to the door; acquaintances leave their names on bits of pasteboard, friends write notes, relations encamp in the dining-room, the pale faces of the living come and look at the place out of which a life has passed away. Servants come and go, busy with the fussy paraphernalia. It means kindness and honor to the dead, but it seems all contrived to make sorrow grotesque and horrible instead of only sorrowful."

There is much truth in another remark of this same author: "Malice and uncharitableness as often consist in the vivid remembrance of the pang inflicted as in that of the blow which caused it."

Borders for Veils, etc.—Tulle darned with Silk.—Figs. 1 and 2.

THE foundation of these borders is of black tulle, which is darned with silk in the designs shown by the illustrations. Black, as well as colored, silk may be used for this. When white wash blonde is used, the design may be worked with white glazed cotton or embroidery cotton; if worked with the latter, the borders are also suitable for insertion for lingerie, etc.

Illusion and Crêpe de Chine Collar and Sleeves.

FOR the foundation of this collar cut of double Swiss muslin two pieces from Fig. 60, Supplement, and sew up these pieces in the middle of the back. Along the under edge of this foundation sew one side-pleated ruffle of double white illusion an inch and seven-eighths wide, and one ruffle an inch and a quarter wide, and along the neck set a similar ruffle an inch and a quarter wide. Then cover the foundation, as shown by the illustration, with pleated lilac crêpe de Chine, and on the front of the collar set a rosette of illusion ruffles and crêpe de Chine loops. To the under edge of each sleeve sew two side-pleated ruffles each three inches and three-quarters wide, and cover the seam made by doing this with pleated crêpe de Chine and a bow of the same.

PICTURES AND THEIR FRAMES.

THERE is more "in" a frame than the mere work of art which it infolds. Take the best-executed painting and divest it of its gilded surroundings, and it will remind you of a "fashionable" who has forgotten to include a neat shirt collar and a well-starched cravat in his otherwise highly finished toilette. The ordinary visitor to a public exhibition of paintings, unless he be by trade a carver and gilder, pays but little regard to the decorative part of the show, and yet if this important element were absent, how very conspicuous it would appear! A gallery of unframed works of art would be as dull and confusing as a theatrical performance unaided by scenic effects. No artist, however great his reputation, considers his handiwork complete until his favorite carver comes to put the finishing touch in the shape of a gilded proscenium. A handsome frame "covers" (and too often encircles!) a multitude of defects.

There are fashions in frames as there are in every thing else. Our painting grandfathers were more lavish with their pictorial adornments than we, as is observed in old family pictures at ancient mansions. Their frames, like their coaches, were heavier-looking and more cumbersome than are ours. They delighted in ponderous scroll-work, flowers, and shells; and even Cupids, Venuses, and birds were not infrequently included. The Italians—and notably the Florentines—at one time made carving and gilding a special branch of the fine arts, and the Florentine frame, carved entirely out of the solid wood, and highly burnished in every part, is still a favorite pattern with the Tuscans.

In the galleries of the Uffizi and Pitti palaces at Florence many curious examples of ancient carving are shown. The far-famed picture by Raphael of the Madonna della Seggiola is encompassed by one of the widest and most elaborate frames ever constructed. The proportions of this massive ornament far exceed the dimensions of its priceless contents. The portion nearest the picture is oval-shaped, the outside being square. Broad leaves, huge flowers, Cupids, and other decorations enter into its composition, and the gilding being kept scrupulously clean, this remarkable piece of "furniture," as it might be called, forms a most conspicuous object in the gallery.

Our modern frame is less pretentious, though our living painters will tell you that they find it equally costly. Every artist has his own favorite pattern, but modern exhibitions have prescribed certain framing rules, and the generality of show-pictures are framed more or less after the same mould. Occasionally an innovator appears with a "fancy" pattern made after his own design, in which some of the characteristics of his picture are symbolized in gold. Followers of what has been termed the Eccentric school exhibit their eccentricities even in their frames, and birds, beasts, flowers, and fishes not infrequently participate in the gilded production.

The shape of what is technically called the "flat," or interior margin of frames, is sometimes varied to suit the subject of a painting. Thus we have many varieties of the dome-shaped flat, the oval, the Gothic, and the triangular. Sometimes the flat—which, being usually nearest the picture, is considered an important part of the frame—is more or less wide. One artist has a preference for exceedingly broad flats, another uses a narrow one, or altogether eschews a margin. Frames consisting of the broad flat only, or of a flat slightly skirted by an ornamental border, are not uncommon.

For this order of frame the eccentric gentlemen before named have a strange partiality. The gilding of these frames is laid on in such a manner as to show the rough grain of the oak wood which forms the basis, and in order to vary the monotony of this gilded oasis, ornaments resembling large buttons are placed upon it at intervals, and in some cases color itself corresponding with the general "tone" of the picture is fantastically introduced.

The narrow "double flat" is the most popular style with artists, as it is said to increase the depth of the frame, and consequently lends distance to the picture. A deeply hollowed frame is indeed a favorite form with most of the profession, especially with followers of the French and Dutch schools.

The carver and gilder has a technical name for every style of frame which the artist may select. If you go into his store, he will show you a long narrow slab, upon which are arranged patterns or sections of frames for his customers to choose from. There is the popular "Alhambra" pattern, consisting of a moulding fretted and chased in imitation of the arabesque. There are endless varieties of this highly approved pattern. Next in importance is the "Greek," which exhibits for its leading characteristic a Greek border, or "key," and is sometimes accompanied by an outer moulding, whose surface is hollowed out, but which claims no other adornment than a series of parallel lines, or "flutings," as they are called; each line, or fluting, being carefully burnished, and the spaces between "ormolued" in "dead" gold. Some frames are almost exclusively represented by the fluted pattern, the monotony being relieved by an inner border of "beads," or an outer rim showing an arrangement of laurels, oak leaves, or a simple spiral ribbon. There are also "Egyptian" and "Byzantine" frames, which, however, often bear but a faint resemblance to these orders.

Ornamented projecting corners are almost entirely out of date, and the extreme angles of frames have little adornment besides a flat leaf, or a crossed "ribbon," which serves chiefly to conceal the "mitre," or diagonal crevice formed by the joint.

Gold and white card-board "mounts" form no inconsiderable item in the framing art. These mounts, or "passe-partouts," as they are sometimes called, are used chiefly for water-color paintings, or for crayon and other drawings. They are circular, square, dome-shaped, or oval, to suit the work which they encompass. The virtues of a drawing or a sketch are greatly enhanced after having been viewed under the favorable auspices of a white mount and a clear, spotless glass.

CURE FOR CATARRHAL COLD.

EVERY one knows how troublesome a cold in the head is. Several physicians have lately attempted to prevent the full development of the malady by what is called an abortive treatment. We give below some of the proposed remedies.

Dr. Hagen recommends the inhalation by mouth and nose—the eyes being closed—of the vapor of the following mixture, to be repeated every two hours until the desired effect is obtained: Carbolic acid, 5 parts; aqua ammonia, 6; distilled water, 10; and rectified spirit, 15. Dr. Brand, of Stettin, indorses this prescription from his own experience. Another remedy, introduced by Professor Richter, of Dresden, to be used in the same way, is as follows: Gum-camphor, 1 part; pine tar, 4; and ether, 7.

SWEET MACARONI PUDDING.

AN excellent dish in vogue in Italy consists of a sweet macaroni pudding, which should be made in a plain tin mould. Into this mould put six or seven lumps of sugar, moistened slightly with water, and set it over the fire, using a hot plate so as not to blacken the bottom of the mould. Let it boil until it begins to burn, and then, by tilting the mould from one side to the other, let the burned sugar cover the whole of the inside, so as to form what the French term a caramel crust, which must stand to cool. In the mean time boil sufficient macaroni in milk to fill the mould, and sweeten to taste, flavoring with lemon peel. When cold add three eggs, put every thing into the caramel mould, set it in a saucepan of boiling water, and let it boil for an hour. Turn it out and pour coffee round it, with milk and sugar added, precisely as made for breakfast. The coffee sauce harmonizés well with the macaroni, and is a novel accompaniment. Good macaroni, by-the-way, is known by its smoothness, its transparent yellow color, and the fineness and closeness of its grain when broken.

SHIRKING A "DOUBLE."

AN IRISH TALE.

A HANDSOME, well-appointed mail phaeton was being driven along one of the wildest parts of Galway, drawn by a pair of bright, well-bred bays.

The coachman was an aristocratic man of one or two and thirty years of age; indeed, it was generally allowed there were few handsomer men than the Honorable George Crighton. With his light wavy hair, long drooping tawny mustache, blue honest-looking eyes, clear complexion, and fine figure, he was one that any woman might easily have lost her heart to; but the Honorable George was not to be caught. He had never yet seen any one he would like to have been tied to for life. He was fond of sports of all kinds, but his experience of the world told him that fifteen hundred a year would not keep his horses, his quiet, unpretending little shooting-box, and a wife as well; so he remained single. He was too honorable to ask any girl to share the discomforts of a half-kept house. Had he found one suited to him, he might perhaps have given up his sporting proclivities.

The gentleman who was seated by his side was also a good-looking man, some few years his junior, and as dark as his friend was fair. A rattle-brained fellow was Lord Evershorte, of Oftenborrow Hall; he had done every thing, was fatigued and blasé; but his love for all kinds of rural pursuits still remained, and he was now steadying down a bit to country life.

Behind these two gentlemen sat their respective servants—my lord's own man and valet, and the Honorable George's groom.

"I wonder how much farther this said Ballygoruin Castle is?" remarked the driver. "I say, my man"—to the tattered piper that was pacing along with that sort of jog-trot so peculiar to the Irish—"how far is it to Ballygoruin Castle?"

"Sure the castle is just three mile, divil a less; it's as straight as ye can go. Ye'll find Consandine Blake at home: faix, he doesn't care for cub-huntin'—and that's what they're at to-day—bad scran to him, the grindin' divil!"

"Ah! then you do not like him?" asked Crighton, stopping his horses, and impelled by curiosity to ask a few questions.

"Like him, is it? By my sowl I'd bate the brute baste into smithereens, av I had my will, the murderin' ruffian. He's a disgrace to ould Ireland, is Consandine, and the way he trates his poor wife and the colleen dhas, the little darlin'! By the leg o' Moses I'd glory to be shootin' him like a cock rabbit! Maybe yer honor would give a poor boy a bit of tobackey for a blast av the pipe?"

"Certainly, piper"—giving him a large bit from his pouch. "There you are, and a shilling with it."

"Hurroo! och wirra dheedish!" shouted the delighted fellow, as they drove away. "Maybe I won't be havin' a quarter av Muckatee's best pigtail tobackey! God save and speed ye kindly—millia buehus!"

"The piper does not give a very flourishing account of your friend Blake, does he, Evershorte?" asked Crighton.

"Not very," returned the other. "You two"—turning to the servants—"had better walk up this hill. Crighton," he continued, as soon as they were alone, "I must tell you the little I know about Blake. He is no particular friend of mine. He is, I believe, a good fellow, but, like most Irishmen, hard up. It was touch and go with him some three years back. He, however, came up to town for the season, talked big of his Irish castle and estates, and succeeded in persuading Mrs. Mordant, a widow possessed of thirty thousand pounds (with one sweetly pretty daughter), to become his wife. I had no idea, though, he treated them badly. Perhaps the piper lied."

"I hope he did," replied his friend.

"Well," continued the nobleman, "the fact is, I could not do the hunting season at Melton this year; if I had, I should have been in Queer Street again, which I do not intend. One pays for sport so infernally dear in England, you know. I must have borrowed of the rascally Israelites at sixty per cent., for not a stiver will they lend you under. I therefore wrote to Blake, and arranged with him for half his old castle. My horses, servants, dogs, and guns are all there; yours, you say, will arrive to-morrow; so I hope you will be able to knock it out with a fellow for a few months on the cheap."

"I will try, Evershorte. I suppose that must be the castle—standing far away on that bare mountain. By my faith, it does not look promising! What a country to bring a woman and a young girl to!"

After half an hour's drive, and asking again, they hit the castle—the same Crighton had pointed out to his friend.

The long, lonely looking avenue, with its few weird and stunted fir-trees, was soon passed, and they pulled up before an ancient and somewhat dilapidated-looking building, which once on a time might have been a grand and noble place, but now in its general decay and ruin looked ghastly.

An old woman of sixty or seventy years of age, blear-eyed, decrepit, and dressed as a peasant of the country, answered the summons, only opening the door a few inches, which was guarded inside by a heavy chain.

To the question of my lord's man, "if Mr. Consandine Blake lived there, and was at home," she answered:

"Maybe he is, maybe he isn't; troth he might be in Dublin, or on the top of Croagh Achine, for any I know. The divil fly away with him, the crathur! Sure Ould Nick himself couldn't tell yez where Consandine is. I'll die dead if I know; but the bainthee and the garrahaula are in the big room. Is it rates or bums yez are?"

"Thourra mon dhoul, yez ould baste!" cried a voice, and an arm rudely thrust her aside and opened the door. "Sure, yer honors, don't pay any attintion to her," said a man in a shabby worn-out livery. "The masther's at home, and the ladies too, expecting yer honors."

"The gintlemen," he said, throwing open the door of a room beyond.

"Me dear lord!" exclaimed a tall, florid-looking man, rushing forward. "I did not expect you so soon—not for the next two hours. I am delighted to see you and your frind. Allow me to presint you to me dear wife, and me step-daughter, Miss Lola Mordant. Ah! I forgot you knew me wife before, me lord, but your frind's a stranger intirely to her. Misther—Misther—" he repeated, in an unmistakable Irish accent.

"Crighton," replied that gentleman.

Consandine Blake was what would be called a good fellow, away from home; but people should have seen him chez lui to have formed a correct opinion of him. He was a mean, sordid, grasping, extravagant, lying, hypocritical scoundrel, who led his unfortunate wife and step-daughter a miserable existence; a bullying fellow, but withal a coward. Yet Consandine Blake was a genial spirit, could "belt his bottle" as well as most men, never fought shy of the "matarials" (grog), and could sing a rattling sporting song with a stunning chorus, which the hunting squireens of the thinly inhabited country fully appreciated. But among his tenantry he was detested; he ground the last farthing out of them, no matter how bad the season. He was a needy man, heavily in debt, and twenty out of his wife's thirty thousand pounds had already gone to pay off old scores and supply his extravagance; for on himself Consandine Blake did not care how much he spent. The other ten would have followed the twenty, could he have got at it, but as that was secured, it allowed them to live.

The old ramshackle castle was mortgaged to the uttermost farthing; so what with his duns' writs, his wants, etc., Consandine Blake had any thing but a pleasant time of it.

Mrs. Blake had been a beauty, and still showed signs of it, though the last three years of ill treatment, bullying, privation, and loneliness had made her look wan and thin.

Her daughter, Lola Mordant, was a lovely brunette of nineteen. The splendid dark eyes, hair, clear olive complexion, gave her almost the appearance of being a Spaniard. She had a finely formed figure and faultless foot and ankle; yet, notwithstanding her numerous attractions, her beautiful countenance wore the sad, melancholy, weary look of her mother's, and she often sighed without knowing it.

Both seemed glad to see the gentlemen, and welcomed them with unfeigned cordiality.

"I am very pleased to meet you again, Lord Evershorte," remarked the elder lady. "We are so dull and lonely here in this out-of-the-way place; but," she continued, without regarding the savage look of her husband, "although you have one-half of this old ruin, and all your servants are here, I hope you will both give us the pleasure of your company to dinner this evening, and often come to see us in our loneliness."

"Of course we will," replied his lordship, gayly. "I only trust we shall not bore you with our company;" and bowing to her, left the room with his host to look after his horses and things; so George Crighton was alone with the ladies.

"I am afraid, Mrs. Blake," he remarked, gently, after a pause, "that this is somewhat a lonely and out-of-the-way spot for ladies."

"Ah, Mr. Crighton, you can not imagine how utterly wild, savage, and isolated it is! I do do not care so much for myself"—here her mild, gentle-looking eyes filled with tears—"but poor Lola; for a young girl of her age it is a living death;" and as she uttered this she looked timidly toward the door. "Mr. Blake will not hear of moving, he is so given to his sporting pursuits; indeed, if he were not, we couldn't afford now to live elsewhere"—and she sighed as she thought of her poor thirty thousand pounds. "We do not see a soul for months together, no books, and seldom a paper to look at;" and saying this, she burst into tears and hurried from the room.

"I am sorry, grieved," returned the gentleman, evidently much moved, to the young girl, "to have broached so unfortunate a subject."

"It matters not, Mr. Crighton," returned she, sadly. "I am used to it now, but it is killing poor mamma. Mr. Blake is unhappily not a favorite in the country; he is a hard landlord—he tells us he is obliged to be so. He has had no end of notices and warnings given him, death's-heads and cross-bones painted on our doors, signed 'Rory of the Hills' and others, and I know not what besides. We live in daily dread and fear. But you must have had some trouble in finding out this dismal spot."

"We had indeed, Miss Mordant; a piper we met on the road put us in the way."

"That will be Larry. Do not, I beseech you, Mr. Crighton, mention him here. Mr. Blake is driven into a very frenzy at the mention of his name. I know not why—something that happened years ago between them. But you will excuse me while I go and look after mamma."

The day passed in the manner usual in such a dull out-of-the-way place as Ballygoruin. The dinner went flat and slow, but after the ladies left, Mr. Blake brightened up considerably, and applied himself to the bottle freely, so much so that, after a time, Crighton left the room and joined the ladies, leaving his friend with his host.

In the course of conversation Crighton discovered that Lola was exceedingly fond of riding, and that sometimes, as a great favor, her step-father took her out to see the hounds, and occasionally in an easy country she followed them.

"Then I hope, Miss Mordant, you will come out a little oftener now. I have a horse that will arrive with the others to-morrow, Gray Peter, who will carry you beautifully—in fact, a perfect lady's hunter. He shall be kept expressly for your use while we are here."

"Oh, thank you, Mr. Crighton!" exclaimed the delighted girl; "that will indeed be nice! But," she said, sadly, the animation fading out of her eyes on the instant, "it will leave poor mamma so much alone."

"Never mind, my darling," exclaimed her mother; "I shall only be too glad to know you are having a little amusement. But what are Mr. Blake and Lord Evershorte doing?" she asked, turning the conversation. "I hope they will not sit too long; it is a bad habit of Mr. Blake's;" and she sighed as she remembered certain scenes that had taken place in the last few years.

"I will look in on them as I go by," said he, "for I am stealing away to smoke a cigar." But finding the two gentlemen in earnest conversation, he walked into the hall, lighted his weed, and strolled down the avenue.

He might have proceeded a quarter of a mile, in deep thought, when all of a sudden a figure appeared from behind a low wall.

"The heel av the evenin' to yez, yer honor," said a man, approaching him. "Faith that's illigant tobackey ye gave me this mornin'. I was just reddin' the dhudeen to have another blast at it when I see yez comin'."

"Ah, the piper Larry?" remarked the gentleman. "What are you doing here, my good friend, so late? It is after eight o'clock."

"Sure it's meself that oft sits on this same spot thinkin' av times that is gone; f'what else could I be doin'?" he asked, sadly.

"By what you said this morning, Larry, you do not appear to like Mr. Blake much."

"The spalpeen! Like him, is it? Av yer honor will let me tell yez, ye'll see it's little love I bear the crathur."

"Well, go on, Larry," said Crighton, lighting a fresh cigar, and seating himself on a stone.

"It might be twenty years or more, yer honor," commenced Larry; "I was a broth av a boy thin, iver a-running after the colleens. Divil a wake, a pattern, or station was held but I found my way there; but I niver neglected my ould mother, a widder, on her little houlding: by my faix but we had bonveens and poultry asthore. When work was over I'd catch up my pipes and lave her and my sister alone, and be over the mountain to some weddin' or holiday-makin'. I was always wilcome with my pipes.

"Well, one day my sister Mary, the purtiest girl about the mountains here, and I went to Pat Nolan's son's weddin'. Thunder and turf! but it was a grand turn-out! All the tables in the kitchen had been tuk away; a turf basket set in one corner for the piper to sit on. We tuk it in turns to play; there was lashins av dhrink, and the purtiest hangin' av bacon yez iver see for thim that wanted it.

"'God save yez kindly,' said ould Nolan, as we entered. He was dhrinking at a table wid Consandine Blake, who was a young man thin; there was not much harm in him at that time, though he was a bit wildish, like a young coult. There they was, cheek by jowl; he had come widout his back" (faction or followers), "which was rare, for thim was fightin' times.

"'Mary, alana machree,' said the ould man, 'I'm glad to see yez;' and houlding out his hand to me, 'Larry, yez wilcome, aroon. Mike, ye pot-walloper,' to his son, 'git a place, ye gomach, for Mary, the little darlin'. Bad scran to yez, ye lazy omadhawns, let's begin havin' a futtin' av the boys and girls on the board; and Pat, achora, set 'em a-goin'.'

"Consandine he no sooner heard this and see Mary than he axes her to fut it; and be jabers they did thrash the flure a bit, and mighty pleased the girl seemed wid him, for he was a young, good-lookin' fellow thin, and full of divilment. We had a grand night intirely, I can tell yez.

"Some months after this meetin' Mary looked sad and ill, though not a word did she utter or iver complain. But I had my doubts. One night, on my way home from a keenin', who should I meet but Consandine, walkin' wid my sister, and his arm round her waist.

"'Thourra mon dhoul,' sid I, 'yez villin!' catchin' hoult av my blackthorn wid a fightin' gripe, 'what might yez be doin' wid my sister this time av night, and coggherin' like that?'

"'Mind yer own business, Larry,' sid he, houldin' his shillaly in a threatenin' manner. He could handle the purtiest stick av any man in the bar'ny; he was a rale beauty av a boy wid a blackthorn. 'Av it's for a bout wid the stick yez are, I'm yer man. Mary, a villich, do yez run away home and tell 'em to be bringin' a shutter for Larry; he'll be wantin' it prisintly, the bosthoon.' The poor colleen was so frightened and ashamed that she was off like lightnin' to bring some of the boys to siparate us.

"Well, we wint at it, and had the purtiest turn yez iver seen. 'Larry, ahagur, more power to yer elbow, avich!' he said, as he catched me one or two terrible strokes. 'Take that, ye pot-walloper;' and he sthruck me one acrast the timple, which made me feel sick and giddy, and sint the blood a-flyin' out and blindin' me a most.

"I rushed at him wid a hurroo, but widdout knowin' where I was, when he slipped, and I catched him one—the only one, but it fetched and sodded him as sinseless as a log. Two or three boys wid my sister jist then cum up. 'Blur an ages,' siz they, 'what is it you've been up to, Larry?'

"'Splashum! but I think I've kilt him intirely this time,' siz I. My sister, when she see him turfed there dead like, screamed loud enough to split the Rock of Cashel. 'Oh, Larry!' siz she, 'you don't know what yez have done. Blessed Virgin! it's murdhur.'

"Well, they carried him home and laid him on his bed. 'Millia buehus, boys,' siz I, as they came out to me, 'thou a mon yea, I hope he's not kilt intirely?'

"'No, Larry,' siz they, 'he's a-comin' to his sinses; but by the great gun of Athlone it's not yer fault that we're not keenin' him this blessed moment.'

"It was some time before he got about. For meself, I was sore and tinder for weeks from the beltin' I got. Mary niver spoke of him, or I aither. Weeks and weeks went by, and the truth came out at last. The poor colleen was ruined. We was nigh mad. 'Larry,' siz she, when all was known, and fallin' on her knees before me, 'swear by the blessed Virgin you'll do him no more harm.' 'Mary, achora, I swear it!'

"Well, one night as Consandine was comin' home from huntin', a lot of boys in their shirts and blackened faces sazes him and pulls him off his horse. 'Is it Mary yez remimber?' says one. 'Ye black-hearted villin, by the piper that played before Moses yez niver see daylight again if yez don't make her an honest woman at onst.' Well, yer honor, to make a long story short, he was carried to the little chapel in the mountains close by, and my sister was taken there, and afore God, the praste, and witnesses, married her—by rason that he was in fear of his life, though if he hadn't, the boys wouldn't have harmed him."

"Do you mean to say, Larry," asked his astonished listener, "that your sister married Consandine Blake?"

"As there is a God in heaven above us, she did, yer honor."

"And what became of her?" exclaimed Crighton.

"She died, years ago, yer honor," replied the piper, with a curious and sullen look. "She niver wint to his home wid him or lifted her head again; we moved away to the mountains, fifteen or twenty miles off; her child died, and thin she follerd. Now yer honor knows why Consandine and I hate one another. I often come about here, to look on ould places and think of ould times."

"A horrible tale—sad and horrible!" muttered Crighton, as he moved away. "No wonder his present unfortunate wife is so wretched with him. Poor Lola!" And he fell into a deep reverie as he strolled toward the castle.

He found his friend and their host had gone into the drawing-room. Mr. Blake was particularly amiable and very talkative; he had conceived the idea that it would be necessary to borrow a few hundreds of one of the gentlemen, and marry Lola to him as payment of the debt; it would be one less in the house, and that was a consideration.

He had already sounded Lord Evershorte, and discovered there was not the slightest chance of getting any coin out of him—seeing that he wanted it himself. So he determined to play off Lola to Crighton, who he had found out possessed fifteen hundred a year.

"Bessie," he said to his wife in course of conversation, "have you heard from me dear relative, your aunt, lately? You know, Misther Crighton," turning to him, "the old lady has three thousand a year, which is all to come to me wife at her death."

He knew he was uttering a deliberate falsehood in stating this. The lady in question had the sum named, and it was to have come to his wife at her aunt's death; but she had been so exasperated at her marriage with the unprincipled Irishman that she had never taken the slightest notice of her since she became Mrs. Blake.

"No, I have not heard from her," replied the lady, timidly, and coloring up.

"Then I advise you to write to her and invite her here. It does not do to neglict one's rich relations, does it?" he asked, appealing to Crighton.

"Certainly not," replied the gentleman; "but I hardly think this country, especially at this time of year—for autumn is passing away—would be suited to an old lady, or, in fact, any lady. It is all very well for a sporting man, but I am sure I should never think of bringing my wife here, if I had one, to pass a winter in Connemara."

The shaft shot home, for the Irishman said nothing, but shifted uneasily in his chair.

"Ah, but we will make it gay for them now that you and me dear lord are here," he replied, after a short pause.

"Of course we will," said the young nobleman, gayly. "There will be four more horses here to-morrow, so the ladies can use your carriage, Crighton?"

"Certainly, whenever they like; and my gray horse, which will arrive with my others in the morning, I have already placed at Miss Mordant's entire disposal."

A few mornings after the above a party, consisting of three gentlemen in pink and a lady, were wending their way over a wild part of the country.

These were Lola, mounted on Gray Peter—and beautiful she looked on the noble horse—Lord Evershorte, George Crighton, and Consandine Blake.

"We'll be having a large meet on this our opening day," remarked Blake, as they jogged slowly along; "there will be a hundred out, if there is one. Faith I had no idea your English horses would do the walls so well. I saw your men giving them a lesson yesterday."

"They are handy nags," remarked Crighton; "and as for the gray Miss Mordant is riding, nothing comes amiss to him—water, banks, timber, or walls, it's all the same to him."

"I doubt, Mr. Crighton, if he would carry her over that," interrupted Blake, pointing with his crop toward a flight of stiff rails a quarter of a mile off, and which seemed to have no ending.

"That is the only 'double' in the county. It was made by an enterprising English gentleman, who wished to divide his estate in the John Bull fashion by planting and protecting a quick hedge; it is stiff and lamb-proof; few of our horses can get over it, and few even try. It's a regular pounder, I can tell you."

"If any horse can jump it, Grey Peter will," said Crighton.

"And if ever we come across it, I will try. May I, Mr. Crighton?" asked Lola.

"Certainly, Miss Mordant. Let him go. He always rushes a bit at timber, but he will carry you over like a bird."

"Yes, and break your horse's back," sneered Consandine. "No lady ever yet jumped it, and we have some fine horsewomen in our hunt."

"That may be, Mr. Blake; but it does not follow my horse can not do it."

It was a fine holding day, and the hounds carried a good head, racing away at a tremendous pace.

"By George! I see the 'double!'" exclaimed Crighton; "there it is, right in front of us. And look! all the ladies are already taking another line—and most of the gentlemen too. I say, Evershorte, there is the double!"

"I see it," he exclaimed. "It's nothing for us."

Lola's eye brightened and her face flushed as she neared the formidable leap.

"Mother o' Moses!" uttered the old huntsman, "but Miss Mordant is going to ride it!" and he galloped away for a broken bar he knew of, some short distance off. "The poor colleen will break her neck."

"Let him go, Miss Mordant!" shouted Crighton, as the horse rushed at the fence. "Don't check him, for God's sake!"

The resolute girl did as she was told, gave him his head, and the noble animal cleared it at a bound.

"Well ridden indeed!" exclaimed Lord Evershorte, whose horse hit the rail with his hind-legs, and nearly gave him a cropper. "Crighton is over. By Jupiter! we are the only three that have ridden it yet. Well jumped again," he uttered, as Consandine and one or two more cleared it or scrambled over. There were, however, several riderless horses galloping about, for the "double" was a big one, and required a deal of doing.

"I niver in all my born days," ejaculated the old huntsman, "see a lady take such a leap as that afore. It bates cock-fighting all to smithereens. I onst see a lady attimpt it; she managed to jump in, but divil a bit could she git out till we broke a bar for her."

"Well, Miss Mordant," asked Lord Evershorte, as they were all returning homeward, "how do you like your new horse?"

"Oh! he is delightful. I never was so mounted, or took such a jump as that 'double,' in my life before. I can never thank Mr. Crighton enough for his kindness."

"I am most delighted, I am sure," said the young man, "to have afforded you any pleasure" (he thought how lonely and isolated the young girl had been during the last three years), "and you will do me a still further favor, Miss Mordant, if you will accept Gray Peter, and keep him as your own individual property."

"Murder! but you don't mean to say, Crighton, that you give that horse to me daughter? Why, he's worth two hundred guineas!"

"If he were worth five, Miss Mordant is heartily welcome to him, and I hope she will do me the favor to accept him, for I am certain he could not have a kinder mistress, or one who would ride him better or straighter."

"By me faith, Lola, but you're in luck!" said her step-father, after she had finished thanking him for his handsome present.

"Indeed I am, Mr. Blake; and you see," she added, roguishly, "he did not kill me, nor did I break his back over that 'double.'"

"Crighton," said Mr. Blake, the following morning, as they were strolling about smoking a cigar, "you did Lola a kindness yesterday: will you do me one to-day?"

"Certainly I will, if I can, Blake; what is it?"

"Why, lend me a couple of hundred pounds for three months," said the unabashed Irishman.

"You must know, Blake," replied Crighton, gravely, "that I am not a money-lender, nor are my means large enough to grant loans."

"Well, but, me dear fellow," interrupted Consandine, "I shall be ruined entirely if I can not get the coin."

"This once, then, Blake; but remember, it must be the first and last time I will let you have money." He knew at the time he was writing out the check how little prospect there was of his ever seeing it again.

"It shall be paid to the hour," said Consandine Blake, buttoning up his coat with a self-satisfied air as he left the room.

A month or six weeks passed away in hunting and shooting, and Lola was constantly out with the hounds, riding "the gray horse" in a style that commanded the admiration of all who saw her.

Crighton's attentions were unmistakable, though as yet nothing had been said, or, at any rate, nothing that any one knew about.

Blake, seeing the young man, as he expressed it, "nailed," ventured to propose a fresh loan of Crighton, which was positively refused, much to Consandine's disgust and indignation. He now cooled in his ardent and professed friendship toward the young man, and thinking by shaking him off he might get rid of his debt at the same time, proceeded to an act of open hostility, and took the bull by the horns at once in a somewhat unceremonious manner.

"Mr. Crighton," said he, catching the young man one morning in the stable-yard, where he had been to look at his horses, which he never failed doing after breakfast, "I'd like to have a few words with you in me own room."

"Certainly, Blake, my time is quite at your disposal;" and they adjourned to the Irishman's sanctum.

"There can be no mistaking your attentions toward me step-daughter, Crighton, and it's time I interfered," he said. "I don't approve of her galloping about after hounds or walking about with you as she does. The thing can never be. I set me face entirely against it."

"If you were her guardian, or had any control over her, I might listen to you, Mr. Blake; but as I know her mother is the only person who has a right to influence her, I must decline your interference," replied Crighton.

"Her mother be damned, Sir! Who cares what a weak person like that says, does, or thinks? I am master here, and will be."

"You may be master here, and over your poor unfortunate wife, but you must understand once and for all that you are not my master, nor will I allow you to interfere in any manner whatever in my affairs." And saying this, he walked calmly from the room, leaving Consandine purple with rage and suppressed passion, and gasping in his arm-chair.

Both ladies suffered for this, for the bully's behavior was almost unbearable. The poor lady now seldom appeared; but Lola, in defiance of her step-father's reiterated threats, showed as usual at the cover-side.

Crighton's manner was so determined that Blake hesitated to say any thing more to him, and when they did meet, which they were often obliged to do, there was merely a cold salutation on either side.

Lord Evershorte had been informed by his friend of what had taken place, and he was naturally very indignant with Blake at his behavior toward his guest.

"Never mind, Crighton," said he, "he will bowl himself out, and that before long. Steer clear of him, and avoid an open rupture."

Another month passed away, and matters wore no better aspect; but Lord Evershorte and Crighton seemed oftener together than usual.

Another meet of the hounds was advertised for the cross-roads, and thither on the morning Blake, his step-daughter, Lord Evershorte, and Crighton repaired. Blake was sullen, as usual, and spoke but little to any one.

"I'll make him more lively presently," whispered the nobleman to his friend. "You'll see the best bit of fun directly you ever saw."

"Really, I hope and trust you will do nothing rash, Evershorte."

"Nothing, on my honor. But you know he must be got out of the way; he sticks as close to Lola as a leech."

"Well, do as you like," returned the other. "I am satisfied with your explanation."

On arriving at the spot where the hounds were they found a large field assembled, for the meet was a favorite one; it was a sure find and a good country. They were chatting to their different friends, when two strangers made their appearance, mounted on useful-looking nags; one was a red-bearded and whiskered man, and the other a dark one, and both had a look of indescribable fun in their countenances.

At this moment some one on foot went up and spoke a few words to Lord Evershorte, who at once rode toward Blake, who was holding forth to a lot of squireens.

"I say, Blake," said the nobleman, "did you see those two strangers come up?"

"Yes, I did; who the divil are they?"

"Make the best of your way home, Blake, and shut up the house. They are a couple of bums, come to serve you. I've just been told to warn you. And see! they are gradually coming this way. Get off quietly."

Blake turned his horse and moved on; the strangers did likewise. Consandine then put his horse in a gentle trot, as if warming himself; the others did the same. Seeing he was followed, he crashed over a fence and was away.

With a wild hurroo the two others followed, and a regular race ensued. The magic word "Bums!" flew from mouth to mouth, and nearly all the field followed to see the sport.

Blake went straight ahead for the castle, taking every thing.

"Oh Lord! I shall never forget this!" exclaimed the nobleman, screaming with laughter and wiping the tears from his eyes.

"But who are these two bailiffs, Lord Evershorte?" asked Lola. "I hope—oh, I do hope they will not catch him!"

"They are not meant to catch him, Miss Mordant. One is Larry the piper, and the other a friend of his. I hired horses, coats, and beards for them. I never saw such devils to ride in my life!" and he commenced laughing again. "But, Miss Mordant, it was absolutely necessary to get him away, and I think I have succeeded. But see! the field are coming back from one hunt. Now for another."

A scream of "Tally-ho! gone away!" brought the hounds rushing out of covert, and they settled steadily down on his line.

Neither Lola, his lordship, nor Crighton seemed so keen as usual; they rode cautiously, and seemed in no hurry to get in the first flight. Still, they took every thing as it came.

The formidable "double" at length appeared. Men settled their hats firmly on their heads; most of them intended to have a turn at it, for they felt rather ashamed that they had shirked it when Lola and the two Englishmen had jumped it. The other ladies took another line, as usual.

"We must not do it to-day," remarked Lord Evershorte, looking at his watch. "Time is up; but we will go on for a couple of hundred yards farther—in fact, up to it—and then pull."

"Mother o' Moses! I hope Miss Mordant will not try it again," muttered the old huntsman, as he scuttled away for the broken place, followed by a lot of others. "Sure ladies never know when they are well off."

Many were the falls at it, but some few got over.

"Blood and 'ounds! but the English gentlemen and Miss Mordant have shirked the double!" exclaimed a sporting squireen who had taken it in a fly. "I niver thought it of them." But the pace was too good to make many comments. The last they saw of the three was that they were cantering away in another direction.

"Now, then," said his lordship, directly they got into the highway, "come along; there is no time to lose."

Lola looked confused, and blushed as he uttered this.

"Oh, I hope I am not doing a very foolish thing!" she said, looking Crighton fondly in the face.

"No, dearest, no; it is the only plan. No one need be the wiser till we choose to tell them; it will give me the power of protecting you and your poor mother from your brutal step-father."

"Well, I suppose it must be so, George," she uttered; and they pushed on at a smart pace.

In a quarter of an hour they pulled up before a small church; it was situated in an isolated spot, and far away from any house or village. Larry the piper was already there to receive them and hold the horses.

"There's not a sowl here, yer honors, except his riverence; he's jist come. Sure I'd like to see yez tied up, for I niver was in a Protestant church in my life, and this is the only one in these parts."

They quickly entered the little building, and before many minutes were over the Honorable George Crighton and Lola Mordant were made man and wife by especial license, Lord Evershorte giving away the bride.

"Now, George," he said, "let's be away before a soul sees us. The hunt," he added, "will know some day why we shirked the 'double.'"

"Jist one word, yer honor, before yez goes," said Larry to Crighton, as he pocketed the handsome douceur which that gentleman had presented him.

Lord Evershorte and the lady were already mounted and walking quietly away.

"What is it, Larry? Be quick, there's a good fellow."

"Jist this," replied the man; and he said something to him in a low tone of voice.

"My God! is it true, Larry? Do you mean it?"

"It is true, yer honor, ivery blessed word. I'd swear to it on the book."

"Then why did you not tell me before?" Crighton asked.

"Becase I wish to have a holt on Consandine. But you may tell him the bums is after him in airnist this time; they will be there this evenin' to serve him, and a good back wid 'em."

"Larry," said the young man, sadly, "you surely would do no harm to them who never harmed you? Give me your solemn oath you will never let a soul know of this. You shall never repent it."

"Would it be hurtin' them if I did?" he asked.

"Hurting them? It would kill them. Man, have some pity; they have ever been good and kind to you."

"Faith they have, yer honor; and as there is a God above me, I'll niver breathe a word to mortal about it. God bless yez!" And he walked slowly away; but, suddenly recollecting himself, gave one wild hurroo, and kicking off his brogan, threw it over his left shoulder, and then stood motionless, looking after them as they rode away at a rapid pace.

Crighton looked anxious and ill at ease as he joined the others.

"Well, old married man," asked the nobleman, "what has kept you?"

"I was just having a few parting words with Larry, and begging him to be silent. Now, Lola, my darling, let us get along."

On arriving at the castle they found Consandine Blake anxiously awaiting them, in a state of wild excitement, in the drawing-room. Mrs. Blake also wore more than a satisfied air.

"You are home sooner, Lola, than I expected you," she said. "Come here, dearest, I have some good news for you."

"What is it, mamma?" she anxiously asked.

"What is it?" exclaimed her step-father. "Why, a letter has come to me dear wife. Her old aunt is dead, and left you the three thousand a year—not a stiver to Bessie; but it's all the same, me darling."

The girl turned deadly pale as he said this, but did not utter a word. As for Crighton, he noiselessly left the room.

"Well, I congratulate you on your good luck, Mrs.—no, I mean Miss—Mordant," said Lord Evershorte, correcting himself in time; "I congratulate you, with all my heart."

"You will both dine with us to-day, will you not?" asked Consandine. "Divil a bailiff do I care for now." He quite seemed to forget the money was not his own, and that he had not the slightest claim to it.

"We will come, with pleasure. I will answer for Crighton." And he looked significantly at the young lady.

The dinner that day passed off more lively than usual. Consandine was in high spirits. "Didn't I do them bailiffs elegant this morning?" he asked.

"Grandly," replied the nobleman; "it was the best bit of sport I ever saw." But, seeing his poor wife looked sad and ashamed, he adroitly turned the conversation.

"Lola," said her step-father, as the ladies rose to leave the room, "I'll want a few words with you presently in my room; be there in ten minutes."

"I will," she answered, as she left the room.

After he had seen his guests drawn up by the fire, and a bottle of claret between them, Consandine left them, saying he would be back in ten minutes. He found the young girl waiting for him.

"Lola, me dear child," he commenced, "you are now a woman of fortune, and can do as you like. We will all go to Dublin for the remainder of the winter—your mother wants change—and in the spring on to London for three months."

"But what will you do with Lord Evershorte and Mr. Crighton?"

"Oh, hang them! We need not bother ourselves about them now. You're always thinking of that fellow Crighton. I hate him. You shall never marry him. I forbid it."

"Indeed, Mr. Blake!" she answered, with more than usual animation. "Suppose I do not choose to consult you? My money is left to me unreservedly, and I may as well tell you I do not intend to consult you on the matter of my marrying."

"Well, but, Lola, me dear child," he said, astonished at her spirit, "we will talk of that another time. But I'm in the divil's own mess just now. The bailiffs were after me to-day, as you know. I want you to lend me a couple of hundred to put me straight."

"Certainly not, Mr. Blake. It is no use asking me; I will not do it."

"What?" he exclaimed, his face blazing up with passion. "You can—you must—you shall!"

"I will not. I can not do it; it is not my own," she said, falteringly.

"Then whose the h—l is it," he coarsely demanded, "if it is not yours?"

"Mine, at present," said a voice. "Till a settlement is made—which shall be done as soon as possible—it is mine."

Consandine turned at this interruption and confronted Crighton, who looked him sternly in the face.

"Yours, you beggarly upstart? What do you mean by yours?"

"Simply this, Blake," said the other, calmly, passing his wife's arm through his own. "Lola is my wife—we are married."

The other turned livid as he heard this, but he was too taken aback to utter a word; but if looks could have killed Crighton, he had been dead on the instant.

"Lola, my love, leave the room for a few minutes. I want to have a short conversation with Mr. Blake. We shall understand each other thoroughly presently. Here, Evershorte," he said, as the young nobleman entered the room, "take my wife to her mother and explain all. Now, Blake," he commenced, when they were alone, "I'm not going to quarrel with you. Just listen patiently to me for a few moments. You know Larry the piper?"

"Know him? I do." Here he uttered a horrid oath.

"Well, so far so good, Blake. You married his sister."

"Good God! who told you that, Crighton?"

"No matter; I know it. Her child—your child by her—is dead."

"Yes!" he exclaimed, savagely. "It is dead, and its cursed mother too."

"No, Blake, no," the young man said; "she is not dead, poor soul, but she will be soon, for she is quickly passing away in a decline."

"What?" screamed the wretched man, "not dead? On my oath—on my solemn oath—I knew it not, Crighton! I was told she was dead years ago. You will believe me, will you not? O God! has it come to this?" and he covered his face with his hands.

"Listen to me, Blake," said the other, gently. "I believe you in this. I am aware you knew it not, for Larry has told me all. You were kept in ignorance of her living. The piper wished to have a hold on you, and revenge at some future time. Not a soul knows of it but myself, and no one ever will, if you keep your own counsel. I would not let poor Mrs. Mordant hear of it for all I possess. I have Larry's oath he will never mention it, and that oath I know he will keep. You must not see Mrs. Mordant again. You have made her life wretched enough. To-night or to-morrow you will be arrested—not served, but arrested—there are warrants out against you. Now which do you prefer? Going to prison, or escaping to the Continent, where you shall have three hundred a year as long as you remain? It shall be paid quarterly and regularly to you. Choose, and choose quickly, for if you wish to escape, it must be to-night."

It is needless to say Crighton's offer was accepted. The frightened, cowering bully was got away in the darkness, and crossed to France. An excuse was made for him to the ladies. They were told he had fled from the bailiffs, who, when they came the next day, found the bird flown.

Crighton, his wife, her mother, and Lord Evershorte a few days after landed in England, heartily sick and tired of Ireland. Not a word did Mrs. Blake, or rather Mrs. Mordant, know of the past, for Crighton kept the secret rigidly locked in his own bosom. The poor lady always went by the name of Blake, and believed herself to be so to the day of her death.

Consandine Blake did not live long to enjoy his annuity. He took to brandy, which soon finished him, and what remains of him is now lying in an overcrowded cemetery at Boulogne. His supposed widow did not grieve much, for he had led her a wretched life. She is happy with her daughter, with whom she resides. She pets and spoils her grandchildren and dotes on her son-in-law, who is more than considerate and attentive to her.

Evershorte is still unmarried, though he talks of being "tied up." "You look so jolly and comfortable, George," he would say, "that I've half a mind to try matrimony, only I'm afraid my club will be stopped, and that I could not stand. If I thought a fellow could go to his club and have his hunters, I'd have a try. I know a dooced pretty girl, with a nice fortune, who is to be had for asking. After all, I'm single now, and on the right side of the hedge. No, on second thoughts, I'll remain as I am. Yes, I am for shirking a 'double.'"

A SONG OF ANGIOLA DEAD.

"Vale, unica."

SONG, art thou sad, my song!
Thou hast not ease nor sleep;
Thou art not gay nor glad;
Hast thou not mourned too long!
Speak to me, song, nor weep
Till thou grow gray and mad
For that all love is fled,
Beauty and bountihead:
Song, thou art sad!

Song, ah, how fair was she!
Days but her praise repeat—
Men may seek out with care
Nowhere such eyes to see,
Nowhere such little feet—
Yea, and such yellow hair;
Nowhere like lips, I weet,
Kisses thereon to eat:
Song, she was fair!

Song, and how sweet she was!
Spring breezes kissed her face;
Little leaves kissed her feet;
And the sun kissed, because
Nowhere in any place
Thing was to kiss so sweet;
Nothing so dear as she,
Gentle and maidenly:
Song, she was sweet!

Song, but how good she was!
There was nothing she said
But it was wise and good;
No abject thing but has
Out from her mercy fed,
Strong in her pity stood;
There was no little child
But to her leaped and smiled:
Song, she was good.

How shall we wait, my song?
There is no mirth in cup;
Nowhere a feast is spread;
Life is all marred and wrong;
Grief hath consumed it up,
Now that our love is fled;
Earth hath no face to see
Pointing my sword for me:
Song, she is dead!

Song, shall we leave to sing?
Nothing can wake her now;
Nothing can lift her head;
There is no tune can bring Back to her cheek and brow
Roses of white and red—
Nothing of ours can stir
Words to the lips of her:
Song, she is dead!

Cease, then, from scent, my song;
Change thee thy myrrh with rue,
Myrtle with calamus;
Bring for us garments long,
Weeds to our grief, and strew
Dust on the hair of us,
For that all love is fled,
Beauty and bountihead:
Song, she is dead!

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MISS V. B. P.—Use the Loose Front Double-breasted Polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 23, Vol. VI., for your linen suit.

MRS. W. H. A.—Full information about mourning dresses is given in Bazar No. 21, Vol. VI. Make the navy blue dress by Loose Front Polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 23, Vol. VI.

MRS. N. L. N.—Your sample is black merino. Make a double-breasted sacque, and trim with thick silk cuffs, collar, pockets, and buttons. Put goffered fringe on the edge.

NEW SUBSCRIBER.—Trim your gray silk with lengthwise bias bands on the front breadths, and three or four straight wide gathered flounces behind. For the black grenadine have two deep flounces headed by puffs.

JULIA.—Use a basque and Worth over-skirt for a stout lady's grenadine dress. Trim with pleated flounces edged with narrow guipure, and headed by jet galloon.

E. B. W.—Make your suit by Gabrielle Polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 24, Vol. VI. Use fresh benzine, or else chloroform, for taking oil out of silk.

NETTIE.—Use the loose polonaise pattern sent you for your buff polonaise. Trim the edges with bias bands of the same, piped with white linen, or else cut it in scallops and bind with linen. Put one deep Spanish flounce on the skirt.

ECONOMY.—Put seven bias bands of darker blue silk the whole length of the three front breadths of your pale blue silk. Then add two dark flounces on the three back breadths, edging them with pale blue.

Z.—For a girl of seventeen get a black chip Rubens hat, trimmed with black turquoise silk and wild roses. For a girl of thirteen get a sailor-shaped Rabagas of rough straw. For a lady of thirty-seven, a black Brussels net bonnet, with jet, lace, a pompon, and moss.

WESTEEN.—Get tamise cloth or else seersucker for a traveling dress for mourning. Make with the long Double-breasted Polonaise illustrated in Bazar No. 23, Vol. VI. A cashmere sacque or Dolman is used for extra wrap.

CHARLOTTA.—A polonaise and flounced skirt is the best design for your Japanese silk. Trim with alternate ruffles of black and gray silk.

S. M. R.—Make a châtelaine polonaise of your black grenadine, lining waist and sleeves with silk, and trimming the edge with a wide grenadine puff with a ruffle each side edged with lace. Put two deep flounces of grenadine, each headed by a similar puff, around the skirt. A fraise and ruffle on the sleeves should be filled in with Valenciennes lace or else crêpe lisse pleating.

OLEA.—Read reply just given "S. M. R." The châtelaine polonaise is illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. VI. Use a black watered ribbon sash with your black grenadine polonaise.

BEATRICE.—It is customary for the bride-maid to give the bride a present.

CARRIE L.—Little girls are wearing brown linen polonaises made double-breasted, and belted precisely like those worn by their mothers. Read "Children's Fashions" in Bazar No. 25, Vol. VI. Edge the linen with a piping fold of white, brown, or blue linen.

LOLA M.—Swiss muslin polonaises are made long and loose, without lining, and are edged with a plain ruffle, or else lace or embroidery. A white corset cover is worn under them. A side sash is a succession of long loops and two uneven ends hanging from the belt on the left side quite far back. Watered ribbon sashes are very popular.

MOTHER.—Your suggestion about the graduating dress is very good. Read description of such a dress in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 25, Vol. VI.

A CONSTANT READER.—The polonaise and flounced skirt are invariably prescribed for grenadines this summer. Have one made with a close-fitting vest polonaise, and let the other be loose and belted. Put puffs edged with lace on the black dress, while for your sage green you should have pleatings laid so that the stripe will be uppermost in each pleat.

NEWARK.—The first-class furniture stores here make cradles like our illustration, but object to selling them without the curtains and fanciful accompaniments.

M. N. V.—Embroidered linen suits are stylish; braided suits are very common. Your sample is Irish poplin, and will wear well. Talmas, Dolmans, and old-fashioned mantillas are more stylish than double capes.

MRS. W. W.—Alcohol will remove grape stains.

HOBART.—The engagement-ring is worn on the first finger of the left hand; the wedding-ring on the third finger.

JULIA.—White grenadine suits will be worn at the watering-places and out of town for church and visiting dresses.

CONSTANCE.—Straight side-pleated and gathered flounces are both used in grenadine. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 26, Vol. VI. Napoleon blue linen is difficult to obtain here. A few private dressmakers import it for $1 a yard. We will furnish you a cut paper pattern of suit with a pleated blouse, which is the fashionable shirt waist. Fraises may be either gathered, side pleated, or box-pleated, according to material. A white neck-tie does not require a colored one also, but looks well with highly colored jewelry, such as coral or turquoise.

MEG.—Use black or gray, or else the blue itself, for trimming your blue polonaise.

MIGGS.—Your sample is real Cluny, but lace does not dye well.

K. B.—Get a llama lace sacque, or else buy guipure net and lace and make a pretty loose sacque with insertion let in the seams.

EVA.—Read about princesse dresses in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 26, Vol. VI. The Bazar and Supplement containing an illustration of Worth's princesse dress has been sent you.

CONSTANT BAZAR READER.—Make your baby boy's dresses to reach to the ankles. Make your calico with a box-pleated blouse-waist and a ruffled skirt, with or without an over-skirt.

A. M.—Leno is not displayed in the stores this season. De bège at 50 or 60 cents a yard is the most popular traveling dress. Black silk is the best dress to buy when one dress must be worn on all occasions.

CHICAGO.—Read about grenadines in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 26, Vol. VI.

AN APPRECIATIVE SUBSCRIBER.—Hem your polonaise plainly without braid. White gloves would be less objectionable than black at a full-dress party, and bare hands would not do at all. After wearing crape ten years of your widowhood, you are certainly entitled to leave it off.

EVERY mother who has a crying baby, or children subject to croup and stomach-complaints, can rely upon Castoria to keep the child well and give it rest. There are but few nurses in New York who do not use Castoria. It should be in every house.—[Com.]

HOW IS THIS?—OVER 86,000,000 SEWING-MACHINES FOR 1872.—Some of the sewing-machine agents in our city have been continuously advertising the rate of increase of manufacture of their particular machine. These statements have induced us to ascertain which machine actually has the largest per cent. of increase, and we find, from the sworn statement of all the companies, that the New Under-Feed Wilson Sewing-Machine's manufacture in 1871 was an increase over 1870 of 4100 per cent., the most wonderful increase ever recorded in the world. If the Wilson manufacture increased at the same rate in 1872, they will manufacture over 86,000,000 sewing-machines this year. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

Wreath with any Initial, Monogram, or word, or Bouquet, made of as many pieces or colors of Hair as you may send.

Almost every family possesses some hair of deceased relatives, which can be made into beautiful pictures, forming imperishable and unchangeable mementoes and handsome household ornaments. Either of the above designs appropriately framed 4 x 6 inches, sent prepaid on receipt of $10.00. The above is the very best method of preserving the hair in its original color, and is now being extensively adopted by all who wish to preserve such as relics to perpetuate the memory of the departed. Have one made. You will surely order others on seeing how really artistic the work is done. Will return all hair not used. Established 1843. CHAS. V. PECKHAM, Near Amity St. (Copyright secured.) 687 Broadway, N. Y. City.

HAIR!!!

☞ REMOVAL.

L. SHAW Has removed his well-known Hair Establishment to 364 Bowery, corner Fourth Street,

Branch store, 363 Sixth Avenue, and begs leave to call the attention of the ladies to his superb stock of Human Hair Goods, of the best quality of hair only, of his own importation and manufacture.

As I have had numerous complaints from ladies who have been led astray by unscrupulous imitators of my advertisements, and bought inferior goods, I call the attention of the ladies to 364 Bowery, cor. 4th Street, which entire building I occupy.

The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.

RETAILED AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

All Hair used in my establishment I import and manufacture myself, and is of the best quality only; and if any expert can prove that I use in my goods any other quality but the best, or mix it with Italian or Chinese Hair, which is generally applied to by other dealers, will refund the money in every case.

I can offer to the public inducements which can not be superseded by any of my competitors.

All goods WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St. and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

FACETIÆ.

A YOUNG lady studying French, and finding that "belle" meant "fine," told some one in a letter that "we had a great deal of belle weather lately."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Fastidious James.—It is not strictly etiquette, when a gentleman declines to dine with you on the ground of being engaged, to write in reply that you believe that's all humbug, and that he hopes for a pleasanter invitation; but your answer would often be truthful.

Eja, Ita, Quia (who write on the same subject).—It is most ungenerous to your friend to accept his invitation, if going will bore you. Give him credit for desiring that you should do what will make you happiest, and stay away.

Miss Sappho.—If you think that you can sing better than Madame Patti, there is not the least objection to your getting over from the boxes into the orchestra, and thence to the stage (the Big Drum is politeness itself, and he will heave you up), and trying. But courtesy demands that you should wait the fall of the act-drop, and perhaps you had better obtain a written permission from the manager.

Anti-Fiddler.—Ha! ha! "'Music hath charms to soothe the savage breast,' and to irritate every other," is not bad, for you. But cotton wool is cheap enough, and staying at home is cheaper.

Impatient Hester.—When Hamlet said "Those that are married already, all but one, shall live," it is certain that he meant, when King of Denmark, to provide means of living for such couples as had wedded on insufficient incomes. But don't you and "Dear Tom" marry on the idea that any thing of the sort will be done for you. Wait, and hope to get tired of one another.

Amphibious.—Never change your opinion about any thing. But, as the object of talking is to annoy somebody, express whatever opinion is likely to be most distasteful to your hearers. If any body calls you inconsistent, punch his head.

Qui s'Excuse.—Letters intended to be delivered never miscarry. Misdirect carefully, if for any reason you desire your epistle to go astray and be returned to you, that you may show it when the mischief you wish it thought you tried to prevent is done. If you ought to write Madison Square, omit "Square," and your letter will make a pleasant tour.

Fidelis.—Never betray a secret. But there is no law against your making a memorandum of a secret for your own use; and if you happen to write with a thick pen, and promptly to use the blotting-pad, to which a club gossip is sure to resort, it will be the fault of the paper-makers, not yours, if he reads and tells. We knew an objectionable marriage prevented by such an—accident.

Student.—The question whether Mary Queen of Scots was sincere, or only politic, in refusing the hand of Louis XIV., has often been discussed. We are not inclined to give a positive opinion where Lingard doubts and Pinnock generalizes, but we have reason to think she would have married him but for the strange conduct of Talleyrand, who instigated the Sicilian Vespers in order to divert the attention of Europe from Mary's affair with Cæsar Borgia.

Maria.—You ask who "Glossary the poet" was. You have seen his works indicated on the back of the volume containing Chaucer, Gower, and Skelton. Quite right to ask. He is a very nice poet, and has this advantage, that he explains every word he uses, which several moderns do not do.

Scientific.—We never had the slightest idea as to what is meant by pressure on the barometer, and we have lived a good many years very comfortably without knowing. We believe, however, that if you press it too hard it will break, and the quicksilver will tumble all over the floor, and this produces a pretty effect.

A Dejected Wife.—We can give no advice about marking-ink. Besides, respectable washer-women now decline to work for persons who are mean enough to mark their linen, and thus not only show a want of confidence, but give the trouble of sorting the things.

Scotus.—The lines are in Burns's works, but they are only an amplification of Dr. Watts's terse and elegant couplet:

"If I could see what others see,
A better cove I think I'd be."

Le Comte d'A——.—"The dual function of the brain" is, we imagine, to keep a man with brains out of a duel.

Scrupulous.—There is no objection to shooting a street organist, but do not fire out of window when any body else is about, lest you injure a fellow-creature.

Sir Wilfrid L.—In Sumatra it is with the greatest difficulty that a native can be got to pronounce his own name. There is not this etiquette in America, but toward the evening of New-Year's Day a good many persons appear to be Sumatrans to the extent in question.

OTHER COMMUNICATIONS RECEIVED.—Vetus (old enough to know better).—Pemmican (is not the same as pelican, but you are the same as goose).—X. X. (you may be only twenty, but your joke's one hundred at least).—A Beginner (leave off).—P. S. (Sir, nota bene, we do not stand impertinence).—A Bristolian (go to Bath).—Aliquis (you think you're "somebody;" may difference of opinion never alter friendship).—Critic (hypercritic; an artist draws well enough who can draw a good check).—F. T. W. (neat, only anchora is not Latin for an anchovy. Try again).

Every body is allowed to be keeper of the seals in Alaska.

QUERY.—Are the Michi*ganders* any relation to the Portu*guese*, and if so, how much, and what?

For what does M.D. stand? Don't exactly know. It represents Doctor of Medicine, Medical Doctor, Mule Driver, Medical Distinction, Mulatto Doctor, Mileage Dividend (for Congressmen), Mine Digger, Military Department or Division, Mischief-Doer.

In one of the towns of Mississippi two colored men were arrested on the charge of burglary. The jury before whom they were tried were all colored. After the case was tried they retired and made up a verdict, which was announced to the court. On being called, the judge asked for the verdict, which the foreman delivered as follows:

"Dis jury find dat one of de 'cuse busted in de sto' and stole dat bacon, and dat de oder didn't do noffin."

"Which one do you find guilty?" asked the judge.

"Dat's de question, boss," returned the foreman; "dat's jes what we can't find out; and we recommend dat de honorable coat jes have anoder trial, and find out which on dem two niggers stole dat bacon."

BELLIGERENTS.

GRANDPAPA (goaded to madness, as the ball bounded from the back of his head). "Get out of the Room, you Little ——! I've Told you Half a Dozen Times, Sir, to go and Play in the Hall. My Dear, I wish you'd Ring for Mary, to take the Child Up Stairs."
GRANDSON. "If you do, I'll Get into Mischief, and Turn on all the Faucets!"

SWEARING.

"Mother, did you ever hear sissy swear?"

"No, my dear. What did she say?"

"Why, she said she wasn't going to wear her darned stockings to church?"

THE TURF AFFECTION—'Ossification of the heart.

Back as many horses as you like, but you had better not back them through shop windows—it comes expensive.

OLD PATIENTS.—Curran being at a party at the seat of an Irish nobleman, one of the company, who was a physician, strolled out before dinner into the churchyard. Dinner being served up, and the doctor not returned, some of the company were expressing their surprise where he could be gone to. "Oh," says Curran, "he has just stepped out to pay a visit to some of his old patients."

A short time since a gentleman with long fair whiskers, and dressed in the height of fashion, entered a hosier's in Vienna, and requested the shop-woman, who happened to be alone, to show him some colored shirts. Every variety was brought out, when he made his choice, and requested that a parcel might be made up for him. This being done, "What an idiot I am!" he said. "I have not seen how the shirts look when on. Would you oblige me, mademoiselle, by putting on one over your dress?" The shop-woman having complied with his request, "Be so good," he continued, "as to button the collar and the wristbands, that I may get a thoroughly good idea of the effect. And now," he added, taking up his parcel, "allow me to wish you a very good morning;" and in an instant he was outside the door and had disappeared, the unhappy girl, perfectly stupefied, not daring to follow him into the street on account of her singular costume. Her employer, on returning from his café half an hour later, found her, with the fatal garment on, crying on the counter.

THREE COURSES.—The Course of Time, the Course of True Love, and the Course at Jerome Park.

HENCE THESE SIZE!

BLANCHE (to her brother). "Charlie, you look very miserable. You promised me you wouldn't bet heavily. Have you lost much?"

CHARLIE. "Yaas! Bet half a dozen pairs of gloves with Mrs. Furlong."

BLANCHE. "Nonsense! that's nothing."

CHARLIE. "Aw! beg y' pardon—I'm thinking how a fellah is to go and buy the gloves without sacrificing his self-respect. Why, the woman wears seven and a half!"

PAVING WITH GOLD.—In this "enlightened age" few will be found to believe that the streets of New York are paved with gold, yet it would puzzle a clever contractor to pave them without it.

One of the soldiers sent against the Modocs received a letter from his sister containing the following beautiful and touching sentiment: "And if any thing should happen to you, do make some arrangement to have your hair recovered and sent on. It is the exact color of mine, and I can't get a pair of curls of the right shade any where here."

A race is sometimes won by a head, but the legs generally land all the money.

CIVILIZED CANNIBALS.

"Why do they call the people that live in some of the South Sea Islands cannibals?" asked an old man of a sailor.

"Because they live on other people," answered the sailor.

"Then," said the old man, pensively, "my sons-in-law must be cannibals, for they live on me."

MEMORY.—We don't believe a word of the following: Dr. Johnson, it is said, never forgot any thing he had seen, heard, or read. Burke, Clarendon, Gibbon, Locke, Tillotson, were all distinguished for great strength of memory. When alluding to this subject, Sir William Hamilton observes: "For intellectual power of the highest order none were distinguished above Grotius and Pascal, and Grotius and Pascal forgot nothing they had ever read or thought. Leibnitz and Euler were not less celebrated for their intelligence than for their memory, and both could repeat the whole of the Æneid. Donnellus knew the Corpus Juris by heart, and yet he was one of the profoundest and most original speculators in jurisprudence. Ben Jonson tells us that he could repeat all he had ever written, and whole books that he had read. Themistocles could call by their names the twenty thousand citizens of Athens. Cyrus is reported to have known the name of every soldier in his army. Hortensius (after Cicero the greatest orator of Rome), after sitting a day at a public sale, correctly enunciated from memory all the things sold, their prices, and the names of their purchasers. Niebuhr, the historian, was no less distinguished for his memory than for his acuteness. In his youth he was employed in one of the public offices of Denmark. Part of a book of accounts having been destroyed, he restored it by an effort of memory." We conclude as we began. We don't believe a word of this long-spun yarn.

Rabbit poachers are said not to be particular to a hare.

A TOUR DE FORCE—A policeman's rounds.

A San Bernardino (California) assessor asked a woman how many chickens she had, and doubting her word, proceeded to count them. She took him to the bee-hive, kicked it over, and invited him to count the bees. He'll take a woman's word next time.

Captain Jack has confessed to Hooker Jim that he is the author of Betsey and I are out.

A Danbury young man is to stand a suit for breach of promise, having said he would take a young lady to Barnum's and failed to do it.

"This company shall never get another cent of my money," said an angry lady on a railway train.

"How, then, will you travel?" asked the conductor.

"I'll pay my fare to you."

MISS PRISCILLA'S BONNET.

So this is your wonderful bonnet,
All flowers and feathers and lace,
Full twenty-five dollars' worth on it,
And it don't hide a bit of your face;
It perches its puff of illusion
On top of your tangle of curls,
As if half afraid of intrusion.
When I and your mother were girls,

Niece Fanny, our bonnets were beauties.
I remember one Dunstable straw
That was white as the whitest of duties,
And its fibre as strong as the law;
For seven years running I wore it,
A ribbon tied under my chin,
A long figured veil floating o'er it,
And blushes and dimples within.

You smile? Youth is so unbelieving
In all save its joy in itself.
Don't dream for a moment I'm grieving,
Or think myself laid on the shelf;
But fifty odd summers have faded
The bloom that was bright at sixteen,
And the face, growing older, is shaded
By thoughts of the years that have been.

I had blushes and dimples, however,
And my skin was not browned by the sun,
Like yours, Fanny darling. I never Had freckles at your age—not one.
And thanks to my sensible bonnet,
That kept the rough wind from my hair,
The gloss of the chestnut upon it
Was satin-smooth, dainty, and fair.

I sat with the singers in meeting
The summer my bonnet was new:
How the fugues and the quavers, repeating
Themselves, thrill my memory through!
For Will by my side said, "Priscilla,
Can heaven be sweeter than this?"
One morning. He lies 'neath the willow,
Soon caught to the heavenly bliss.

Will gone, the rest married and scattered,
Afar to the East and the West,
And I'm Aunt Priscilla, unflattered,
By only the babies caressed;
Yet full of a subtle compassion
For you with your tangle of curls,
Half spoiled by caprices of fashion,
My prettiest, dearest of girls.

Ladies' Summer Walking Suits, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustration on first page.

Fig. 1.—BUFF LINEN WALKING SUIT. Skirt of buff linen, trimmed with flounces headed with bias folds of white linen; Valois waist, with sides extending so as to form a sort of over-skirt. The upper flounce of the skirt also edges the bottom of these sides, which are trimmed with bias folds and bows of white linen. The front of the waist is trimmed with white linen brandenburgs. Gigot sleeves, trimmed with white linen bands and bows. Yellow straw hat, with purple ribbon and feather.

Fig. 2.—BLOUSE-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN). This pretty suit is especially designed for thin summer fabrics and wash goods—such as grenadines, organdies, linen lawns, percales, calicoes, etc. It is substantially the same as the favorite loose-fronted polonaise, made single instead of double breasted, and is confined at the waist by a belt, or worn loose, according to taste. The original is of white organdy with black polka dots. A treble box-pleated ruff of the material encircles the neck. The walking skirt is also of dotted organdy, and is trimmed with flounces.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS suit comprises two garments—blouse-polonaise and walking skirt.

BLOUSE-POLONAISE.—This pattern is in five pieces—front, back, sleeve, ruff, and sash. The front is loose-fitting, and closed to the waist line with buttons and button-holes. The back is half-fitting, with a seam down the middle; extra fullness is cut on at the waist line, and laid in a large double box-pleat on the under side. The skirt is draped in the back by three tapes, cut ten inches long, tacked one on the other at the waist line on the middle seam. The end of each tape is fastened at the three single holes. The pleats on each side of the back are formed by placing the four holes evenly together, and bringing them up to the single hole at the waist. The coat sleeve is sewed plainly in the armhole, placing the longest seam of the sleeve to the notch in the back part. The neck is finished by a treble box-pleated ruff, cut on the bias; the pleats are laid according to the perforations, placing the seven holes evenly together on both sides, making the box-pleat on the upper side. The line across the upper part of the sash placed even with the top edge forms the loop. Cut two pieces like the pattern given of the sash. Put the pattern together by the notches, and pay no attention to the grain of the paper. The perforations show where to baste the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, where to drape the skirt in the back, to form the pleats on the side and ruff, the size and form of the under part of the sleeve, and how to form the loop in the sash. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all others. The notches at the top and bottom show where to turn back for the hem in front.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 9 yards.
Extra for trimming, 2 yards.
Ribbon for sash, 8 inches wide, 3½ yards.

WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, two side gores, and half of back breadth. Cut the front and back with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Cut two pieces each of the pattern given for the side gores.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 7 yards.
Extra for flounces, cut on the bias, 10 inches deep, 6 yards.

A SCHOOL OF LIFE.

WE once heard a brilliant woman of large experience in the world declare that if in our life the game was a hundred, marriage, no matter with whom it was contracted, counted fifty.

It was an extraordinary thing to say, and at the first hearing aroused a lively opposition. For is there any single person living who will admit failure and bankruptcy as an inevitable portion? And is there any married person, whose marriage having been only a misery, will admit its troubles and vexations worth as much as all the rest has been—worth half as much, indeed, as all the rest of life might have been? And if marriage with any one counts fifty—the marriage of Edith Plantagenet, for instance, with Dennis O'Flaherty—should not the marriage of Edith Plantagenet with Henry Tudor count at least twice as much? Not in relation to the difference of rank or riches between Tudor and O'Flaherty, of course, but to the difference of advantages both of surroundings and education, the difference of training through refining generations, and the consequent difference of experience, to say nothing of enjoyment.

And yet certainly, on second thoughts, a deal of truth will be found in the assertion, as we shall see by looking at it on more sides than that of the mere happiness or unhappiness of the affair. Happiness, after all, except in its ultimate effect upon temperament, is a trifle. If you doubt that, remember the favorite remark of Mrs. Squeers, when she pronounced concerning any doubtful matter that "it would be all the same a hundred years hence," and you will understand that it makes but little difference to the universe at large whether you are happy or unhappy, but the greatest difference whether your character was developed to its utmost or dwarfed and stunted in its growth. Doubtless unhappiness may sometimes destroy good humor, force you to succumb to it, give up in despair, and there an end; but that is only when you are so lamentably weak that it is of no sort of consequence whether you give up or not, for your qualities were too poor and feeble to amount to any thing, if ever so well supported. You may, in fact, be very unhappy, your home may be disagreeable, your circumstances deplorable, your husband unsympathetic; but if you bravely meet your difficulties, if you bring any energy to bear in the endeavor to overcome them, if out of your own sadness you can learn how to touch tenderly and soothe the sadness of another, you eventually reap a fuller happiness than the first ephemeral enjoyments that you craved could possibly have proved; for one of the greatest blessings given to us is self-content, the feeling that God's gifts have not rusted in our hands, the sense of an approving conscience. The pleasure of a luxurious home, of splendid dress, of opera and theatre and ball, the delight of love itself—all these things are nothing in the long-run to that approving conscience. These pass, but the other is ours till the reversing stroke of fate has turned our substance back to dust.

As we can not possess that approving conscience, unless we are inordinately vain and self-glorifying creatures, without having done our best, then with its possession that development of character must have taken place in us whose influence is felt in immense circles ever widening like the ripples in a lake. For as the arm withers that is not exercised, the faculty disappears that is not used, so the use and exercise of what is best within us develop those traits into the strong characteristics that not only have their effect upon others about us, but descend and mould the generations to come.

Looked at from this point of view, therefore, it is easily seen that whatever exercises to the farthest our better and stronger qualities is really of the most permanent value to us and to the world; and it will then hardly be doubted that marriage does this very effectually.

Look, for example, at the temper of an average married woman. It has gone through an experience that could touch very few single women. Not that the single woman's temper is by any means an ill one; but, save when she is exceptionally placed, she is living an independent life, subject to nobody's whims and demands, and her temper has generally been totally untried. It is, therefore, a negative virtue simply. But the married woman's temper has endured all trial. Under the best of conditions—that is, when her husband is faithful, temperate, kind, and in easy circumstances—there have been the frequent surrenders of the will, the repression of wishes, the annoyances of keeping the house not to please herself, but another, and not always successfully at that; the crucial test of servants; the weakening of some sickness and pain; the loss of sleep that fretful children cause; the necessity of attending to the wants of others; patching and darning when a bit of fancy-work would be delightful, and an hour with a novel paradise—the thousand vexations that accompany family life, where so many different natures meet, even under the most careful management. And if the conditions are not the best; if a husband is not faithful and temperate and kind; if he is hard, exacting, coarse; if, tired with business, he gives the angry retort or the sneering snub; if he reduces her to seeming nonentity; if his fierce outbursts make her cringe, his manners disgust and mortify her—if out of that furnace her temper has come untouched by the fire, or only refined into a heavenly patience, why, then it is a positive and tremendous virtue, as strong and fit to carry her upward as a pair of wings might be: and nine-tenths of the time that is the state of things with her.

Then, too, the usual experiences of marriage are such as are only enriching to any nature. To live for another, to have the great object in life of being the happiness of another, to be to a husband an example of the perfection of womanhood—these are possibilities which ought to fertilize the most barren soul. And, for the rest, where can there be any thing in life equaling the endurance of that great mystery of motherhood which takes one between the gates of life and death, and almost into the purposes of the Creator? Where can there be any drama better worth seeing than the opening of little minds, the kindling of those eternal sparks, the display of their parental heritage? any enjoyment better worth having than the hug of little arms, the kiss of little mouths? And of such enjoyments neither tyranny nor parsimony nor choler is apt to deprive one.

At the same time let us remember that men customarily love where they marry; they would prefer to give pleasure rather than pain, and, except in cases of real depravity, it is their intention and effort to do so. If they ever become too selfish to be tolerated, it is not impossible that the wives who have coddled them past belief may be a little to blame themselves. If irritabilities develop into brutalities, the wife who made haste to appease the passion by humbling herself and fawning, instead of calmly and evenly meeting the storm, has herself largely to thank; for it has been a part of human nature, ever since it was turned out of Eden, when it saw a worm to tread on it.

On the whole, then, it must be confessed that marriage, even if it were not a state preordained by nature, would be as a school of life an affair of infinite value—of value, indeed, that no statement of percentage could reach; and that, on the other hand, a single life must needs call up all its forces of merit and strength and individuality to compete with it, so far as the benefits to character are concerned. There are, to be sure, many martyrs in marriage, but then there are just as many monarchs. The mistake about it all is the too great expectations with which people enter it. Life, some philosopher has told us, is little better than a perpetual state of warfare. We fancy that the bugles sing truce, and that the warfare is about changing into reveling, when really it is only an ally marching up to the attack. When we dismiss the ideal of the romance, remembering the old adage that, though there is a difference in men the world over, yet "husbands are pretty much of a muchness;" when we dismiss the notion that we are marrying into a race of saints and angels—the sons of God, in fact, while we are only the daughters of men; when we look the true state of the case in the face, and stand up squarely to our duty before it, recollecting that not till we ourselves are perfect can we expect to mate with perfection—then also we may righteously hope to find happiness as well as good experience.

"Seeing either sex alone
Is half itself, and in true marriage lies
Nor equal nor unequal: each fulfills
Defect in each, and always thought in thought,
Purpose in purpose, will in will, they grow,
The single pure and perfect animal,
The two-celled heart beating, with one full stroke, Life."

LETTER-WRITING.

IT is generally supposed, in these days of headlong haste and cheap postages, that letter-writing is among the lost arts; but though the SÉVIGNÉS and Lady MARY MONTAGUES are typified in the plant which requires a century before it comes to perfect blossom, yet doubtless it would surprise many of us to discover the amount of ability in that direction which is possessed by those who write with no view to the public approval or criticism. The letter-writer of to-day does not go so deeply, perhaps, into abstruse subjects as his ancestors; it may be that he does not discuss "fate, free-will, foreknowledge absolute," but his sentences are terse and to the point; they treat of the business of the day; they are history epitomized. Should the coming man have recourse to them, he might be fully prepared to construct a synopsis of the times; from the letters of a statesman, the condition of politics and state-craft; from the merchant, the relations of supply and demand in the markets; from the clergyman, the attitude of the Christian world, the preponderating religious influences; from the scientist, the discoveries in the processes of the universe, in the "open secrets" of nature; from the woman of the world, the customs obtaining in polite society, and the fashions that pass away. Not that any of these probe the subjects upon which they are supposed to treat; they touch and go, and suggest rather than relate, which invariably piques the imagination and arouses the interest. Good letter-writing does not so much require an extra talent as confidence in the reader, a ready belief that he or she will welcome whatsoever we may choose to say. Many people fail in writing well because they are at a loss what to say and what to leave unsaid, how to winnow the wheat from the chaff. They seem to think that a letter must be something altogether alien from social conversation, something formal, partaking the nature of an oration, rhetorical and in flowing style, with well-rounded periods. The mere fact of giving their thoughts in black and white confounds them; they wish to do something which they should not blush to own, and a crusty constraint is the result. Their letters lack cordiality and naturalness; if you should read them, and then meet the writers at dinner or on the train, you would be forced to ask, "Why this disparity between the man and his works?" Because he has a trick of leaving himself entirely out of his letters; because the things he would dare to say, the opinions he professes, the aspirations he could avow, he shrinks from committing to paper: when you have read his letter you know as much about him as if he had never written.

Yet there are those who can make such love by letter as would constrain an angel to listen, who are awkward enough in the ordinary methods of courtship, who know no more how to whisper a pretty compliment than to read Sanskrit, who would as soon have the courage to pour their souls in a glance as to gambol with VAN AMBURGH'S lion. There are those who can dun most successfully by letter, who would starve sooner than ask their dues by word of mouth. The letter gets over many embarrassing situations for some of us, for whom it is easier to write than to speak, whose ideas flow more smoothly from the pen than the tongue, for those whose natural timidity restrains from expressing their likes and dislikes aloud; the letter seems a sort of whisper for such, and they do not stop to reflect that it is a whisper with an echo. How much the letter saves the lover in case of refusal! the written denial appears so much less cruel than that which is spoken; but in the reverse case how much he loses! We would, on this consideration if no other, advise a lover never to plead his suit by letter—jamais, jamais, as the French reiterate—if he is overdoubtful, since the mere magnetism of his presence may suffice to turn the scale in his favor; and no woman cares to be wooed by proxy. The eyes looking love, the electric touch, what powerful advocates they are, matched against a bit of white paper covered with black characters that seem already to have put his hopes in mourning!

stances seemed to demand that a letter should be of a more weighty kind—especially if the postage was not prepaid. But according to our fancy the letters of friendship should read as much like the ordinary chitchat of the writer as possible; nothing for effect, every thing because it is her way; as utterly devoid of self-consciousness as if she were talking at her own fireside, where every one is supposed to have an appreciative audience. There is a spontaneity in such letters that seems to bring the writer bodily before you; every word acquires the tones of her voice, every punctuation mark is eloquent with her individuality; a few scratches from her pen transports you into her atmosphere; she gives you hints how things are with her, whether life is a poem or a text; she is felicitous in the selection of words that are volumes in themselves; and in ten minutes she tells you more of her way of life, and that of all in whom you are concerned, than another could tell you in as many years. After reading such a letter you feel as if you had renewed your friendship with a dozen old acquaintances, and had heard all they had to say. And yet it requires no absolute genius to write a good letter, but only a judicious selection of the material in hand, and freedom and vivacity in the mode of expression.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

BLOUSE-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.

THE blouse-polonaise walking suit illustrated on our first page, and of which a cut paper pattern is published, is an excellent model for costumes of summer fabrics, such as Swiss muslin, grenadine, guipure, batiste, linen lawn, percale, cambric, and the plain prints used for every day. This polonaise is a cool, flowing, easy-fitting garment, with full, loose front and partly adjusted back, cut with few and simple seams; when belted down it has the effect of a plain blouse (infant waist) and an open-front over-skirt. The belt may be worn all the way around, or only in the back, according to fancy. The back requires a belt and side sash; but this belt may be passed through slits in the seam under the arm, and worn under the front, leaving it flowing, if greater coolness is required. There is but one seam in the back, and one under each arm; the shoulders are exceedingly short, and the sleeve is a French coat sleeve that extends up on the shoulder precisely as if cut for a gentleman's coat. Such polonaises made of washing fabrics are entirely without lining; those made of grenadine, Chambéry gauze, or foulard have a lining of thin silk in the waist, extending just below the belt, and also in the sleeves. Although especially suitable for thin fabrics, this model is also used for heavy linens, bamboo cloth, Turkish toweling, piqué, camel's-hair, de bège, flannel, and the various materials now used for over dresses.

The fraise or ruff around the neck of this polonaise is a stylish feature this season. It is a bias band of the material doubled, triple box-pleated in the middle, and so fully pleated that the edges of each cluster of pleats curl backward, making the top and bottom touch, and producing quite a pretty effect. This fraise, when made on black silk and grenadine dresses, is sometimes lined with white silk or a color, instead of being made double of the dress goods. The colored lining is very dressy, and a becoming relief to black dresses. White muslin fraises are also very pretty when lined with a color and edged with Valenciennes lace. The back of the fraise measures about three inches when doubled, and slopes away narrower toward the front. It is not sewed around the neck band, but just below it; a double frill of sheer white crêpe lisse, muslin, or lace is then worn standing inside of it. The sash is very simple, and consists of two drooping loops and two diagonal ends hanging from the belt on the left side, rather far back. Patterns of the fraise and sash are furnished.

To trim a Swiss muslin polonaise of this kind, use one or two puffs of the straight muslin gathered without a cord, and edged with a narrow ruffle at top and bottom; pale blue, violet, or rose-colored ribbon is then put inside the puff; this is inexpensive and effective; for more dressy garments narrow Malines or Valenciennes edging is added to the ruffle. To trim a muslin skirt use two ten-inch gathered flounces, straight, with a puff at top and bottom of each. For grenadine polonaises a bias puff six inches wide is used, or else narrow side pleating and edging of thread lace. For the linen lawns, cambrics, and prints that are to be laundried frequently, the simple trimming is a bias band stitched on by machinery, or else a double ruffle fluted. Calico suits made in this way are as cool and comfortable as wrappers, and have the advantage of being suitable also for the street, for early morning rambles, shopping, etc. Square pockets may be added to polonaises of thick calicoes, cambrics, and linen, but are inappropriate on those of thinner goods. Piqué polonaises are edged with English open-worked embroidery, and worn with black velvet sashes. Sometimes loops of white braid are sewed on the outside of the skirt, and when fastened over buttons just below the belt, are very useful for draping dresses of washing fabrics. Large pearl buttons with eyes, or else wooden moulds covered with the dress material, are used for fastening the waist. Those who prefer polonaises closed down the entire front can use this pattern by merely altering the drapery slightly, putting it not so far backward or so high, and extending buttons and button-holes down the whole length of the front. There is quite a fancy at present for the Louis XIV. button-holes that are bound with the material instead of being overcast.

SUMMER HATS.

Wholesale millinery houses are introducing some new straw hats for the summer. The choice among these is the English walking hat, a modified Rubens shape, with half-high crown, and narrow brim turned up high and close to the crown on each side, with square projecting front and back. This is one of the few stylish hats that afford a slight protection to the eyes, as it may be worn quite far forward on the forehead, while most of the new shapes are placed very far back. It comes in black and white straw, chip, and Neapolitan braid. The brim should be faced on the sides with velvet or silk, and merely bound in the back and front. A loose scarf of turquoise, or else soft twilled silk, is then carelessly disposed around the crown, and knotted behind with standing loops and short wide hanging ends. Two ostrich tips curl over the crown from the left side, and soften its outlines. A cluster of half-blown roses, red, yellow, and pink, or else some wild sweet-brier, is placed low down at the back, and an oxidized silver buckle may be added on the right side. If more plainness and simplicity are desirable, the flowers, feathers, and buckles may be dispensed with, and the one touch of color given to black hats be merely a slender pointed wing of shaded blue or green.

Another novelty is the promenade hat of straw, with steeple crown, high and sloping, and one side of the brim turned up flat against the crown. The handsomest of these is of white straw, trimmed with soft black silk, lined with straw-colored silk. A bias band of this is laid in an easy fold around the crown, so that the merest edge of straw-color shows like a cord; some loops are placed high on the turned-up revers, and a little aigrette heads a long willow ostrich plume of black, in which some straw is introduced. The brim of the hat is bound with black, showing a straw-colored piping. These plumes are also new. They are long ostrich feathers curled softly like the willow plumes of two years ago, and are very much admired.

COIFFURES.

Hair-dressers predict that coiffures will soon change their position and be worn lower; indeed, leaders of fashion have already begun to wear them so, though it is probable that the present altitude will be retained during the summer, as it has the advantage of being very cool. The chignon, so criticised during its popularity, was so easily adjusted, and so much lighter than the heavy braids now in vogue, that ladies regret its decadence, and will be glad to hear that it is about to be restored to favor. Finger-puff chignons, made very light, with lengthwise puffs coming down on the forehead, and extending to the nape of the neck behind, are the newest caprice shown by one fashionable coiffeur, while another has already sold numbers of them to ladies who are going to country resorts out of reach of hair-dressers, and want something dressy that can be arranged without their aid. These puffed chignons are merely hair rolled over the finger and pinned to a hair net, and have none of the heating "topsies" over which chignons were formerly mounted. They will not answer for general wear, as they are easily disheveled. They cost from $10 to $25.

The most prevalent coiffure for the street and general use is still the crown braid, wound high around the top of the head. Double and single crown braids, in thick plaits of three tresses, are each worn; these are natural-looking, but are heavy and expensive. A switch of brown, wavy hair, sold lately for this purpose, weighs eight ounces, is fifty inches long, and cost $235. Patches of finger puffs, mounted lengthwise, are sold to pin on top of the head as a centre piece for crown braids. The Pompadour roll, high above the forehead, is out of favor for all except very blonde and prematurely gray hair; also the idiotic-looking Vandyck fringe falling almost to the eyes, in Skye terrier style. It is once more the fashion to part the hair in the middle, letting the white skin gleam through, and drawing the loose, large waves of hair back easily and naturally in a way most becoming to broad, low, Greek foreheads. Bonnets are now placed far back on the crown braid, in order to display to advantage these wavy, luxuriant, but smooth tresses, that are so unlike the "fluffy" front hair so long in vogue. Closely crimped hair and all frizzes are abandoned for this more natural-looking wavy hair. Ladies who have burned or worn off their front hair by frizzing it are using false fronts, not like those worn by old ladies, but made up of short, waved tresses, set on a thin, lace-like net of hair that does not conceal the natural white scalp at the parting. These cost $10. Parting the hair on the side is becoming to many faces, but it has a fast, girl-of-the-period air that makes ladies loath to adopt it, except for the house. The hair about the temples is no longer stretched up from the roots toward the top of the head, but is drawn backward in a natural way that avoids a bald, bare look. All cosmétiques and oils are banished by hair-dressers; they use merely water, and prize above every thing the natural gloss that comes by brushing the hair. Two or three long, luxuriant, thick curls are added to full-dress coiffure, or else a cluster of very short ones falling backward from the crown. The flowers used for full-dress coiffures are in small clusters, placed directly on the top of the head without trailing vines. Natural flowers are preferred to artificial ones for June weddings and summer receptions. Mosses and very delicate green vines, like smilax, are wreathed in and out of the puffs and braids of young ladies' coiffures; aigrettes and pompons of mixed feathers and flowers are worn by matrons and elderly ladies. Young girls still wear a single long Marguerite braid of three thick tresses hanging down behind.

TRIANON FANS.

Fans are so increased in size that they have become legitimate targets for the caricaturist's pencil. They are shown in the shops a yard in length from tip to tip, but those of half this size are found most salable. The fan for full-dress is the Trianon, of silk or satin, with a bunch of flowers painted in one corner, and a long branch or spray trailing across to the opposite corner. It is mounted on fine lacquered wood sticks of the same color, or else on pearl or yellow ivory. The plain fan may be bought, and the decorations painted according to fancy. Lady artists charge $4 or $5 for painting in oil a rose cluster, or monograms, butterflies, or imps. A French gray silk fan is prettily decorated with scarlet geraniums and white daises; another is black, with a rose, in true Spanish taste. For every-day use the fancy this summer is for Japanese fans of thin light paper, painted in characteristic fashion, and mounted on lacquered or sandal-wood sticks. Very pretty ones may be bought for 50 cents; handsome ones of coral-colored paper cost from $1 25 to $1 75, according to size. The Russia leather and tortoise-shell fans introduced last year are now made very large, and ornamented with monograms. Dark blue linen fans were imported early in the season, but are difficult to find now. White and black feather fans are shown for mourning, also black silk fans wrought with jets. The bridal fan is of white silk, with painting on one side and lace on the other. The spread Japanese fans, as cheap as palm leaves, are strewn about parlors and chambers for general use. Châtelaines for hanging fans to the belt are this season made long enough to permit the fans to be used without detaching. Ribbon châtelaines to match muslin dresses in color are preferred for morning use.

For information received thanks are due, for dresses and dress materials, to Miss SWITZER; Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; and ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; for bonnets, to Messrs. WORTHINGTON & SMITH; and for hair-dressing, to Messrs. DIBBLEE; and BARKER.

PERSONAL.

LORD DERBY rasps the British traveler for his senseless extravagance, but says that American tourists make themselves still more ridiculous while meandering abroad. His lordship, of course, knows the Briton, but hasn't the correct idea of the American citizen—not at all. Americans are all too modest and unpretending. No push about them. They are just a little inquisitive, nothing more. But they like to see things—every thing, and are not stingy on figures. They are never ridiculous, never.

—The Princess MATHILDE BONAPARTE has done a novel called The Lady of the Rubies, which is praised by her friends, and will soon be published. The critics are on the qui vive for its appearance, and are quite likely to injure somebody's feelings.

—Bishop WILMER, of Alabama, has succeeded in all but two cases in bringing up the minimum salary of every married clergyman in his diocese to $1000 a year.

—Mr. P. B. SHILLABER has received a communication from Mrs. Partington that may be interesting to cripples generally: "Lame!" sighed she. "Here I have been sufferin' the bigamies of death for three mortal weeks. First I was seized with a bleedin' phrenology in the hampshire of the brain, which was exceeded by the stoppage of the left ventilator of the heart. This gave me inflammation of the left borax, and now I am tickled with the chloroform morbus. There's no blessin' like health, specially when you're ill!"

—The new palace of Baroness ADOLPHE DE ROTHSCHILD in the Rue de Monceau is one with which any lady should be satisfied, it being the finest in Paris. It is large, admirably arranged, and splendidly decorated. Objects of art, pictures, and rare bronzes adorn the various salons with a tasteful prodigality. The drawing-rooms are constantly ornamented with fresh flowers, and the pictures draped with camellias.

—For eighteen months POWERS, the sculptor, has been compelled to cease from labor, on account of a bronchial affection. His second son, PRESTON POWERS, has devoted himself to sculpture, for which he showed a strong inclination when a boy.

—Mrs. General JAMES PIERCE, of Sharpsville, Pennsylvania, has given $10,000 toward the endowment of a second Warren Professorship at Buchtel College, Ohio. It will be given her name. Probably not one person in fifty thousand knows that there is such a place in Ohio as Buchtel—it has a sort of Egyptian sound—yet it has a college, endowed professorships, etc. Truly we are a great people. Likewise intelligent.

—SAMUEL L. MITCHELL, late of Rye, Westchester County, recently deceased, made a will, just submitted for probate, the first bequest of which is as follows: "I give and bequeath unto my dear wife, ANN ELIZA MITCHELL, the diamond ring sent by the Emperor ALEXANDER, of Russia, to my late uncle, Dr. SAMUEL L. MITCHELL, and by him left to me, to do with it as she pleases."

—Mrs. General W. F. ("Baldy") SMITH, Mrs. Justice FIELD, Mrs. EDWARD COOPER, Miss EDITH COOPER, Miss BALCH, Mrs. L. P. MORTON, and Miss MORTON had the felicity of being presented to Queen VICTORIA at a recent drawing-room.

—We have lost the name of that reporter for a Wisconsin paper who wrote, "Those who personally know our esteemed fellow-citizen, Colonel WATTS, will regret to hear that he was brutally assaulted last evening, but not killed."

—Mr. FORREST'S personal property has been appraised at $220,386, of which sum $196,000 is in securities and cash. The amount of his real estate is not stated, but it must be very large.

—LÉON GAMBETTA, as he appears in the French Assembly, is described by EDMUND YATES as a fat, gross man, of middle height, with reddish-brown complexion and decidedly red nose, with a queer louche, or cock-eye, which gives him a half-jovial, half-sinister expression. He wears a curly-brimmed, grease-stained hat, a tortoise-shell double eyeglass hanging loose around his neck, shining coat, and full trowsers, into the pockets of which his hands are thrust up to the wrists.

—Among the curious personal items picked up by "Burleigh," the New York correspondent of the Boston Journal, is the fact that Mr. CYRUS P. SMITH, of Brooklyn, has been a director in the Brooklyn ferries for forty years, and president of the company over thirty-seven years. He has been for years an elder in the Presbyterian Church, a leader of the choir, and a man of marked public spirit. He thinks it will take $15,000,000 to complete the East River Bridge. The foot traffic on the ferries is simply enormous. The five ferries belonging to the Union Company transport daily 125,000 persons. During the year the company carry ten per cent. more persons than the entire population of the United States, and this not counting persons who cross in carriages and on teams. This estimate is made up from the actual receipts of the company. Out of the forty millions carried annually across these ferries only ten persons a year have fallen into the water, or jumped overboard in jumping after the boat. But one person has lost his life on the boat in ten years, and he persisted in sitting with his feet over the front after he had been warned by the deck hands.

—The Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER, at one of his late Friday evening lecture-room talks, apologized for the Rev. "Adirondack" MURRAY'S recent sermon to the Plymouth people, the philosophy and religion of which neither he, Mr. B., nor his people believed in. But he was glad that they had an opportunity to hear once in a while a sermon that they did not like, and, he added, with a quiet, BEECHER kind of smile, that he thought he paid the people of Mr. MURRAY'S church off by what he said in Park Street pulpit.

—The scheme of the Marquis of Lorne for increasing the pay of the poorer incumbents in the Church of England meets with small encouragement. Very few of the leading laymen have taken any notice of it whatever, and some of those who have, give it as their opinion that what is needed is not the addition of new sources of revenue to the Church, but the rearrangement and redistribution of her existing revenues.

—MACREADY, the actor, was one of the most unsympathetic and fastidious of men. He made his valet wait at the table in white kid gloves. He took extreme care of himself, and was most methodical in his habits: dined at three, went to bed at four, and was called shortly before six to proceed to the theatre. It was by care and abstemious habits that he was enabled to reach his eighty-first year. His reticence, his undemonstrative manner, his regularity of life, were all of a piece. He was, in fact, eminently a "particular" man, and he had the pettinesses as well as the virtues incident to that cold correctness of character. Jealousy of smaller men was one of his failings. He created more original parts than any of his predecessors; he made more money, and in every sense was more successful; yet he was always the reverse of popular with the members of his own profession; they always complained of his illiberal feeling toward them.

—If ever there was a purely personal complication it is in the case of the DANIELS family, in Kentucky, which may be stated as follows: JOHN W. DANIELS married the daughter of Mrs. SARAH R. BRAVARD; afterward B. S. DANIELS, the father of JOHN, married the old lady; and still later JAMES W. DANIELS, the nephew of JOHN, married a sister to JOHN'S wife. It is very easy to see that JOHN is son and son-in-law of B. S. DANIELS, and that JAMES W. is grandson and son-in-law of the old man and brother-in-law and nephew of JOHN, etc., and JOHN now desires to know, through the columns of the local newspaper, what relation the children of these three sets of parents are to each other.

—We purposely avoid giving publicity to the name of the young lady in Greenville, Tennessee, who recently presented her lover with an elaborately constructed pen-wiper, and was surprised on the following Sunday to see him wearing it as a cravat.

—Mr. CHARLES MORGAN, of this city, who some two or three years ago founded the school bearing his name at Clinton, Connecticut—his birth-place—has given $500 to be expended in presents at the end of the term to the two hundred and fifty scholars attending the school.

—Precisely how Presidents live when freed from the formalities incident to their position, and when alone by themselves, is concisely described in the following paragraph: "From the official rooms, which are often seen by gentlemen who have business with the President, we pass into the private apartments. First we enter the library, which is fitted up with mahogany book-cases, tolerably well filled, and oak furniture. This was the reception-room of Mrs. JOHN ADAMS, for in her day none of the down-stairs parlors were either finished or furnished, and she used to have her Monday's washing hung out to dry on lines stretched in the East Room. Next to the library is the President's room, plainly furnished, and opening into Mrs. GRANT'S sitting-room, on the other side of which is Miss NELLIE'S room. The sitting-room has blue curtains, and the furniture is covered with blue, while pictures and books give it a home-like appearance. Opposite Miss NELLIE'S room is that of Master JESSE, a bright boy, and the especial favorite of his parents, who has just gone to California with his playfellow and school-mate, a son of ex-Senator COLE. The state bedroom is the most elegantly furnished room on the second story, and beyond it is the chamber of Mrs. GRANT'S father, Mr. DENT, now in his eighty-eighth year. The family life at the White House is very simple. All rise about seven, and a substantial breakfast is served at eight, the President bringing his favorite newspapers to the table, and reading them as he enjoys his coffee and toast. After breakfast the President takes a short walk, returning to his office at ten, and remaining there until four, when he takes another walk, or perhaps a short drive. Meanwhile Mrs. GRANT and Miss NELLIE have attended to their household duties, received the calls of friends, and perhaps made a few. At five, sharp, dinner is served—a plain repast, of which a dish of hominy is always a part. After dinner there is an informal reception in the Blue Parlor, with an occasional conference on political subjects in the President's office up stairs. Such is the daily life of our Chief Magistrate and his family."

Crochet Edging for Lingerie, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

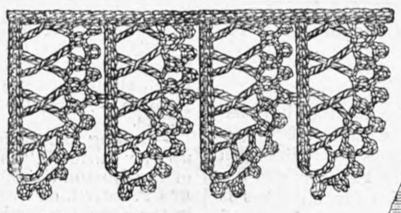

Fig. 1.—CROCHET EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Fig. 1.—This edging is worked crosswise with twisted cotton, No. 70. Begin with a foundation of 20 ch. (chain stitch), and going back on this, and passing over the next st. (stitch), work the 1st round.—1 sc. (single crochet) on each st. of the preceding round. Turn the work, and, always inserting the needle in the back veins of the st. of the preceding round, crochet the 2d round.—Cross dc. (cross double crochet). Instead of the first cross dc., work 9 ch., 1 sc. on the sixth ch., counting from the beginning, t. t. o. (thread thrown over) once, pass the needle through the third of the 9 ch. (counting from the beginning), t. t. o. once more, insert the needle in the third following st. of the preceding round, take up one loop from this st., and always work off two loops on the needle (the t. t. o. also count as loops) together, throwing the thread over once, until they are all worked off. Then work * 1 p. (picot—consisting of 4 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these), 1 cross dc.; for this work 1 stc. (short treble crochet) on the second following st. of the preceding round, and only half finish it, 1 dc. (double crochet) on the second following st. of the preceding round, finish the stc., 1 p., 1 dc. on the middle vein of the stc. and on the upper vein of the dc. Repeat twice from *. After working the last cross dc. work 4 ch. and 1 sc. on the last st. in the preceding round. Turn the work, and crochet the 3d round.—3 p., the first and last of which count 4 ch. each, and the middle p. 6 ch.; 1 sc. on the next p. of the preceding round, * 1 p. of 5 ch., 1 sc. on the next p. of the preceding round, and repeat from * until 1 sc. is also worked on the last p. of the preceding round, then again turn the work, and crochet the 4th round.—12 ch., 1 sc. on the fourth p. of the preceding round, 7 ch., turn the work, and repeat from the first round until the edging is of the requisite length. Finally, work on the upper edge of the edging one round of sc.

(treble crochet) on the last foundation st., but instead of throwing the thread over the second time, take up one loop from the middle of the 7 ch., and in working off the tc. use the loop as a thread thrown over; 1 cross dc.; that is, 1 tc. on the next st. of the preceding round (only half finish the tc.), 1 dc. on the third following st. of the preceding round, finish the tc.; 2 ch., 1 dc. on the middle vein of the tc. and on the upper vein of the dc., twice alternately 3 ch., pass over 3 st. of the preceding round, 1 cross dc. Turn the work. 2d round.—5 ch., 1 sc. on the next 3 ch. of the preceding round, 6 ch., 1 sc. on the st. after the first cross dc. and 1 sc. on the following 3 ch., 4 ch., 1 sc. on the last of the first 7 ch. of the preceding round; turn the work. These two rounds are repeated, observing the illustration, until the edging has gained the requisite length. On the edge bordered with cross dc. work one round as follows: * 1 sc. on the ch. before the next cross dc.; on the upper vein of the cross dc. work one scallop of 1 sc., 1 sdc. (short double crochet), 5 dc., then 3 p. consisting each of 8 ch. and 1 sl. (slip stitch) on the first ch.; in working the last p., however, work the sl. on the last of the 5 dc. On the lower vein of the cross dc. crochet 5 dc., 1 sdc., 1 sc., and repeat from *.

Netting Pattern for Curtains, Covers, etc.

FOR the foundation of this design work always alternately 61 rounds in diagonal netting with fine cotton, then 6 rounds with coarse cotton; the first and last of these 6 rounds must be worked on a mesh of at least double the circumference of the mesh previously used. Work the wide strip in point de reprise, in the design shown by the illustration, with knitting cotton or twist. The narrow border shown by the illustration is intended for the outer edge of the curtains, covers, etc. Work the foundation along the outer contour of the narrow border in button-hole stitch, and cut away the projecting netted foundation.

Borders in Point Russe Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 437.

THESE borders may be worked on leather or silk, with silk of the same or of a contrasting color. They are suitable for trimming sewing-weights, writing-cases, etc. The borders may also be worked on wash material with white cotton, and used for trimming infants' sacques, dresses, etc.

Cane Flower-pot Stand, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustration on page 437.

THIS stand consists of a frame of varnished black cane bars thirty-three inches and three-quarters high, which is ornamented, as shown by the illustration, with medallions, and with cords, worsted balls, and tassels of brown zephyr worsted in several shades. The medallions are worked on double brown carriage leather in raised embroidery (see Fig. 2 on this page, which shows the medallion in full size). The leaves of the flowers and the bud are made of the scales of a pine cone; the calyx of the flower is simulated by crochet chain stitch picots of silk in two shades of brown. The leaves are cut of double carriage leather, which has first been pasted together, in three shades of brown, button-hole stitched all along the outer edge, and furnished with veins in point Russe; for the middle vein sew on each leaf a piece of fine flower wire wound with silk; the ends of the wire project from the leaf, and at the same time form the stem. The vines and the remaining stems are worked partly in herring-bone stitch with saddler's silk in several shades of brown, and partly made of wire wound with silk. A varnished tin box, which is set in the frame, serves to hold the flower-pot.

Crochet Insertion for Lingerie, etc.

THIS insertion is worked with twisted cotton, No. 80.—First work one leaflet round separated by ch. (chain stitch) as follows: * 10 ch., 2 stc. (short treble crochet) on the 6th ch.; these stc. are not worked off separately, but together. Repeat from *. 2d round.—On one side of the leaflet round work always alternately 1 dc. (double crochet) on the last ch. before the leaflet, 7 ch. 3d round.—Always alternately 1 dc. on the next st. (stitch) of the preceding round, 1 ch., with this pass over 1 st. 4th round.—Always alternately 1 sc. (single crochet) on the next dc., 4 ch. Now repeat the 2d–4th rounds on the other side of the leaflet round, observing the illustration.

Fig. 1.—CARVED WOOD UMBRELLA STAND.

Carved Wood Umbrella Stand, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS stand of carved walnut is twenty-eight inches and seven-eighths high, and is furnished with a porcelain basin at the bottom. It is also ornamented with an embroidered medallion, which is worked on brown leather in satin and half-polka stitch and point Russe with brown silk in several shades, and with gold thread, as shown by the full-sized illustration, Fig. 2. Instead of gold thread, yellow silk may be used.

POINT LACE AND CROCHET EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Point Lace and Crochet Edging for Lingerie, etc.

THIS edging is worked with twisted crochet cotton, No. 100. First crochet on one side of the point lace braid 4 rounds as follows: 1st round. — Always alternately 1 sc. (single crochet) on the edge of the braid, 5 ch. (chain stitch), with these pass over one-eighth of an inch of the edge. 2d and 3d rounds. — Always alternately 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop of the preceding round, 4 ch. 4th round.—Always alternately 1 sc. on the next sc. of the preceding round, 4 ch. On the other side of the braid crochet one round of always alternately 1 double crochet, 2 ch., and with these pass over the requisite space on the outer edge of the braid.

Tapestry Border.

THIS border is suitable for trimming portières, furniture, etc.; it is worked on medium-sized canvas with worsted and silk in cross stitch embroidery. The description of symbols gives the colors to be used.

THE BLAZE ON THE HEART.

THEN good-by, Joe; you've gone, I'm told,
Away to the far-off West;
And the old folks say, and the deacon too,
They're sure it's all for the best;
For the curséd dram-shop spoiled you, Joe,
And I never could be your wife;
Yet I'm 'most afeared, in spite of myself,
I'll love you all my life.
Day and night,
Night and day,
Ever in sight,
Never away,
Joe, dear Joe!

I often think of the days of old,
When we tapped the maple-tree,
And you swore the sap warn't half as sweet
As the kiss you stole from me.
I think of the walks through the hemlock woods
To the meetin'-house with you;
But the stars, somehow, don't shine so bright,
And the sky don't seem so blue.
Day and night,
Night and day,
Ever in sight,
Never away,
Joe, dear Joe!

The blaze you made on the juniper-tree
Long years will wear away;
But the blaze you've left on my heart will last
Till age has turned me gray;
For I can't forget: when I shut my eyes,
You're sure to come to view,
Till I kinder wish for an endless sleep,
One last, long dream of you.
Day and night,
Night and day,
Ever in sight,
Never away,
Joe, dear Joe!

THE BARONESS TAUTPHOEUS.

MY first acquaintance with the Baroness Tautphoeus commenced when I was ten years old. It was conducted, it is true, at a distance of three thousand miles from my heroine, but was none the less interesting for that reason. It occurred in this wise:

"Once upon a time"—to commence in true story fashion—I was sent to spend the day in Brooklyn with my godmother. This dear lady, with the Madonna face and saint-like virtues, welcomed me kindly, but said, "You must amuse yourself, my child, for I have some visits to make to my poor people, and many of them are so ill that I dare not take you with me." As a consolation for her absence, which was to be protracted for several hours, she left me the key of her library. I watched her as she departed with pockets and reticule well laden with dainties to tempt an invalid appetite, and upon her lips, I doubt not, words of comfort and spiritual consolation; and stanch Protestant though she was, I could not but compare my dear godmother to the blessed Elizabeth of Hungary, who, like her, cared naught for riches or position, save as they could serve her in helping the poor and needy.

Left to my own resources for amusement, I turned to the dusty shelves of the locked-up library. The room was darkened, and the leaves of many volumes still uncut, for my godmother had little time to give from her works of mercy "for the selfish pleasure of reading." The books were, nevertheless, well selected, and among the shelves I found many a favorite author of mine. The hours passed on, and I was still alone. In search of "something new," I climbed upon a chair, and my eyes rested upon an attractive-looking volume, labeled The Initials. The quaint name struck my fancy, and taking it down, I was soon absorbed in the many perplexities consequent upon the note signed only by the initials "A. Z.," as described in the opening chapters. The return of my godmother from her mission of charity aroused me as I lay curled up like a comfortable kitten in a large easy-chair, and the advancing twilight warned me that I must go home.

"May I take this book home, dear Mamma Mary?" I eagerly inquired. "It is so very interesting, and I shall not close my eyes to-night unless I know how it ends."

Mrs. M—— took the volume from me, and glancing at the title-page, said,

"By the Baroness Tautphoeus. Yes, my dear, you may have it. I have not read the book, but I know there is nothing in her novels to which your mamma could possibly object."

Scarcely wishing the dear lady good-by with proper decorum, I hastened to seat myself in the cars, and read by the light of a flickering lamp, quite breathless with excitement. As I approached the close of my volume I thought, "This is coming to a very sudden conclusion," and wondered how the Baroness intended to dispose of all her characters and bring matters to a comfortable dénouement in the few remaining pages; but not till I had turned the last leaf, and my eyes rested upon the words, "End of Vol. I.," was the mystery explained. I did not "close my eyes that night," but cried with vexation till dawn. I chanced never to see the second volume until two years later; consequently I had time to speculate upon the destiny of the beautiful Hildegarde and her three lovers; but my admiration for the book stood the test of time and absence. Soon after finishing The Initials, I read Quits, with its beautiful descriptions of Tyrolean scenery, and nearly broke my heart over the woes of Cyrilla, my liking for the works of the gifted Baroness increasing with every volume.

A lapse of several years—the exact number I will discreetly withhold from the public—and I passed a winter in Munich.

One bright, cold January morning an acquaintance, a noted English lady artist, dropped in upon me as I sat at the piano. Shaking off some light snow-flakes, and laying down a little pile of "Tauchnitz" volumes, she said,

"You will think me very literary; but I am to call this afternoon with my daughter upon the Baroness Tautphoeus, and as Kate has never read any of her novels, I have brought them home from the library that she may look them over."

"Then you know the Baroness?" I inquired.

"Yes," was the reply. "She had heard of me as an artist, and as we are both English and in a foreign country, we were glad to waive any unnecessary formalities in making acquaintance."

A little talk apropos of my admiration for that lady followed, and we parted. Some days later my friend came to me quite triumphant. "I have a very pleasant surprise for you," she said, and displayed a kind note from the Baroness, inviting me to call upon her. Much astonished, although delighted, I inquired how the Baroness had ever heard of my little self, and what amiable idea had inspired her to send for me. "I had spoken to her of you," said my kind friend, "and shown her some of your articles upon music and art, and as she is interested in young writers, she said she would be pleased to know you."

As may be imagined, I readily accepted the invitation, and the following day found me on my way to the Ludwig Strasse. This street, built by old King Louis, is one of the widest and pleasantest in Munich, and contains several fine public buildings. The Baroness's residence is opposite the Royal Library—a very large, handsome house, of which she occupies the first floor. The staircase leading to her apartments was uncarpeted, and a large brass plate bearing the name of Tautphoeus designated the right door. A maid-servant took my card, and ushered me into a cheerful little reception-room, with a bright carpet, a jardinière full of pretty flowers, and a library well stocked with books in uniform binding. In another moment a side-door was thrown open, and I was shown into the drawing-room. It was a very large room, and was furnished in the style so fashionable in Paris—crimson damask with heavy curtains to match. A white porcelain stove occupied a corner of the room, and pictures innumerable hung upon the walls. The Baroness was seated at a little table with a very elegant writing service, and waited an instant to conclude a sentence before rising to receive me. She appeared about fifty years old; a slight figure of medium height, soft dark eyes, and dark hair slightly dashed with gray. Her dress was black cashmere trimmed with crape, and a little coiffure of crape with long streamers added to her dignified presence. After the preliminary salutations were ended, the Baroness requested me to sit upon the sofa beside her, and listened with a deprecatory smile as I told her what a great privilege I esteemed it to know the author of The Initials.

"I think," she said, "that my books and their author have been very much overpraised. I have received, for instance, much commendation for my descriptions of Bavarian and Alpine scenery. If I have written well of it, I deserve no especial credit, for I have spent so much time among the mountains that I know them by heart, and in my books have merely described what I saw."

I spoke of Cyrilla and the agonies of tears I had shed over its affecting tragedy, and was shocked when she said, "Unfortunately the chief incidents of that book are drawn from life."

"And do tell me, dear Baroness," I eagerly asked, "if that amusing incident apropos of the marriage customs of Germany in At Odds is indeed an actual occurrence."

The Baroness laughed. "Yes, I can authenticate it," she said, and repeated the incident to which I had alluded. A German gentleman of wealth and good position was drinking coffee with his family in the garden of a hotel, and his pretty daughter was meantime receiving glances of much interest and admiration from a young gentleman at a table near by. Paterfamilias went to pay his bill, and was followed by the young man, who, presenting his card, asked his permission to marry his daughter. Paterfamilias was a little surprised, but his would-be son-in-law gave him such unexceptionable proofs of good family and good circumstances that he promised to speak to his daughter. The only remark of the young lady upon hearing of the offer was, "Why not?" Consequently the betrothal took place the following day, and the marriage at an early date.

Changing the subject, I asked the Baroness if she was aware how generally she was thought to be German.

"Yes, I know it," was the reply. "That mistake arises from my German name."

Her father, I ascertained, was the celebrated Lord Erskine, formerly Lord High Chancellor of England, and she is a cousin of the well-known novelist Maria Edgeworth—"half Irish, but no Fenian," as she remarked. She has resided for the past thirty years in Bavaria, and has never visited Paris, as I learned to my surprise. She is married to a Bavarian nobleman—Kammerherr (Chamberlain) to the King. One of their sons is also in the royal household, as page to the King.

The Baroness's reminiscences of society in England and Bavaria were very interesting. "Munich, when I was a bride," she said, "was very different from Munich under Louis II. Then it was very gay, three court balls being often given of a night, by the Queen-Dowager, Queen Thérèse, wife of old King Louis, and the Duchess of Leuchtenberg, widow of Eugène Beauharnais, so that little time was left to attend private balls among the nobility."

Of the present sovereign she said, "The young King is by no means stupid, although superficial observers have so reported him. He is very shy, notwithstanding his twenty-five years, but when once interested in conversation, he is very bright, and shows a strong intellect."

I asked some questions concerning London, its laws of etiquette, etc.; among them whether young ladies could drive or walk with young gentlemen unchaperoned, as in America.

"Yes, my dear," was the Baroness's rather hesitating reply; "young girls can go out in London without a chaperon, provided their escorts are safe young gentlemen."

"What constitutes the safety?" I asked.

"They must be cousins," she said, "or else young men who are not at all interesting. However," the Baroness added, naïvely, "for my part, I always longed, when a young girl, to go out with young gentlemen who were a little dangerous!"

She then spoke of the difficulties that young authors experience in finding publishers for their works. "When I began to write," she said, "I was well acquainted with the fashionable world of London, but I did not know one publisher, and had no idea of the preliminary steps requisite in presenting a book to the public."

I asked if any biography or sketch of her life had been published.

"No," was the reply; "I would never permit it; I have no taste for that sort of notoriety. Neither have I ever sat for any style of a picture."

The Baroness appeared much pleased when I told her how much her books were admired in America, remarking, however, with child-like simplicity, "I can not imagine why."

I inquired why she had never visited our country, and if she did not think of doing so, assuring her that she would meet with a warm reception. She laughed.

"I am too old," she said, "and if I should go there now, I should only disappoint the public, as Fredrika Bremer did. They seem to imagine that a writer never grows old, and therefore, when she went to America, they were much surprised not to find the author of The Neighbors a fresh young girl, and it would be the same with me."

The Baroness appeared much interested in America and American institutions, and asked me many questions about this country. Going into the arena of politics, she discussed its future at some length, and to my surprise expressed a firm belief that our glorious republic would eventually become an empire. She then continued:

"It is well known that you want Canada, and you will probably have it one of these days. Never mind—you may have it. England has territory enough; we do not require it."

I might have answered that the United States had also quite an extensive territory, but out of respect for my elders I let that pass.

This first visit was made during the bombardment of Paris, and the Baroness's sympathies very naturally were with the Prussians, and very bitter, it seemed to me, against besieged Paris. She dwelt with some exultation over the enormous sums that Prussia would receive from France, and remarked that Paris would never again be what it had been; at least, she said, it would take a century for France to recover from her humiliation.

The Baroness is an aristocrat in her feelings, and highly conservative in her political opinions. She has little sympathy with the lower classes, and looks with disfavor upon popularizing literature. Her conversation with me upon this point is confirmed by the concluding paragraph of The Initials, which I will quote:

"The revolution which commenced in Germany in the year '48 is still in progress; to foretell how or when it will end would be difficult. This much is, however, certain, that Bavaria is not likely to be soon again (if ever) as tranquil and happy as when these pages were first written. Then the most intelligent peasant would have refused to leave his waltz, his pot of beer, or his joyous jodel for the sake of any newspaper that was ever printed, or even to hear a political discussion between the school-master and the parish priest! Great is the change which has taken place in this respect. Without any law to control the liberty of the press, newspapers of the worst tendency now circulate in all directions, and the peasant reads, thinks, and talks more of politics than of his crops, and naturally feels inclined to adopt opinions calculated to elevate him in his own estimation, and draw those down to his level whom he had formerly considered far above him. In order to appreciate the importance of this change, my countrymen must remember that in Germany the peasantry is the army."

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Mr. Ker and anonymous Literature.—Charming the Octopus.—The Coming of the Shah.

THE mystery of "The Khivan Correspondent" has been revealed since I wrote to you last, and the initials which I ventured in fear and trembling to send you have been found to be correct. Mr. David Ker, a Scotchman, is the culprit who has set all the English press at loggerheads, and threatened "the largest circulation in the world" with considerable diminution. It was a malicious trick to insinuate that the correspondent in question had not gone to Khiva at all, when the coincidence was so much more easily to be explained in the manner I indicated to you. Mr. Ker is an adventurous fellow enough, and, as I happened to know, had started on his expedition encouraged by the smiles of royalty itself. The Prince of Wales had sent for him before his departure, and expressed the greatest interest in the subject of his embassy. His error—and it was no venial one—was that he thought to sell his literary wares twice over; to use the "padding" of his Khivan articles in the Daily Telegraph to illustrate his Crimean experiences in All the Year Round, foolishly imagining that no one would think of comparing the two contributions. Long impunity, it seems, had made him audacious, for he had served his late employers the same trick before, but in that case there had been a longer interval between the duplicates, and he had escaped scot-free. "It is better to be good than to be clever," say all the copy-books, but Mr. Ker was not clever (except so far as graphic writing goes), or he would scarcely have risked, for the sake of a few extra pounds, the favor of that newspaper which, according to Mr. Sala, gives to its special correspondents "the respect due to gentlemen, accompanied with the income of an embassador." His occupation is now gone, and deservedly so, but his fate sets one thinking of what strange things are done in newspaper and magazine literature under the convenient cloak of the anonymous. It is impossible for the most lynx-eyed of editors to guard against every deception, or to be acquainted with all that has been printed, so as to make sure that he shall never print it again. A friend of mine, who conducts a monthly magazine, once accepted an agreeable article upon the literature of Cuba. The contributor was unknown to him, but upon hearing that his paper would appear, he called upon my friend to express his satisfaction. "I am going to Cuba myself," said he, "which is, in fact, my home, in a few days, and if it would not be an inconvenience, perhaps you would pay me the money in advance." The editor accordingly paid him fifteen sovereigns, and after a few months, when the article was published, had the pleasure of receiving the following note from "A constant Reader:"

"SIR,—I was under the impression that all articles in your magazine were original; the one called 'The Literature of Cuba,' in your last, however, is a literal transcript from Murray's Foreign and Colonial Library."

And so it was.

This, of course, was a downright robbery; but he has, he tells me, been pillaged more than once, not by a professional thief, as in this case, but by old contributors of his own, who, for the sake of obtaining ready money, have palmed off upon him MSS. that have already appeared elsewhere, although they can not but be aware that discovery must immediately follow publication, and cut off from them forever an assured source of income.

On the other hand, he has had many experiences which show that the shield of the anonymous has also a golden side. Personal friends of his own have contributed to his magazine without his knowing it—that is, under feigned names, so that their articles should stand on their own merits, and he should not be embarrassed by the claims of friendship. Again, after sending a check to a young lady who had long contributed to his journal, though personally unknown to him, it was returned to him by her father, with the information that his daughter was dead, and that up to that moment he was unaware that she wrote for publication at all. "We have always wondered," said he, "whence my poor girl received the very considerable sums she spent upon the poor." The genuine experiences of an editor would doubtless be as interesting a page of human life as any fiction he could lay before his readers.

Nevertheless, fiction has its special charms, nor do we at all believe, despite the proverb, that truth has a chance against it for strangeness. All London, for example, was electrified at breakfast-time this morning with the news that the Octopus in the Brighton Vivarium had vindicated its character from the aspersions cast upon it by the scientific, and had actually killed its man. Victor Hugo was right, it seemed, in the picture that he drew of it in the Toilers of the Sea, and had exactly described its powers—and its weaknesses. The story was that one Mr. Collette, an actor at the Brighton theatre, and who, when living in India, had been successful in charming snakes, had taken it into his head that he could charm the Octopus. Accordingly he had called upon the manager of the aquarium, and requested an interview with the monster in question, which was granted. The two gentlemen went to the tank in which the creature was accustomed to lie concealed all day, and Mr. Collette at once succeeded in enticing it from its rocky bower. It followed him as he moved round and round the tank, spreading out its feelers in what it doubtless considered an appreciative manner, and presently, as he bent over the edge, it struck half a dozen of them or so about his face and neck and dragged him under water. The charmer and the charmed exchanged rôles, in short; the captivator became captivated. To rescue Mr. Collette from this eight-armed siren took three men and a boy, and even then he was half drowned before they got him out. This excellent adventure lacks nothing but the vulgar substratum of fact. There is not space enough for a man's hand between the top of the tanks in the aquarium and the roof thereof; while the Brighton Octopus—having been unfortunately swallowed by a dogfish, always on the broad grin—has been dead these three weeks, and on view in a bottle of spirits. Nevertheless, I send you the story for what it is worth, which, to one of your sensation novelists, ought to be a good deal. Please arrange with him for the appropriation.

The Shah is coming nearer and nearer, and I am thinking of going out to meet him as his interpreter. Every body seems to be volunteering for the post who has read Lalla Rookh and the Arabian Nights, which I have at my fingers' ends, and, in addition, we have a Persian cat at home, which I understand perfectly. The Shah is said (though this is indignantly contradicted by the ladies, who believe him to be a single man and very eligible) to bring three wives with him and five millions of our money for traveling expenses. "Can any thing be more shocking than such a report?" observed a dowager, who has several marriageable daughters: "I mean as regards his wives." "Why, yes, my dear madam;" was the unexpected reply; "it would be very much more shocking if he brought five million wives and only three pounds to spend in the country."

However, whatever he brings, he will be very welcome. The Queen herself has consented to come out of her retirement and receive His Transparency in person. He can not speak a word of any civilized language, and makes a point of never being astonished at any thing. But we are going to show him the Channel fleet, and the Four-in-Hand Club, and the Underground Railway, and every thing we can think of. Perhaps you wouldn't mind my presenting him with a copy of the Bazar that contains this record of our friendly feeling. They say he is given to transports of passion, during which he kills people. Suppose he was to kill any body here. What should we do to him? Think of his being tried by a "mixed" jury—six British and six Persians—before Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, eh? By Jove! you know it might happen. Then wouldn't there be a row if he was let off because he was a Shah! Can't you fancy the placards: "If the Shah is spared, Müller was murdered!" It would be quite true (here is another example of what I wrote above), and yet much more strange than fiction. And if he was sentenced to be hung, how could he receive "the consolations of religion?" We should have to send to Pershore—which is a village in Worcestershire—for the clergyman. But pshaw! let us hope it won't happen.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

THE LUNCH-TABLE.

SOUPS AND SAUCES.

HOUSEKEEPERS, students of all sorts, and growing children need something at the mid-day meal, to restore their strength, in the lightest form possible, so as to be quickly converted into nourishment without interfering with the occupations of the day. Meats and vegetables are too heavy to be disposed of without appropriating the nervous force of the system for an hour or two afterward, but soup is absorbed and distributed in refreshment to the body in about twenty minutes. No wonder Ninon de l'Enclos declared that her soup intoxicated her. To a nervous system of great susceptibility, as one of her type must be, the exhilaration of potent soup, the essence of nourriture, would be sudden and marked enough to produce feelings like those given by wine, even without taking into consideration the pint of Burgundy and the generous spices which lend their stimulus to the rich soups of the French cook. Americans will never cease being dyspeptic till they learn the value and requisites of good soup. A people who proverbially drive their brains and activities to the fullest limit, as ours do, must learn that such work can not be done on pastry and overdone cutlets. The strongest, finest nourishment must be taken, such as comes in broad rare slices of juicy Western beef and fragrant golden-brown chops, in vegetables so deftly and quickly cooked as to catch their "bouquet" in immersion, and finally in soups of flavor and spirit that combine the excellences of all these. At our tables too frequently soup is a mere expletive to eke out patience while the servants are slicing the roast, or an appetizer, or a sacrifice to good style, which ordains that it must be eaten, if only a spoonful, before touching food in solid form. As little as one chooses may be taken at dinner, but at lunch every person not absolutely idle ought to fortify nature with one plateful of excellent soup, sipped slowly, not swallowed in rushing haste as if it were to be out of sight as soon as might be. To get the benefit of any food, it must be taken deliberately, and to this end one must urge a petition for more flavor. Curious and delightful dishes will be tasted more slowly, to prolong the pleasure derived from them, while ordinary or half-seasoned food will be dispatched without ceremony. Add to this the established fact that the better food tastes the more nourishment it will give, and the argument for full and varied seasonings will meet no rejoinder. Now the popular taste, strange to say, rejects variety in these matters, except in cities where it is educated by the productions of foreign cooks. It is hard to have the nicest soups, tinctured with celery, bay leaf, and clove, meet with doubtful questioning when set on a country table. "What's this? Celery in soup? and clove? Better put in raisins and sugar, and make a sangaree. Give me salt and a good ball of dumpling, and I'll ask for none of your fashionable messes." But that dumpling ball is responsible for more heart-burn and bad dreams than ever rose from the delicate spiced soups of Christendom.

The store-rooms of housekeepers are meagre enough in their furnishing of meat flavors. Salt and dripping seem to be the two essentials in most people's minds for soups and gravies, or, as the French call them, sauces. Add to these sage and onions for dressing poultry, cloves for à la mode beef, and oysters for turkey sauce, and the housekeeper is complacent over a poverty of resource which would make a tutored cook despair. The list of flavors is always open to addition, but it should have sage, marjoram. thyme, basil, parsley, celery, chives, tarragon, martinos, sorrel, coffee, nasturtium, bay leaf, garlic, summer-savory, curry-powder, red, black, and white pepper, besides all vegetables of decided taste. These will give the housewife so wide a range that she need hardly present the same dish thrice between January and January come again. Nor must she rashly use these with novice hand, thinking her end is gained if variety is attained, for she may as well try to play Chopin's Nocturnes with school-girl finger as essay the harmonies of taste without intelligent preparation. For encouragement, be it recorded that these harmonies are not mysteries, nor is cooking a matter of sovereign instinct, but of cultivation. The limitation of genius and instinct compared to common-sense appears like the modern interpretation of Calvinism: all may be successful in this world or the world to come if they try hard enough, while the elect of genius must be so. To return to the soup-kettle. Every household paper has given directions for making soup, intended to exhaust the subject, and it is not necessary to repeat them. A few points need impression. Delicate cleanliness of the kettle used for making soup is as important as it is in dairy-ware. The kettle should be washed with scalding water and supercarbonate of soda, both outside and in, whenever fresh stock is made, to prevent any taint of grease. It is nice to make stock in a covered tin pail set in boiling water, but nicest to put the meat into a stone jar, rinsed with hot soda water first, and set it closely covered in an oven for half a day to cook. In no other way is the juice of meat so perfectly expressed. No flavor should be added to the stock till it has cooled and the fat been taken off. Many people fancy that the richness of a soup is measured by its oiliness and thickness—an absurd mistake. Good soup is neither more nor less than beef-tea flavored to taste, and thickened or not according to fancy.

Clear soup is esteemed by cultivated diners, and the art of making it is to add flavors without color or thickness. A bouquet garni, made up of a stalk each of parsley, marjoram, thyme, and a bay leaf tied together to throw in the liquor when it boils, three cloves, a sliver of mace, two coats of an onion, first left in boiling water till it cooled, to draw out the rankness, and a few pepper-corns, which are preferable to ground pepper for soups, will give a lively flavor to the broth, and have the peculiar excellence that no one seasoning can be discerned above the others. In fact, one does not recognize single flavors in a fine dish; they should be blended into one, which may be rich, pungent, or piquant, according to choice.

A delightful addition to soups is the extract of celery, made by putting a five-cent paper of celery seed to steep in a pint of deodorized alcohol. A tea-spoonful of this will give soup or salad a fine celery flavor, and it should be kept in the caster with other sauces. Celery seed in vinegar is also good. A little thickening may be given clear soup by mixing a table-spoonful of corn starch or sea-moss farina with cold water, and stirring in the boiling soup just before taking up. Strain through a linen cloth laid in a colander. A change is made by breaking eggs into the soup just before taking off, and serving poached. This is very strengthening diet.

Tomato soup is usually an excuse for offering canned tomatoes in the most careless manner. Chunks of tomato floating in weak liquor is not a soup. The vegetable should be boiled in the stock in a porcelain kettle at least three hours, and the whole pressed through a strainer, which removes the seeds and fibres, leaving a smooth thickened soup, which should first be flavored with three leaves of marjoram, a spoonful of sugar, and red pepper. An odd foreign style is to season the tomato with salad dressing and the yolks of hard eggs beaten to a cream, stirred in after the soup is taken off the fire.

Jullien soup is invariably misunderstood by ordinary cooks. Its object is not to present a vegetable stew, but a broth in which the vegetables have lost consistency and are almost pulpy. The best way to prepare them is to grind all in a sausage cutter to a coarse meal, and boil a long time with spices tied in muslin. When a perfect success, the starch of the vegetables will have thickened the soup.

Fish soup is made from the water in which fresh cod, halibut, or salmon has been boiled. It must be used the same day it is boiled; after taking the fish out, stir in mealy mashed potatoes till the soup looks creamy; then add half a cupful of cream, Cayenne, salt, and slices of lemon; or stew with nasturtium petals, and put the pods in the soup.

Giblet soup requires the meat chopped as fine as meal after boiling. This is added to the liquor in which chickens were cooked, flavored with a dust of nutmeg and slices of lemon. This is the only soup with which rice is essential.

Mutton soup is the best way to improve coarse bits of meat, which should be left in the oven in a close jar, with all manner of sweet herbs and garden flavors. When wanted, simmer half an hour, with three ounces of sago for each two quarts of stock. Add a glass of wine if desired.

The sauce for green pease, beans, and all leguminous vegetables is nearly all that makes them so piquant from the hands of a French cook. The invariable formula for this, as given by a well-known professor of the art, was a spoonful of butter and one of flour worked together, and browned in a saucepan, with half a small onion, two cloves, a bay leaf, and three leaves of thyme, on which was poured a cupful of mutton or beef gravy, or stock. The vegetables were selected much younger and tenderer than is common with us, washed before shelling, but not after, boiled till tender with just water enough to cover them, and the sauce added a moment before they were done, for a last simmer.

A novel sauce for poultry or delicate veal is made by frying steak and sour sliced apples in the same pan successively, with plenty of butter or clear dripping. Season with pepper plentifully, and add a glass of Madeira, thickening a very little with corn starch.

A purée of turnip tops, sorrel, spinach, beet tops, or cowslips is made by boiling these greens well, rubbing them through a sieve, and thickening them according to the formula given above, dispensing with sweet spices, and adding the juice of a lemon and yolks of two eggs. Slices of fried bread may be served in dice with the purée.

Soup of chestnuts or pea-nuts is made like that of dried pease. The hulls of the nuts come off in boiling water, after which they must be soaked all night, and boiled for hours, till they are tender, and strained through a colander. Very little salt is needed; a spoonful of white sugar and a glass of native port will improve the chestnuts, and slices of fried apple are served with them. The pea-nuts need the juice of a lime, Cayenne, walnut sauce, and a little curry-powder if one fancies it. To be followed by browned breast of veal or fried chicken.

To make liver catsup, salt a good beef's liver, turn and rub it daily for ten days. Cut into small bits, and boil in a gallon of water, closely covered, down to three quarts. Strain and stand to settle till next day. Add a quarter of a pound of black pepper, allspice and ginger, and boil down to three pints. Bottle when cold, and keep it well corked.

LISETTE.

THERE'S many a maiden sweet and fair,
  There's many a lass of high degree,
But for them all no whit I care
  So there's my own Lisette for me:
Come, sweet Lisette, and thou shalt be
  A pearl within my fond heart set;
My heart as gold shall prison thee,
  My own Lisette.

And in the winter of the years,
  With thee to cherish and caress,
After Life's storms and woes and tears,
  My love shall grow to perfectness.
My own, my pearl, in my heart's gold
  Forever, love, shalt thou be set:
Our love is love that grows not old,
  My own Lisette.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE shad has always been considered as one of the most delicate and delicious of American fish; and "Connecticut River shad" are regarded with peculiar favor by epicures. The Merrimac and Hudson River fish are popular enough; but dwellers on the banks of the Connecticut aver that the genuine article is found only in the waters of that beautiful river. A Springfield paper gives a detailed account of shad fishing as carried on in that vicinity, from which we cull some items which may be of interest even to those of our readers who have no personal liking for the piscatorial art beyond the mere fact that they enjoy its results. The common method of taking shad is with seine nets, which by law must have at least a five-inch mesh, to protect the young shad. Each net is bordered on each side by a rope, the one which is to drag on the river bottom being loaded with lead, and the other set with floats of cork. When dragged through the water, this arrangement causes the net to assume a perpendicular position. By the method of operations pursued, the net is dropped into the water from a boat upon which it is coiled, and rapidly sweeps a portion of the river. The noise and splashing attending this process frighten the shad; they dash desperately to the bottom of the river, but find presently all chance of escape cut off. Very rapidly the net is drawn in, and the fish are speedily brought upon the bank. It has been supposed until recently that shad could only be taken in some kind of a net; but now fishing for shad with a "fly hook" is not an uncommon practice. The story circulated in Massachusetts is that in the spring of 1871 a Scotchman residing at Holyoke, who had for many years studied the habits of fishes, became convinced that shad could be taken by hook with proper bait. He discovered that in June and July shad feed extensively on a species of miller found near the surface of the water. He prepared a hook so as to represent a miller, and succeeded in taking shad with it. Some months afterward his secret became known. Some special skill is needful on the part of the fisherman; but if he is not too impatient in drawing in his line, he can easily secure his prize.

We read that there are in Chicago's new hotel, the Grand Pacific, fifty-nine flights of stairs, thirty-eight miles of wire, 999 windows, and 1070 doors.

Lake George received its name from Sir William Johnson, who wrote from the borders of the lake in September, 1755, saying: "I am building a fort at this lake, where no house was ever before built, nor a rod of land cleared, which the French call Lake St. Sacrament, but I have given it the name of Lake George; not only in honor to his Majesty, but to assert his undoubted dominion here." This lovely sheet of water was also called Andatorocte—the place where the lake contracts—by the once-powerful Adirondacks; and by the Mohawks, Caniaderoit, signifying the tail of the lake—that is, of Lake Champlain.

We question whether the quality of trout captured in the river Thames will equal that of those taken in the clear brooks and lakes of this country; but some very good sized ones have been found there. The largest trout ever known to have been taken in the Thames was captured some fifteen years ago at Shepperton, and weighed sixteen pounds; one was taken at Marlow about six years ago which weighed fifteen pounds; while the two largest taken last season weighed together twenty-three pounds.

Here is a pleasant portrait of a widow, drawn by herself in the advertising columns of an English paper:

"'O woman! in our hours of ease,
  Uncertain, coy, and hard to please;
  When pain or sickness rends the brow,
  A ministering angel thou.'

"A YOUNG WIDOW, highly connected, dark hair and eyes, considered pretty, good figure, clever, and amusing, possessing a small income, desires to marry. She does not deny that she might at times realize the first two lines of the stanza quoted above, but she can assure any gentleman willing to make the experiment that she is as certain to be true to the conclusion."

Newport became a favorite rallying point for the denomination of Friends very early in the history of our country. Rhode Island was always a refuge for the sect when they were persecuted in all other parts of New England. Every year Newport is crowded in the month of June with Friends, who resort thither to attend their yearly meeting. Hotels and boarding-houses are full, and even private houses are opened for their entertainment. Hitherto their sessions have been kept strictly private, but this year, for the first time, they allowed published reports. The Friends' meeting-house in Newport was erected in 1700, and is now the largest belonging to that denomination in the United States. The costume of the Friends approaches every year more nearly to the ordinary style of dress. Elegant attires are seen, and rich silks and satins in all the lovely shades of drab, brown, and steel are common among the wealthy.

Delaware Gap has a new attraction. At the foot of Kittatinny Mountain a cave has been discovered from which pours a continuous stream, not of water, but of cold air, so strong as to keep the foliage of trees in motion at a distance of thirty yards. No satisfactory explanation for this mysterious phenomenon has been given. The cave has been explored to the distance of sixty feet; but the sensation experienced from this current of air is an unpleasant numbness, which will not render it specially popular.

One of the latest inventions whereby mankind is to be benefited is a process lately patented for making artificial butter, said to be equal, if not superior, to the genuine article. Butter has become one of the necessaries of life to a majority of people; and to obtain good butter in the city is perhaps the most difficult task the housekeeper has to perform in providing for the table. Whether any amount of chemical treatment will change tallow into an agreeable substitute for "Orange County butter," or that made from any first-class dairy, remains to be seen. We understand the article will soon be for sale in our markets, and at a reasonable cost, so that every one may have the opportunity of trying it. It will be remembered that during the late war between France and Germany a substitute for butter became quite popular in the French markets.

The exhibition of quicksilver at Vienna is interesting and curious. One hundred and fifty hundred-weight of this metal is shown in a huge iron caldron, and upon it rests a solid cannon-ball. This ball, although it weighs fifty pounds, rests like a feather on the silvery mass. This pure quicksilver is from the celebrated mines of Idria. It is packed in bags of white sheep leather especially prepared for the purpose, and then put into small wooden barrels carefully fastened up.

An exchange enjoins all lovers of flowers to remember that one blossom allowed to "go to seed" injures the plant more than a dozen new buds. "Cut your flowers, then, all of them, before they begin to fade. Adorn your rooms with them, put them on your tables, send bouquets to your friends who have no flowers, or exchange favors with those who have. You will surely find that the more you will cut off, the more you will have."

There has been trouble among the Persian ladies who traveled as far as Moscow with the Shah and his household. The proper accommodation of these ladies, who journeyed under the title of servants, was a matter of some difficulty. At Moscow they were placed in a country-house in the vicinity, but not liking the isolation, complained that they were not suitably lodged. The Shah then directed that they should come to the palace where he was. It appears, however, that the ladies were not yet satisfied. They expected that they would be allowed in some measure to follow European fashions. The favorite wife of his Majesty desired to accompany him to the theatre, but the Shah would not permit it. In fact, finding that he was likely to have trouble, he determined to send them home, and despite their tears and protestations they were placed en route for Persia a few hours before their lord and master left Moscow.

Captain Jack is considered the best-looking man in the Modoc tribe, and not naturally of an especially warlike disposition. He can speak the English language, though he seldom does in the presence of the whites. Hooker Jim and Schonshin John derive their first names from settlers in the neighborhood bearing those names for whom they have worked. Black Jim is darker in complexion than others of the tribe. Curly-headed Doctor is more "kinky" in the hair than the rest of his companions, hence his name. The Shack Nasty boys, of whom there are three or four, are the sons of an old woman in the tribe known by that title.

Since last April over three hundred unhappy Italian children have been brought to our shores. Unhappy, we say, for disgraceful facts indicate not only that these children are kidnaped in Italy, and brought here by inhuman speculators, but that they are actually bought and sold at auction in our very midst. These miserable creatures, bound to merciless masters, are forced to wander through lonely streets and crowded thoroughfares, late at night, in cold and hot and inclement weather, to collect small coin in return for their discordant music on harp or violin, which is to swell the gains of those who send them forth. This matter has been brought to public notice recently by special inhumanities practiced upon some of these poor children, and it is hoped that immediate measures will be taken to prevent this traffic in child life.

A new kind of ink that can be put into trunks and pockets without danger of spilling is a valuable thing. White blotting-paper is saturated with aniline black, and several sheets are pasted so as to form a thin pad. When wanted for use, a small piece is torn off and covered with a little water. The black liquid which dissolves out is a good writing-ink. A square inch of the paper will give a considerable quantity of ink. This novelty will recommend itself to travelers.

An exchange tersely says that "eleven thousand people die annually in New York without a permit from Providence." Our readers are enjoined to live wisely and temperately, and with due regard to all sanitary laws, during the coming season, that they be not included in the above eleven thousand.

Camel's-hair Mantelet, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS mantelet is made of camel's-hair lined with lustring; the trimming consists of black gros grain folds, gathered black lace, passementerie buttons and cord bands, and bows of black gros grain ribbon. On the wrong side, in the back of the mantelet, at the bottom of the waist, set a belt, which is closed in front. The mantelet is slashed at the sides, with the trimming extending around the slashes, which are connected by loops.

Gros Grain Mantelet, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS mantelet is made of black gros grain, and is lined with lustring. The trimming consists of black guipure insertion, gathered black guipure lace, and passementerie agrafes. The insertion is underlaid with black gros grain ribbon. A fold of the material, edged with lace, passes from one shoulder diagonally across the back and under the other arm, simulating a scarf. Hooks and eyes serve for closing the mantelet.

PARIS GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THOSE DREADFUL AMERICANS.

IN spite of panics and crises and pacific revolutions that many persist in regarding as but the preludes of the inevitable sanguinary one, Paris still holds its own as the centre of fashion and the city of pleasure, and Americans flock to it in hundreds every week as in the gay and prosperous days of its recent splendor. Well, since they are not afraid of the threatened Red Ruin, and since, so far, at any rate, their boldness in running the risk of being caught in a Commune has been justified, far be it from me to play the part of pessimist, and warn them away. Let them come, and see, and conquer, as of yore. Let them drive poor natives from the first floors and the best shops, and in many cases from the city altogether, by their reckless extravagance and their overpowering toilettes. The French either can hold their own against the invaders or they can not, or they don't care enough about the stakes to try. It is no concern of ours. Here, at least, the principle of neutrality among nations is allowable, and we adopt it. As the aim and chief object of so many families who come to Paris from the other side of the Atlantic is the education of their children, I think a few words about schools may be welcome to them. I have already touched often on the subject, but merely in a passing way. I should like to-day to have a little chat about schools exclusively, if you don't mind it. Those who feel no interest in so dry a topic can turn aside and amuse themselves with more entertaining matter on the next page. First and foremost, do you want a boarding-school or a day school, a secular "institution" or a convent? I have in a previous letter spoken of the cours, or classes we should call them, which young girls who do not like to leave their families altogether can frequent with ease and advantage. They are admirably organized, and very economical. I don't know how far the heavy taxations since the war and the immense increase in the expense of life in every way may have acted on the cours, but the terms for an entire season used to be two hundred francs (forty dollars). For this small sum you had a full and graduated course of lessons or lectures in every branch of study — history, geography, grammar, rhetoric, etc., from a professor who has qualified himself for the task by making each branch his special study. The objection to foreigners in those classes is that in order to follow them with adequate advantage you require to know the language, not perfectly, of course, but fluently, and to be able to write it without any hesitation, though it may be with innumerable faults. The mere necessity for thus exereising herself in French is, of course, the best and most efficacious lesson a learner could have. Then it requires the pupil to put forth all her energies in the race, because though the lesson is in itself so full and explanatory, it leaves the pupil a vast deal to do in the way of working it out at home; and an idle girl who does not follow it up when she gets home by help of the notes taken down at the time, and with the various books they refer to, will do very little with this system. It has been found by French people to answer so well, that it has in a great measure superseded both first-rate governesses and second-rate schools. A governess is, however, almost a necessity for young girls who attend the cours; but she need not be a very accomplished one: the thorough teaching of the professor, whose instruction she only supplements, obviates the need for that perfect mastery of the subjects which she would otherwise require. A daily governess, at a salary of from one hundred and fifty to two hundred francs a month, will be quite up to the mark for a girl who is advanced enough to attend the cours.

There are, in the same way, excellent singing, music, and drawing classes, very inexpensive for the most part, and where the teaching is of the very best. I make it a rule, as you know, never to mention names, or indicate one establishment as better or worse than another. These things strangers had best find out for themselves. But classes are such a very important point, and so much depends on your finding the right ones, and without loss of time, that I am tempted for once to break through the above rule, and give you the address of a music class, which among many good ones occupies just now a very high place. It is that of Mademoiselle Laya, who resides at No. 20 Rue Roquépine, near the Boulevard Malesherbes, a central situation, much frequented by Americans. Private lessons, of course, are expensive here, as from every other good professor. It is a grievous mistake, and one into which strangers, Americans and English especially, are very apt to fall, to suppose that masters are cheap in Paris. For a first-rate music or singing lesson you must be prepared to pay from fifteen to twenty francs an hour (three to four dollars); for a really good one, not less than from eight to ten francs. You will see in Galignani, and pasted on the walls of the boulevards, tempting announcements of "lessons from a pupil of the Conservatoire," or of some fashionable artist, "for a franc." This is sheer absurdity; and if you are beguiled into making the experiment, one lesson will suffice to show you the folly of it. A new system which has for the last few years been tried with immense success in the case of singing is that of beginning a regular course, and taking a lesson every day, and never singing except with the master or mistress. It is an expensive process, certainly, but perhaps not more so in the end than the old one of taking a couple of lessons a week off and on for several years, as is the way with most amateur learners. One year of steady adherence to the new method will do more than ten years of the old one. A very brilliant American amateur artist, who delighted the salons of Paris by her beautiful voice of late, came to Paris some seven years ago without ever having had a singing lesson in her life. She had a few fine notes in her voice, but within the limit of one octave, and with this untried and diminutive organ she betook herself to one of the best masters in the city, who had been very successful with an unmarried friend of hers. He agreed to make her sing at the end of a year if she obeyed him faithfully in taking a lesson daily, and never singing by herself until he gave permission. She agreed to this, and the result was a triumphant vindication of the system. I do not name her, because any one who knows any thing of society in Paris of late years will recognize her identity at once. It is, however, absolutely essential that the pupil, before embarking on the enterprise, should be fully determined to abide by the condition of not trying her voice out of lesson time until the master authorizes her to do so. I know another instance in which the attempt, so successful in the above-named case, proved a complete and even a disastrous failure. A young girl who had the making of a very fine voice was placed for training in the hands of a good master; after the first three months of rigid discipline the prohibition was relaxed, and he gave leave for half an hour's practice alone. The pleasure of feeling her instrument growing so elastic and clear, and of exercising her own power over it, proved too great a temptation. The half hour expanded to an hour, and imperceptibly to two. One day while careering with infinite gusto up and down the scales, she was seized with a sudden sensation of choking, or as if something had snapped in her throat. She cleared it, and tried to begin again; but not a note, not even a sound, could she articulate. The voice was utterly and entirely gone. The doctor was sent for, but he could do nothing. She had strained the organ, and it would take some years of rest and medical care to restore it, even to get back the power of speech. I believe a winter in Egypt eventually repaired the mischief. This has drawn me away from the schools for to-day, but the subject will keep till my next letter. COMET.

ÉCRU BATISTE WALKING SUIT.

Écru Batiste Walking Suit.

THE dress of this suit is made of striped écru batiste, and is trimmed with gathered ruffles of the material and with brown gros grain folds; the white cashmere paletot is trimmed with a braiding of black silk cord. White English straw hat, trimmed with a box-pleated ruche of gros grain ribbon and with ostrich feathers.

Figured Foulard House Dress.

THIS dress is made of gray and white figured foulard. The skirt, the back breadths of which are arranged in a puff, is of plain foulard. The trimming consists of gathered ruffles of figured foulard, which are embroidered with white cotton as shown by the illustration. The over-skirt and basque-waist are of figured foulard, trimmed with embroidered ruffles. Sash of plain foulard.

Dotted Linen Cambric House Dress.

THIS dress is made of dotted linen cambric, and consists of a double skirt and waist with basque. The under-skirt is of plain linen cambric, and trimmed with flounces of the material. These flounces are bordered on the under edge with gathered linen cambric ruffles, which are embroidered with red worsted dots in satin stitch, and with puffs of plain material. The seam of the upper flounce is covered by a ruffle and a puff. The over-skirt and waist are of figured linen cambric, and are trimmed to match the skirt.

THE SHAH OF PERSIA.

THOUGH it is queer to call Nasr-ed-din the "successor of Darius," yet the people over whom he reigns more directly represent the people of Darius than any of the great European nations represent those who dwelled on the same soil in the days of Darius. The Gaul and the Iberian have really lived on through all conquests, but they have lost the outward badge of their old national being by adopting the Roman language. The Persian has had masters of divers nations, and he has adopted an Arabian religion, but the Persian language has lived on through it all. If any one chooses to infer that all this comes of the inborn superiority of an Aryan people struggling against Semitic and Touranian intruders, we shall not argue against him. Anyhow the fact is certain that the Persian nationality and the Persian speech have lived on through successive conquests, that conquerors and immigrants have been largely assimilated to the native stock, that Persia has twice, after long periods of subjection, risen again in the strength of a revived nationality, and that both times the revived nationality has taken the form of the preaching of a national religion. The dynasties of both of the Sassanids and the Sophis can not, without some straining of language, be called successors of Darius; but both may be fairly said to have revived the monarchy of Darius.

People are apt to forget the wide distinction between the Persians and most other Mohammedan nations. This confusion reached its height in the wild belief that the present Persian King is the spiritual head of Mohammedans generally. It is hard to find a parallel in the West to so strange a delusion. Perhaps the nearest thing to it would be if any Persian were to tell his countrymen that the German Emperor was the common spiritual head of all Christian sects. Now, setting aside smaller and earlier Mohammedan powers, of the three Mohammedan powers which have cut any great figure in the world for the last four hundred years, the Ottomans, the Persians, and the Indian Moguls, the Persians stand alone as being really a Mohammedan nation. The other two, the Ottomans and the Moguls, were essentially foreign conquerors, ruling over subject nations of other religions in their own land. So to be was not an accident, but the essential feature of their position. The Ottomans have always been, not a nation, but a ruling caste; a ruling caste which, in the days of its strength, was replenished by the human tribute of all the subject nations. Even in those parts of the Ottoman Empire where the population is mainly Mohammedan, the Ottomans are still a ruling caste over the earlier Mohammedan inhabitants, including, of course, the earlier Turkish settlements before the Ottoman dynasty arose. So in India the Moguls were, in the like sort, a ruling caste over a people mainly Hindoo, but with a sprinkling of heretical Mohammedans and people of other creeds. Thus the Moguls then, and the Ottomans still, represent not only Mohammedanism, but Mohammedan ascendency. The very essence of their being is the supremacy of Mohammedan conquerors over subject nations, Christian or heathen. The Persians are nothing of the kind: they are strictly a Mohammedan nation. At the same time they are, as it were, Mohammedans by accident, and their Mohammedanism is a form of Mohammedanism of their own making. If we draw out a comparison between the history of Christendom and the history of Islam, the Arabian caliphate, the original Mohammedan power, answers to the Roman empire, politically, though not theologically, the original Christian power. The various Turkish tribes—and the Indian Moguls were really as much Turkish as any thing else—adopted Mohammedanism as they came within the influence of the caliphate, just as the Teutonic and Sclavonic nations adopted Christianity when they came within the influence of the empire. And to them no doubt their conversion to Islam was a lift in the order of things. They were raised from mere barbarism to that moral and social stage which the higher form of Mohammedanism represents. With the Persians nothing of the kind happened. The Turks freely accepted Mohammedanism in the course of migrations which brought them within the reach of a religion and a civilization which were, at any rate, higher than their own. To the Persians, on the other hand, Islam came as something forced upon them by foreign conquerors. Mohammedanism, in its first purity, might be a better theological system than the religion of Zoroaster as it stood in the days of the last Sassanids. But the Persian, with his magnificent empire and his ancient civilization, could not feel toward conquerors from the Arabian desert as the Teutons and Sclaves felt toward the Roman empire and religion, or as the Turks felt toward the caliphate in a somewhat later stage. In fact, Persia to a great extent led captive her Arabian conquerors, and turned the caliphate of Bagdad into something very different from what it had been when Abou Bekr and Omar ruled half the world from the steps of the mosque at Mecca. The Persians became Mohammedans because they could not well help it, and they revenged themselves in the end by giving their Mohammedanism a national character of their own. But in so doing they became more strictly a Mohammedan nation than any other, as the whole people, with the most trifling exceptions, gradually came to accept the religion which was at first forced upon them by the sword.

Whatever, then, the Shah of Persia may be in any other way, he is at least not the alien ruler of subject Christian nations. He has not trampled a Christian people under foot. He is the head of a Mohammedan nation—a nation at once the most purely and the least truly Mohammedan of any of the great Mohammedan powers of modern times. And, without guaranteeing the pure Aryan descent of this particular king, we may say that he is at least the head of the one great Mohammedan nation which still preserves signs of primeval kindred with the great nations of Europe. As such he is a reasonable object of interest in our eyes. And if it adds to his interest in any body's eyes to call him the "successor of Darius," we will not greatly quarrel with the description, though it is rather like challenging special regard for the Ottoman Sultan on the ground of his being the successor of Philip of Macedon.

AILEEN'S LOVER.

ON that part of the New Jersey coast which is most barren and desolate there is built a melancholy straggling line of little houses. This is the fishing village of Bender's Tow. The houses never knew paint nor whitewash, or, if ever, they have long since forgotten it, and have assumed, as if by common consent, a sad gray color, which tones harmoniously with the neutral shade of the sand and with the sea fog that surrounds them.

Like all people who depend on sea chances for a livelihood, the inhabitants of the settlement are for the most part lazy and careless. The men sometimes lie for days in the warm sand—smoking, drinking, quarreling—watching for a show of fish. They are all good friends again so soon as the fish appear and inspire them with a common interest; and when the need is pressing they work fiercely with the boats and nets. The women are strong-limbed and tall, but with the anxious, worn look on their faces that makes the poor class of women in America lose their beauty and youth long before they are old.

"It's willin' agin my man that's made me like a scrag," I heard one of these wives say down on the beach at Bender's Tow. "He's good and convenable enough when he's out o' liquor; but get him drunk, and it takes an awful sight o' willin' to manage him straight. He won't fish nor nothing, and the childer starving, maybe. Many's the time I've left my baby in the sand, and gone out in the surf along of the men, tugging at the seine for a share of the fish to stop the young uns' crying, and him a-lyin' drunk on the shore laffin at me. Them's the times you don't think gentle to a man, nor hadn't orter."

Four or five miles in from the ocean the land rises into low wooded hills. Still further away, on the other side of the hills, is the town of Bendersville, which seems to have been dwarfed in its early youth, for it has never grown within the memory of the oldest inhabitant. Here the sea people find a market for some of their fish, and here they come to do their trading, to buy their whisky and flour.

On the hill-side stands a ruinous little shanty, in which a benevolent old maid had tried to keep school for the little "fish children." Instead of the children, whom she could have managed, there came great hulking boys, and girls as rough as they, who frightened the old maid away after a six months' trial. Among these overgrown scholars were Sandy Coe and Aileen Craig. By the final day of Miss Nancy's effort at instruction Aileen had learned to read slowly and with determination, and even to write her name, while Sandy was stumbling blindly about over little words; and as these were the last school-days that ever dawned for Bender's Tow, his education was always limited.

"You ain't gotten no more sense nor a crab, Sandy Coe, that can't read yer lesson, and goes back in yer book, too." Aileen used to laugh at her tall companion as they walked home through the rank grass and sand after school. Aileen was always laughing at him. She was a little person, with great dark eyes, and hair that hung about in heavy waves, till she thought herself grown up, and took to tying it in a tumble-down knot at the back of her head. She had neither mother nor father since she could remember, and her aunt, "Widder Wilder," had always given her a home, and brought her up. She used to run wild on the beach, in her short cotton gown, with her feet bare, sometimes helping the men to knot their nets, for her brown fingers were very nimble, and she was quick and funny as a child, and could make the old fishers laugh by her little songs and pertness.

As she grew older, and had learned to read, she became more demure and quiet, and no longer went near the half-tipsy fishermen, or offered to help them, as the other girls did, till they began to say at Bender's Tow that she was proud, and thought herself altogether too good-looking. She had, indeed, grown very pretty, and knew it well enough, for there were some among the young fellows who told her so plainly. There was one of her admirers, however, who never put this in words, and he was called Sandy Coe—he who studied crab-fashion in the days when they went to school. He had always been her knight-errant, in an uncouth way; and now that she had become this haughty damsel, his kind eyes somehow watched over her and followed her movements, and no one would have dared to speak rudely to Aileen while Sandy was about. Without a spoken word from this silent guardian, Aileen knew that he thought more of her than of any other girl in the village; and she knew, too, that he had "more brains than all the other fisher-boys put together." So she used to think when she watched them getting the boats off through the surf in the mornings.

She stood up on the shore sometimes and smiled to see how his will and forethought seemed to seize the moment for the gang to pay out their strength and pull all together at the rocking boat. In her lifetime Aileen had seen hundreds of boats go out, but none had moved so steadily or gracefully as his; and then, as the long white dory, with its pile of nets in the bow, slipped out on the retreating wave, she liked to watch his tall, gaunt figure spring into the boat at the last moment, as he seized an oar. Perhaps she saw, too, that the rower's blue eyes glanced toward the spot where she was standing. And the sun sparkled on the waves, and Sandy Coe rowed away to the fishing grounds, while pretty Aileen stood on the bank and gazed after him.

He was growing rich. His luck with the nets never failed him, and he was speculating, too, in fish by means of a little smack in which he had taken an interest, and which was sailing away and trading with more busy settlements than Bender's Tow; and when, one day, Sandy went over to the "ville" for his potatoes and his father's whisky, and found a hundred dollars, the proceeds of his trading venture, paid into the bank to his credit, he felt himself wealthy for his part of the country. So, suddenly, he determined to put his fate to the test: he would ask Aileen to be his wife. When Sandy had so far decided bravely, his courage failed, and turning into one of the brilliant grocery and dry-goods establishments of the town, and blushing, he procured a kerchief of crimson silk, fine and soft and splendid. It was for Aileen; he felt the need of a propitiatory gift. As he walked back over the hill, and his old home came in sight, he began to understand how poor and mean was the life at Bender's Tow, and to lament that he had only this to offer Aileen. He did not think that she had never known any thing better or different. To him his love seemed so far above him, so beautiful! Even this ignorant fisherman bowed down in reverence before the woman he had chosen.

As he came into the settlement, far off on the sand a little figure was walking slowly, all alone. Sandy left his sack of potatoes at his door, and followed her with haste. He drew near, and walked softly for a moment, looking at her. She was playing with the waves as they rolled up the beach, running after them, and wetting her bare feet in the white foam.

The little sandpipers and snipe scarcely heeded her as they too followed the retreating waves, leaving the marks of their sharp little claws in the wet sand. Aileen laughed aloud as one long-legged bird, more courageous or more careless than the others, was caught by the surf, and struggled and fluttered squeaking to dry land. She laughed, and the birds sped away in a trice, and began picking at a safe distance.

Sandy spoke her name now. "Aileen, can I come along?"

She turned round, startled, and nodded to him. "Come; I don't care." The blush that had risen to her cheeks staid there, making her prettier than ever. "Them birds is the skeerest lot. Did you see 'em go when I laffed?"

"Ef I was a bird, Aileen, I wouldn't go," said he, making an effort at a compliment, and then he hurried on: "I had a bit of news to tell you; I was over to Bendersville, and I found that I— And I brought you this." He handed her the silk kerchief.

She looked up in his face, and put her hands behind her.

"Is that the news?" she said; "and whatenever did yer bring me that for?"

She did not offer to take his present, but stood flushed and a little defiant before him. He seemed hurt.

"I brought this because you are so pretty, and I ain't never see yer in a bright-looking thing like that; and the news was that I found there was money paid over for me into the bank, and—oh, Aileen, will you marry me?"

She turned away with a short, nervous laugh.

"Did yer think that red rag was a-goin' to git yer answer, Sandy Coe, and yer money? I ain't knowed riches well enough to forget how to live poor. I don't doubt but there's plenty would like yer riches." She walked on ahead of him, and they were both silent. If she had looked at him she would have seen her lover's eyes were full of tears.

Suddenly she spoke again, in a sharp, spiteful way:

"Why don't ye go? Ye got yer answer, ain't ye?"

"I suppose I'd orter think so; but, Aileen, I love you like nothing in this world, and I always did, and I always shall; and to have you speak up like that has kind o' skeered me, like them birds, I guess—only I ain't run away," he added. "I ain't troubled you in a good while, my dear—for why?—that I didn't see no way in the world that you could care for an ugly, hulking lubber like me. But to-day, when I found maybe I could take as good care of yer as the next one, I just dared to tell yer so. I'd orter knowed 'twa'n't no use. But it don't make no odds, and I won't bother you agin. Only nobody else can have what I offered you to-night."

He took the unappreciated kerchief and rolled it into a hard knot, and pitched it as far as he could into the water.

"And good-night, Miss Aileen." He said it quite humbly, and turned on his heel toward the village. The sun was setting behind the hills, and the sky was all aflame, tinging the ocean with reflected light. But on the pink wave crests there bobbed up and down the little red ball that he had thrown. He could not look at it, but kept his eyes on the sand as he moved slowly away.

"Mr. Coe, ain't you afeard of yourself, to have such a temper?"

As he looked up the little figure that he loved so well had stopped a few feet higher up the bank, and showed dark against the scarlet torches in the sky. Her arms were folded across her breast, her eyes were dazzling bright, and she looked straight at her disheartened suitor.

He stood transfixed by her glance; then wrung his hands together like a man in deep sorrow, and would have hurried on, but Aileen sprang down before him and stood still. She spoke in a soft, high voice:

"Sandy, do you think I could love any man only you?"

He could not speak. In an instant her arms were about his neck, and she had kissed him. He was as pale as death, as he gently clasped her.

"Take care, my lass," he said. "I think that I'm a-dyin'."

The tears were running down his cheeks, while in his heart, though he did not speak it, there arose a thanksgiving to Heaven.

The waves came rolling in with the swash of the rising tide, and brought with the foam a red silk kerchief. Aileen ran down the beach and rescued it, dripping, from the water, and held it up.

"Thank you, Sandy," she said, and they both laughed. They were very happy and quiet as they walked slowly back in the evening.

Out of the sea appeared the soft round moon, like a pink cloud. Their hearts were awed by the peace and poetry of the hour, and they spoke with whispering voices.

"Mother used to sing a song when she was livin'—a Scotch song—and some of it went like this," said Sandy. "I ain't goin' to venture the tune," he added, smiling, as Aileen looked up with a twinkle in her eyes, for Sandy was never known to catch an air. "It was a soft, pretty kind of a song, and I always get thinking of you when it comes into my head. Mother had a good singing voice, and she always kept her own way of talkin' like a Scotchwoman. Sometimes I get at it too.

'And oh, my luve,
And my ainly, ainly luve,
That prayed for me at sea!'

I don't rightly remember only that; but when I've been caught out in a gale I've thought of you, and wondered would you ever pray for me. And you was always 'my ainly luve,' Aileen, my ainly."

He left her at Widder Wilder's door, and went down the street toward his own hut. He walked proudly, his face shining with the new happiness that had come to him.

As he pushed open the house door his father lay drunk across the threshold. It was a sight Sandy was used to see; but he felt as if some one had struck him a blow as he lifted the drowsy man on to his pallet in the sleeping-room.

He sat late that night in the moonlight, thinking. After all, what had he to give Aileen besides his love? Such a home as this, with that tipsy old man, would be a sorry place to bring her to. Finally his resolution was fixed. He would take the money that was his at the bank and build a new house for his bride.

When Sandy thought his father was sober enough to understand it he broke the news to him.

"Father, you know Aileen Craig, don't you? Well, she's give me her promise."

"That gal?"

"I guess she's good enough for me, ain't she?"

"No good won't come o' that, Sandy Coe. She's a pretty-faced gal, but she's kinder fancy, and I don't guess she'll do much work for ye. You'd better 'a took a good strong one while you was about it. I don't set much by them pretty-faced women."

"Well, I've got strength enough to keep us both, I guess. I wasn't thinkin' o' that. See here, father, this old place is about played; and I've made up my mind to fix up a house for us hereabouts not fur off, but a new house."

The old man was thunderstruck by this. He jumped up suddenly: "A new house! Ain't this fine enough for her? I told you there wouldn't no good come of it. She's a stuck-up gal. What yer goin' to do of me?" he cried, suddenly; "but yer needn't trouble yerselves. I kin shift for myself, only yer better git out o' this quick as comes handy for ye. I want my place to myself. Do you hear? Blarst ye!"

Sandy had certainly not expected sympathy or congratulation from his parent. On the whole, perhaps, old Coe's reception of his son's intention might be considered favorable. No more was said, and he stumbled out of the hut to join his tipsy old companions and to tell them the news.

When it became known at the Tow that Aileen was promised, opinions on the subject were freely expressed.

"Sandy Coe won't never get that piece for his wife. He ain't nigh fine enough for her. You just wait. She'll throw him over the first chance she gets that's better than him. And remember I said it."

At the other end of the street Sarah Jones was saying to Mrs. Schenck:

"Well, she's hooked about the best-goin' feller to the Tow. He's got the kindest heart I ever see. Why, when Jones was down with the rheumatiz that bad he couldn't turn over, an' me with a felon, he just come in an' done for him like a mother. I ain't never forgot the way Sandy Coe done for Jones, nor won't neither. She'll have to be pretty good to be up to him, I tell you."

Among the younger women Aileen had made few friends and many enemies. She was never social in her ways, but had always held herself aloof from the girls of her own age; and she had cultivated an ugly temper and sharp tongue, that made her feared among them; so their remarks were far from complimentary.

Every one seemed to agree that Sandy had got a pretty girl, but that either he would have a hard time with her or she would be false to him.

As time went on old Coe grew more tipsy, and stopped speaking to the ungrateful son who was about to leave him. Though he ate Sandy's bread, and drank his whisky too, he was always grumbling at the way in which he was treated.

Sandy had nearly completed his new house, and it seemed to aggravate his neighbors, who were suddenly filled with an admiration for their old gray boards, and regarded his fresh pine frame as an interloper. They all sniffed at Aileen's pride, and said the old house was good enough for her.

Sandy was growing impatient for the wedding by this time, and toward the end of September Aileen was induced to promise her lover that in another month she would think about it.

"Well, well," cried the gossips of Bender's Tow, "we never thought it would come to this. Aileen Craig has named the day, and they are to be j'ined in October. We'll see."

Aileen knew all that was said of her marriage, and it was almost more than she could bear. It seemed, now that she had an acknowledged protector in the person of her faithful Sandy, all those whom she had ever hurt by her proud ways, all those who felt any spite against her, expressed it in these malicious doubts of her faith. She never told Sandy how much she suffered from her neighbors' unkind speeches, and he, good-natured and contented, was blissfully ignorant of the storm of anger and hatred that was rising in his sweetheart's breast.

Old Coe went away, and for several days nobody knew what had become of him, till at last, when people were beginning to wonder, he one day came into the village with a rather curious procession. He was shambling along, pushing before him a rickety hand-cart half filled with household goods. On top of these sat a little boy of about three years old, rosy-faced, and smiling. Beside old Coe a woman was walking; a poor, sickly, slatternly looking woman, with some attempt at brightness in her costume, exhibiting itself in a pair of cheap red bonnet strings on her very rusty black bonnet. She held another child by the hand. Tipsy Coe was smoking a pipe, and from time to time regaling himself from a black bottle which he kept conveniently nigh him on the cart, and which he at rare intervals offered to his companion.

As this little caravan passed on toward its destination the fishers' wives came open-mouthed to their doors, the fishermen looked up from the nets they were spreading to dry, and the propeller of the cart was greeted by rough voices from the shore.

"Hillo, old Coe, what you ben a-doin' of?"

He stopped in his shuffling walk and allowed the cart to rest on its handles, while he, in a maudlin voice, addressed the little crowd that formed round him.

"My frens, I ben a-gettin' marrid. Ve'y fine ole woman. Ben over to the Ma'sh, an' Mish Jenkins didn't object none, and I named the day, an' tuk her ter Bensville, and Sandy's got new mar. Thish Mish Coe, gelmen. Howdo, all."

A roar of laughter, in which the little fellow on the cart joined, greeted this speech. "Mish Coe, gelmen," made a sort of courtesy in acknowledgment of their pleasant reception, and her new lord and master, with a "Git 'long, ole gal," proceeded toward the Coe mansion.

Poor Sandy learned only too soon what had happened. It scarcely needed his father's rambling explanation to tell him that the wretched creature had traveled to the great "Ma'sh," twelve miles away, to bring Mrs. Jenkins, a shiftless, unhappy woman, as his "new mar."

"I wa'n't goin' to have no black-eyed gals 'roun', 'thout ole woman for m'self," said the affectionate creature, clasping his bottle tightly. "Yer kin git marrid soon's yer choosh, my shon," added he, with great dignity.

Sandy went out into the fresh air and walked away from the door. The rosy-cheeked boy who had ridden in such state on the cart ran up to him and thumped his knee to make him attend.

"What's the matter, little chap?" he asked. The chap held up two brown fists filled with pebbles.

"I dot damned sight 'ittle white 'tones. 'Ittle chap yourself. I's hungry, too."

He made this statement, looking up at the great tall man, as if it was his right to demand from a creature so much stronger than himself. Sandy laughed, and picked the boy up.

"Yer didn't orter say them ugly words, sonny," he said, alluding to the profane swearing about the white stones. "Some day yer won't have no tongue left if yer talk like that."

"Dere my tongue, you devil," said the child, with great determination, at the same time putting out his little red tongue for an instant, and bursting into a laugh of derision.

"What's yer name, little chap?" asked Sandy, to turn the conversation.

"Name Tommy; what's your'n?"

"I ain't got much of a name, Tommy, but it's Sandy Coe. Kin yer speak it?"

"Coe," cried Tommy, with triumph, and "Coe" it remained for him as long as their acquaintance lasted.

Mrs. Jones had said that Sandy was possessed of the kindest heart "she ever see, when he done for Jones like a mother." She herself had since then "done for Jones," but in another way—rather as a step-mother, perhaps; still she could appreciate the kind heart when it ministered to the rheumatic Jones, and had spoken truly of Sandy. It was partly his kind heart, and partly Aileen's bad temper, but there came at last the cruel breach between these two lovers which had been predicted by their friends.

As the weather grew colder old Coe took more persistently to drink, and became daily more helpless and senile. Mrs. Coe "brought the shakes along of her from the Ma'sh," and was as helpless and weak as her husband. Sandy saw plainly that to leave this thriftless, wretched household to its own resources was to leave them to starvation.

As he thought more about this, he understood how his own selfishness had driven the tipsy old man to seek Mrs. Jenkins at the Ma'sh for a companion in his loneliness.

"I was a-goin' to forsake that poor old man and leave him alone, that hadn't the sense to take care of hisself," mused this sentimental fisher. "It wasn't right, the way I done, and what was wrong then is worse now, when there's more'n him to starve ef I leave 'em."

He was filled with remorse, and though his love for Aileen grew stronger with every hour of his life, suddenly he determined that the only right thing to do was to give up the joy of bringing her home as his wife, at least till the hard winter was past, and still to maintain his father and the family he had established.

"It won't be much longer to wait. It ain't so bad as that feller the minister over to Bendersville was tellin' on, that served for his girl fourteen year. I'll feel like I was serving for my Ainly, only it 'll be my father, not her'n, I'm bound to."

He strolled toward Widder Wilder's, still turning it over in his mind, and he whistled, all out of tune, as he went, "My love is but a lassie yet." It somehow kept up his spirits until he should see Aileen, and get some words of encouragement from her.

"Ainly, come along with me a piece down the beach; I want to talk to you," he begged, as he found his sweetheart sewing on her door-step. She stuck her needle in the work, left it lying on the stone, and followed him, bare-headed, down the street.

Sandy kept on whistling, and took no notice of his companion until they had passed the Jones cottage, and were out upon the wild sea-shore, with the sea rumbling beside them as they walked; then he suddenly put his arm about her shoulder, and began speaking in a rather obscure fashion.

"I don't feel like I'd done right, and somehow I guess I have to pay for it, and pretty heavy too. It 'll trouble you some, I'm afeard, and yet I can't help hopin' that it will; but it's goin' to come hardest to me, and it orter, for I suppose I brought it on myself. You see, I was clean gone over with the notion that my Ainly cared any thing about me, and I didn't think of nothin' but that. I ain't much better now; only I see, afore it's too late, that I ain't done right—"

"Sandy, what are you drivin' at, talkin' that queer kinder way?" Aileen interrupted him, with a perfectly perplexed voice. He looked round at her quickly.

"They'll starve, sure, ef I do what I said. We can't get married, my dear. We can't be j'ined this time. Ef ever we come together again, that's for you to say the word, and— God A'mighty help me," he added, under his breath, as he saw her face grow dark.

The little figure twisted away from his arm.

"I don't rightly know what yer talkin' about."

She heard the words, "We can't be married," and suddenly there yawned at her feet the very pit which it had been predicted should be the consequence of her falseness. Suddenly she was to be forced into the dishonest action with which she had been a thousand times twitted. All the latent anger that had been gathering in her heart for the idle gossips of the village seemed at once to be directed toward her lover.

She had never seen Sandy like this before: his face so set and hard, so little tenderness in his voice. If she had been quieter, she might have understood how the man's soul was laboring to do what he thought right—how great the sacrifice he was making. She tried still to speak calmly.

"Say them words again: maybe I don't know what they mean."

Sandy's voice was sullen and dogged as he answered her. He had a lurking fear lest, after all, Aileen should turn him from the course he had chosen.

"I say, I darsn't marry you now, any way. Ef we was to get married now, we'd get paid up for it some time. Don't you see how my old fool of a father will go and starve, along of them he's brought home, ef I desert him now? Don't ye see I ain't got no right to live in happiness with my wife, Ainly, and them others a-dyin' because I left 'em? We got to stop where we are; but, oh! you speak a kind word to help me along, for it's the hardest stroke I ever pulled, and my heart's most broken, Aileen."

"If your heart's broke, Sandy, it 'll take more than me to mend it. Go away. I ain't got no words to help you. Ef you was scorched up with the wrong yer done me, I wouldn't raise my hand to give you a drop of water. Ef you was to go blind this minute and walk into the sea, I wouldn't raise my hand to help yer out. There ain't nothing in my heart but hate, and that's all for you, Sandy Coe! Go! Don't never speak to me again, nor look to me for pity nor kindness, for there's none left. Go! go! go!"

As she spoke she lifted her clasped hands above her head. The words came clear and slowly spoken, with a steady, low voice till the last; then they rose into a sort of cry.

"Ainly," he said, softly, "yer don't mean that; ye'll sorrow over what yer a-sayin' some time, Ainly."

She cried out to him, "I ain't no more!—that name yer said. You shall never call that again to me."

He raised his eyes that were wont to be so kind and blue: they were now almost without expression, and the color seemed to have left them. Aileen's were black, luminous, terrible.

She gave a gasp, partly a sob, partly a laugh, as she met his glance. She turned and ran swiftly over the wet shingle, leaving Sandy broken-hearted on the shore.

He stood as if fastened to the spot. His figure had become like an old man's. At length, as Aileen's form disappeared among the houses of the village, Sandy Coe gently folded his arms upon his faithful breast, and walked down to his boat. Tommy was already installed there on one of the seats. He had collected a pile of pebbles and shells beside him, and was busy pelting an old barrel that was floating on the water. He knew it was against the law to take stones into Sandy's boat, and jumped out fast enough as he spied him coming; but when he saw his friend's face his fear turned to curiosity and awe at the expression of solemn trouble there.

"Did yer hurted yerself wif yer big knife, Coe?" he cried, full of sympathy. "I didn't be welly bad; I only put 'ittle 'tones, Coe, and throwed 'em all away again."

"I don't care about 'em, sonny. No, I ain't hurt. Run home, Tommy." But before the child had moved to obey, Sandy snatched him in his great arms, and held him close a moment. "There! run along, quick."

While the daylight lasted he was busy getting the nets ready; and when the night came down, cloudy and damp, Sandy covered himself with an old sea coat, and lay down to rest till the early morning.

Four others were to go with him in his boat, and Jakey Coffin had promised to be ready with his dory to lend a hand at the other end of Sandy's seine. The fog had not lifted when the fishermen came on the beach in the gray dawn.

"Ef it don't clear, there'll be some ugly weather, boys," said Jakey Coffin.

"What, Sandy! you here a'ready? Yer must 'a laid out all night. Yer look kinder famished. What's the matter of ye? Had any breakfast?"

It was Mrs. Coffin who spoke. She had come down with a pail of coffee for her husband to take along, and her quick eyes saw that all was not right with the young man. Sandy winced before her inquiring glance, and told probably the only story he was ever guilty of.

"Thank ye kindly, Miss Coffin; I had my breakfast afore I come out, and I'm all right, I guess."

He moved about more lively after this, trying to protect himself from the woman's sharp looks, trying to hide his heavy heart and his sorrow.

The boats pitched and trembled, then glided softly out over the waves—the two boats, with eight men in all for their crews. Out to sea they floated, and disappeared in the mist.

Mrs. Coffin stood a moment on the sand and looked up, trying to see some pink promise of a bright morning. The air seemed gray and cold on every side. She shivered and hastened back to her cabin.

Later in the day the wind rose, and the clouds changed from mere fog to black lowering masses. Mrs. Coffin saw Aileen pass her door, and called out to her that it was "nasty weather a-comin' up, and they'd orter 'a had more sense than go sech-lookin' times as this."

"Who's gone fishin'?" asked Aileen, innocently. As she spoke she turned a pale face with hollow eyes toward her neighbor. Mrs. Coffin started.

"Why, your Sandy and my Jake. Didn't ye know?"

The color rose into Aileen's face as she gave a queer little laugh. "He ain't nothing to me ever again," she cried. "Now go and tell how Aileen Craig has broke with Sandy Coe; how false she is. Ha, ha!"

Mrs. Coffin had got a piece of news. She remembered Sandy's worn face that morning, and now Aileen's quick words explained it all to her mind. She was a woman who could rejoice in a sympathetic way over the sorrows of her neighbors, when they accorded with her predictions, or were the natural fruits of her neglected advice.

"Well, well! ye don't say so! It's a sad thing all round. I thought the poor boy didn't look just right this morning. So ye turned him off, after all, did yer, Aileen? I always did say you two uns wouldn't hitch, somehow. Maybe Sandy warn't good enough for ye, though I did think there was no better goin' than him, and Coffin, too, always said it of Sandy. He was awful pale, come to think of it, and you don't look very pert neither. Not that I ain't goin' to say nothin' about it to nobody, for I don't suppose ye want it talked about all over the place. Sech thing gets round fast enough of 'emselves without talkin'."

Still the storm came on, till by evening there blew a fierce gale, and the rain fell in torrents. The sea was lead-color and capped with whitest foam. It gurgled and advanced and rolled back, hissing, while the breakers boomed steadily over the bar.

The boats had not come in. Indeed, a landing could hardly have been effected through those waves, and the only safety for the fishermen was in keeping their boats far away from the breakers.

Those in the village whose relations had gone with Sandy Coe wore sad faces, and collected in groups upon the shore. Aileen flitted like an uneasy ghost from one party to another, listening silently to their half-spoken surmises, asking no questions, and vanishing so soon as she was noticed.

At last the village was still for the night. All the lights had been put out save one, where a girl's face peered into the darkness through the little window-pane. Aileen could not rest. Her affrighted thought followed Sandy, from that terrible moment on the sand when she had so cruelly denied him, out over the stormy water, till she found him, tempest-tossed and full of sorrow, far away in the night.

She tried to forget the words she had spoken—they made her dizzy. She tried only to remember what he had said long ago, "My ainly luve, that prayed for me at sea;" how he had wondered if she would ever pray for him. As she thought the gracious tears rained from her hot eyes, and swift sped up to Heaven a little prayer that Sandy might be saved.

As the morning dawned the wind blew more soft and kind; the sea had lost much of its fierceness. Aileen put out her little light, and noiselessly left the house, turning her steps toward the beach. On the ocean no boat could be seen; but as she looked a tender pink filled all the horizon, and the sky seemed to grow soft and luminous, expectant of the coming sun.

Aileen sat down on the bank above the line of broken shells and sea-weed that marked the tide. Her hands played idly with the sand beside her. She was still a long time, thinking, regretting, wishing, till she felt half crazed with the strength of her helpless desire, and she sprang up suddenly and stretched her arms out toward the sunrise, crying aloud, pitifully, "Sandy, come back to me! Oh, my dear Sandy, come back!"

Her shrill voice flew away with the air, and she heard only the lap of the water as the foam crawled up the sand. A white gull rose and circled and swooped down close to the billows, and rested there.

Her restless eyes scanned the expanse, and suddenly, far over the water, rising and disappearing, shining, dancing, bounding homeward, came two white boats!

Aileen fell on her knees, trembling and joyful; but even as her lips formed words of thankfulness, her eyes became riveted on something that the waves held in their grasp—that they now brought near the shore, now clasped again and carried out of sight. As she, breathless, watched for this again, the waters seemed to part before her piercing eyes, and show her the face of her lover.

Upon the beach, far away from the reach of the storm, there lay an unused fishing-boat. The old rope that had so often helped to tie it secure was coiled up in the bow. Without a thought Aileen had seized this rope, and, holding tightly with one hand, she forced her way through the incoming breaker as far as she could stand. Light as she was, and used to the surf, it needed all her presence of mind to keep above the shock of the wave as it rolled in, all her strength to hold the rope as the water retreated.

Twice she had reached the floating form, and twice the waves had claimed their prey again. The third time she struggled to the land, and brought Sandy home. He lay there on the wet sand, peaceful and serene, while the little girl who had broken his fond heart, but who had loved him all the time, knelt by his side in anguish.

"O God!" she whispered, "let Sandy know I loved him! Let Sandy forgive my wicked words." Then, with tears, she bent above him and kissed his quiet face, moaning her love and the undying sorrow in her heart.

The sun shone bright after the storm, and the village of Bender's Tow woke up. The little houses opened, and the fishermen came out to wonder at the splendor of the morning. They found Aileen still kneeling by him. Gently chafing his cold hands, and whispering to him.

The boats came in, with only one less in their crews. When the storm began it was necessary that one other man should be in Jakey Coffin's boat, to help collect the heavy seine. Sandy offered to go. The transit from one boat to the other was safely effected, the net was partly in, when some wave, more sudden or higher than before, lurched the boat, and Sandy Coe was caught and dragged overboard with the net, and lost in the storm.

After Aileen had grown quiet over her sorrow, one evening Elihu Brown came and spoke to her. He was a young married man, and had been on the sea with Sandy the night he was drowned.

"Miss Aileen," he said, "there's something I wanted to tell you, just, and nobody else. You know me and Sandy, bless him! was company in the boat together (my dear, I ain't a-sayin' this for to make you cry); and it seemed like he didn't feel just right, and some of the fellers was joking him; but I didn't say nothin', for I know there's a many things can trouble a man and him not want to speak; and toward night he'd been sittin' quiet near me for a spell, and presently he touched me, and there was tears in his eyes, and says he, 'When we get ashore, Brown, I want you to tell Aileen Craig that nothin' can't take the love out of my heart for her. Yes,' says he, speaking to himself, like, 'I believe ef I was dead this minute it wouldn't make no difference.' I was most afeard for him to go over to Jakey's boat after the solemn way he spoke; but when he got safe over I didn't think so much about it. Then all to onst somebody give a call, 'Where's Sandy Coe!' and sure enough, where was he? and he never screeched nor nothin', but just went over with the net, and we never seen him again for the darkness and the storm! I thought maybe them words he spoke might be a comfort to you, Miss Aileen. Poor girl! you've sorrow enough."

"Thank you," she said, gently, and patted him with her hand. Then he left her weeping silently.

If you ever go to Bender's Tow and see Aileen Craig as I saw her, the memory of her sad look will never leave you; you will learn then how remorse may crush, and how a longing and a hope may exalt the human face. She is very gentle and helpful to all around her, and believes firmly that she will meet Sandy again. Her dearest possessions are a gold ring and a silken kerchief stained with sea-water.

The people have forgotten that these two hearts were ever separated by angry words, and still speak tenderly and with reverence of "Aileen's Lover."

"HIS NOSE OUT OF JOINT."

See illustration on page 445.

WHAT of the little new-comer, my boy,
Who has put your small nose out of joint so completely?
And how do you like it, my poor little man,
To find yourself "shipped" all so surely and neatly?
Oh, what of the snug place on dear mamma's knee,
Where you've listened to stories so fine by the hour?
And what of the days when you reigned a small king,
And ruled o'er the household with terrible power?

Do not be wrathy, but stifle your sighs,
As the senior of two little mites of humanity.
Where is your pride? Think no more of your nose,
But view all the points of the case with urbanity.
From bundles of flannel and troublesome robes
You've made your escape, and have lived through the process,
While this little disjointer of your royal nose
The woes of an infant must suffer in doses.

Just think how complete your revenge is to be!
There's—well, let me see—paregoric and gruel
And peppermint tea, and—the nurse only knows
How many more things that are equally cruel!
He has got to endure the same number of pins
With which you were scratched when you were "the new-comer."
Oh, you'll have your revenge all complete, never fear!
And your nose will be healed with the coming of summer.

THE CIRCUS IN OUR VILLAGE.

See illustration on page 444.

THE circus season is upon us, and our country readers will appreciate the pictures we place before them. The first tableau represents the big elephant which is the unfailing accompaniment of all menageries, and the chief attraction in the eyes of the youngsters, ranking even above the monkeys, the clown, and the man who puts his head into the lion's mouth. The elephant's charm is his excessive affability. He suffers himself to be patted and poked in the side, and extracts apples and oranges from the pockets of the boys with a truly Turveydrop condescension, which almost overwhelms the Lilliputians thus favored. He therefore always makes a triumphal entry into the town, escorted by all the boys and girls who are fortunate enough to be able to swell his train. In the second tableau the circus is a thing of the past, and the urchins are trying to recall its lost glories by gymnastic feats of their own in emulation of its acrobats, while their playfellows look on with wonder and applause.

A REMEDY FOR DAMP WALLS.

IT is said that a solution of two-thirds of a pound of Castile-soap to a gallon of water laid on a damp wall as a wash, and next day followed by another wash of alum water—two ounces dissolved in a gallon—will cure the inconvenience, and prevent any further recurrence of it. It is so simple a thing that housekeepers troubled with damp places in their dwellings will be glad to try it for themselves.

NOW AND THEN.

COME sit beside me, dearest—
For cold the night winds blow—
While by the pine-wood's cheerful blaze
I sing of long ago.
'T was in the merry spring-tide,
The lark sang in the sky,
Two children played,
A boy and maid,
Light-hearted—you and I.

And many years rolled o'er us,
Bright springs with sun and show'rs,
And summers with their wealth of bloom
And plenitude of flow'rs.
'Twas eve in golden autumn,
The blackbird whistled nigh,
A man and maid
Sat in the shade,
Two lovers—you and I.

And now 'tis winter dreary;
The snow lies on the ground;
The sky is dark, and raves the wind
Our forest home around;
But light is in our dwelling,
And sweet the hours go by,
The happy life
Of man and wife,
Two lovers—you and I.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

DOT AND SIS.—Make your striped cambric dress with a double-breasted loose front polonaise like that illustrated in Bazar No. 23, Vol. VI. Put two rows of large pearl buttons down the front.

MOTHER.—We do not propose to give further patterns of dolls' clothes at present.

B. F. B.—Sheer batiste polonaises are not lined. Lower skirts are made of the batiste, and trimmed with gathered or else pleated flounces.

LIZZIE B.—Read "Colored Grenadines" in Bazar No. 26, Vol. VI. The piqué would look well, made as you suggest.

LILLIE.—If you have no conversational powers, and don't know what to do with yourself in company, we can only advise you to preserve a discreet silence, by virtue of which you may gain the reputation of exceeding wisdom.—You will probably find the recipes you want in the "Ugly Girl" papers.

W. M. R.—The Emperor Napoleon I. was in Spain in 1808, when he encountered the British troops under Sir John Moore after the fall of Madrid.

J. D. B. E.—The kind of articles in demand for different periodicals varies too much to be described in a brief paragraph. You will find it difficult to obtain such a position as you aspire to without influence or experience, and you can only gain the latter by writing upon the topics with which you are familiar, and sending your articles to the journals for which they seem best suited. If you have capabilities for journalism, the fact will soon develop itself; if not, we advise you to adopt some other calling. Write on whatever paper you please, but don't roll your MS.

BRINVILLIERS.—Fredegonda was a Frankish queen, the wife of Chilperic I. and the rival of the celebrated Brunhilda. By a series of intrigues and assassinations she rose from the humble condition of a waiting-maid to that of Queen of Neustria. Her long life was a romance of cruelty and crime. Olympia Mancini was the favorite niece of Cardinal Mazarin. Griselda is a legendary personage whose story is designed to inculcate the passive obedience of the wife to the husband. Mænads was a name applied to the Bacchantes in allusion to their frenzied movements. The basilisk was a fabulous animal whose gaze was supposed to have the power of enchantment. We have not room to reply to your other questions, which, moreover, you will find in ordinary books of reference.

MRS. M. L. H.—Narrow one stitch twice in succession in each of the rounds referred to (16th, 18th, and 20th), thus six stitches altogether; the work should be turned and bound off.

COLONIES.—We can give you no definite information about the proposed Dominican colony. You had better address the officers of the Samana Bay Company, who are well known to the public.

ETTIE.—We have never heard of the book you name.

K. L. A.—The selection you mention is probably a fugitive piece, which has never been republished in this country. We can find no trace of it.

CALIFORNIA.—Middlemarch will be sent you by Harper & Brothers on receipt of $3 50, cloth, or $1 50, paper.

TONI.—We don't know any thing about the legend.

M. F. K——Y.—Grass-eating animals are called graminivorous. Consult some natural history for your list of vertebrate animals, for which we have not room.

CONSTANT READER.—Consult a numismatist. We can not dispose of coins, nor have we any means of estimating their value.

A. B. P.—There is an English translation of the Nibelungen Lied extant.

HORTENSE DE T.—You can hardly be in earnest in requesting us to see the proprietor of a theatre and make arrangements with him for engaging a girl of sixteen off-hand. As this is no part of our business, we must respectfully decline the honor you propose us. It may be well to state in this connection, for the benefit of sundry correspondents, that we have no facilities for procuring employment for any one, and that such applications will be in vain.

MARAH.—The French marriage laws are very peculiar, and none but a lawyer could safely decide the question you put.

CINDERELLA.—You should of course invite a gentleman to call on you after you have partaken of his hospitality, and equally of course he should announce his presence when he calls for you to drive with him.

ROBERT J. D.—We have never seen any works on the art of decorating shop-windows; such, however, may exist in the French language.

ANXIETY.—You should rise on being introduced to your friend's visitor, and also on bidding her adieu; you should not, however, outstay a caller who comes after you. You should always rise when a visitor takes his leave of you, whether the gentleman of the house is present or not.—We can not tell you where to procure the article you name.

KATE A.—You owe the bride a call after attending the wedding. We can not pronounce on your other question.

NINA.—Don't know.

ANNORA.—Our opinion of fortune-tellers, clairvoyants, etc., is given in a few words: as a class they are dangerous tricksters, that are best let alone.

S. H.—It is impossible to fix a standard for governesses' salaries, so much depends on circumstances.

ELLA R. D.—We should not think that school friends who had once been intimate would pause to consider which should make the first advance on meeting again. Etiquette is a very good thing within due bounds, but there are occasions when the natural impulses of the heart are safer guides than any conventional rules.

IRA.—The marriage laws vary in the different States, and what would be legal in one would sometimes not constitute a valid ceremony in another.—Harper & Brothers do not publish any works on phonography.

LEPIDUS.—The refrain, "And now my spinning is all done," is from A Year's Spinning, by Mrs. Browning. We can not answer your other question.

CHANDOS.—The poem, Nell Latine's Wedding, was published about two years ago in Scribner's Monthly.

EVELINA.—It seems to us that your course has been most reprehensible in taking advantage of your friend's hospitality to engage the affections of her suitor; and we think that your own sense of honor ought to make you discourage his attentions, and do all in your power to repair the evil you have caused.

SUBSCRIBER.—Give your mocking-bird the yolk of a hard-boiled egg mixed with a boiled potato daily, a piece of apple once a week, and occasionally a little bread soaked in milk. The prepared food which can be bought for sixty cents a quart at the bird stores gives variety to the diet; and the meal worms, costing from fifty cents to a dollar a hundred, are liked, and also do good, given one a day.

EVERY mother who has a crying baby, or children subject to croup and stomach-complaints, can rely upon Castoria to keep the child well and give it rest. There are but few nurses in New York who do not use Castoria. It should be in every house.—[Com.]

IF an article is to be judged by its popularity or success, the Wilson Sewing-Machine is certainly ahead of all competitors, as all the other companies' increase combined does not reach one-half of 4100 per cent. We would advise our readers to call and see a machine that can achieve such wonders, at the office of the Wilson Sewing-Machine Co. Sold complete for $50, and warranted for five years. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The Company want agents in country towns. —[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS
FOR 1873.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

A repository of biography and history, literature, science, and art, unequaled by any other American publication.—N. Y. Standard.

The most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR.
A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure and Instruction.

It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

There never was any paper published that so delighted the heart of woman. Never mind if it does cost you a new bonnet; it will save you ten times the price in the household economy it teaches.—Providence Journal.

FACETIÆ.

THE latest in the way of self-praise is an Indiana editor who played a few tunes on an old banjo under his office window, and then thanked the serenader in his next issue for delightful music.

SELF-EVI-DENTAL.—A botanical journal has the following among its list of articles: "The Function of Gums in Plants." While we strongly protest against the introduction of facetious matter into scientific papers, we admit that we give up the conundrum. As plants have no teeth, we can't see what use gums could be to them.

A young lady learning to spell wants to know if there's a he in love? Generally.

A photographer requested that his sign, "Taken from Life," should be his epitaph.

A piano-forte maker says that, of all manufactured things, pianos bear the noblest character, since they are classified as grand, square, and upright.

Why are all washer-women great travelers?—Because they are continually crossing the line and running from pole to pole.

A professor's wife, who occupied herself sometimes in assisting her husband in making casts of interesting objects of geology and natural history, also for her own pleasure sometimes made flowers and fruits of wax and other materials; but notwithstanding that she had become quite a successful expert in this line, she found that almost always her efforts were criticised by her friends. Once she passed a large apple round, and stated her confidence that this time she had been quite successful in her imitation of nature's product; but her friends were, as usual, not of her opinion. One criticised the shape, saying it would be more natural if it were not so globular; another criticised the colors, and said it was better than other imitations, but she had not quite hit that natural indescribable peculiarity which distinguishes the natural apples from the imitations: almost every one had some fault to find. After the apple had been passed round and had come into her hands again, she ate it without saying any thing. Her friends had been criticising a real apple.

A COMPLIMENT?

RECTOR. "Well, Thomas, and what did you think of the bishop's sermon last Sunday?"

TUMMAS. "Sorr, oi didn't loike it a bit; it was by fur too plain and simple to suit me. Oi loikes a sermont whut joombles the joodgment and confoozles the senses, and oi never come acrost one to come up to yerself for preachin' they!"

POETIC REFLECTION.

The aid that Art to Nature pays
Quite to forbid we ne'er can hope;
For who e'en Venus' self could praise,
If Venus were unhelped by soap?

"Mr. Speaker," exclaimed a member of Congress, "my colleague taunts me with a desire for fame. I scorn the imputation, Sir. Fame, Sir! What is fame? It is a shaved pig, with a greased tail, which slips through the hands of thousands, and then is accidentally caught by some lucky fellow that happens to hold on to it. I let the greased-tail quadruped go by me without an effort to clutch it, Sir!"

"What's the use in these days trying to be honest?" exclaimed a grumbler.

"Oh, you ought to try it once and see," retorted one of his companions.

A letter addressed to "The Devil" is lying in the post-office at Lafayette, Indiana, and the postmaster thinks he'll have to send it to Washington.

A traveler in Wales, seeing a sign over the door with this one word, "Agorsequrdere," asked the woman what she sold, when she said she did not sell any thing, but that "agues was cured here."

A POSER!

Mivvins (he doesn't "take" well) thought there was a chance for him, having heard that the new English photographers, Partouche & Co., "retain a Staff of Artists who are exclusively engaged in studying to impart an unconstrained grace of 'pose' and characteristic expression in the attitudes of their numerous Sitters!"

ARTIST (fixing M.'s hand, so as to show his diamond ring). "There, Sir! 'Enery, bring the 'Ead-Rest!" (M. winces.) "Now, Sir, fix the Heyes, and Imagine you're welcomin' a Friend!"

[No! It was a failure! Mivvins does not "take" well.

"REASON IN WOMAN."

YOUNG WIFE. "Harry dear, I've had a Talk with the Servants this Morning, and I've agreed to Raise their Wages. They said every thing was so Dear now—Meat was so High, and Coal had Risen to such a Price, and every thing— I thought this was Reasonable, because I've so often heard You complain of the Same Thing."

A BEAUTIFUL INVENTION.—A man has invented a little machine for removing the shells from chestnuts and pea-nuts. It is made to fit over the nose; the breath passing from the nostrils furnishes the motive power; the nuts are dropped into the hopper on top, and the meat or shelled nut is dropped into the mouth of the eater below. It is noiseless in its working, and gentlemen or ladies who have been debarred from attending church because they were not allowed to "crunch" nuts can now experience a new pleasure.

A FAMILY MIXTURE.—An English correspondent writes: "There are in the parish of Oswestry four inmates residing in the same cottage—first, two sisters, two mothers, two mothers-in-law, two aunts, son and daughter, son-in-law and daughter-in-law, niece and nephew, two cousins, husband and wife. All this relationship is comprised in the above-mentioned four residents."

A scientific friend, who has been reading with great patience an exhaustive treatise on the "velocity of light," says that he now knows how it is that his gas bills run up so rapidly.

The society formed by the girls of the San Francisco High School for the suppression of slang has been disbanded. The secretary says, "It played itself out" and "gave itself away."

A juror in a criminal court asked to be excused the other day because he had conscientious scruples about sending a man to prison. He said he thought there was too much false swearing done, and he knew how it was himself. Further examination developed the fact that he had been in prison himself for highway robbery, assault and battery, and larceny. The court excused him.

An artist has been painting herrings with red paint and blue spots, and they were sold for speckled trout.

A SENSITIVE EDITOR.—The pursuit for information is sometimes attended with difficulties, even in San Francisco. One inquirer, who applied to the Chronicle for information as to where Cain obtained his wife, is cruelly rebuffed, the only reply vouchsafed him being this: "Upon any subject of a public nature we never refuse to throw the desired light. But this is altogether a different thing. It is a family matter with which we do not care to meddle. Cain died some time before many of us were born, and such idle curiosity regarding the family affairs of a deceased person we regard as reprehensible, and calculated to violate the sanctities of domestic life. For these reasons, and because we do not wish to injure the feelings of the relatives of the deceased, we decline to answer the question."

DISAGREEABLE PHILOSOPHY.—A daughter is almost always right when she endeavors to imitate her mother; but it is doubtful whether the mother is equally right when, at a certain period of life, she tries all she can to imitate her daughter.

Makers of fishing tackle complain of the scarcity of feathers for the manufacture of artificial flies. One of them says that all the feathers have flown to the heads of women, who are little better than artificial flies themselves, with the hooks very well concealed.

A Chicago man has fitted up a fiddle to play by steam.

This is the way in which a reporter can write up a city sunset, when he gives his mind to it: "As the lengthening shadows merge one into another, betokening the end of day, the ridges and spires of the city seem girt with molten gold, while the mellowed light of the declining sun falls upon them, and soon upon all a ruby tinge o'erflows." Very good, but how about a lady's nose?

"How on earth do you manage?" asked a gentleman of two inseparable loungers. "You are always together, you never do any thing, and yet you always have plenty of money."

"Simplest thing in the world, my dear fellow," was the candid reply. "We borrow of one another."

WORTH WHILE FOR WOMEN TO KNOW.

PEOPLE are content to understand very little of the conditions of comfort in houses. The question of health may be left to the care of physicians, and that of beauty to the architect, but one would suppose on matters of comfort each one would look out for himself. There is excuse for this neglect in business men, who are hardly at home long enough to know whether a house is tenable or not; but it is strange that women will endure damp, foul odors, smoke, and dust year after year without trying to remove the nuisances. The only idea most women have of suppressing any evil of the sort is to "send for a man to fix it." Workmen are not always to be had, and, if they are, cost money, and a breach of comfort may last years before every thing comes together for its mending. A woman needs both muscle and management to take care of a family, unless she can afford to pay a third of her income for these things in others. The clever woman is an actual acquaintance, who goes about her house, spying a loose knob here and screwing it up, springing with her light plane to smooth down a door that sticks in the casing, fitting a neat strip to prevent a window's rattling, besides papering, painting, and varnishing with more nicety than one mechanic out of a dozen. Such a woman is worthy to be called a house-mother, after the good German word. How can a woman live year after year within four walls and not grow fond of them, and seek to add to their comfort?

People will endure any amount of damp short of inflammatory rheumatism. Wall-paper may peel, mirrors dim with vapor, and the feet be always chilly with that unwholesome feeling that comes from damp floors, and the only remedy known is removal. No matter how damp a cellar is, it may be made perfectly healthy. When the soil is wet, a pavement of cement should be put down, and a thin layer on the walls coated with asphalt laid on hot. Layers of ashes, sand, and asphalt, rolled thoroughly like the Belgian pavement of streets, will answer in place of the cement. Sea sand should not be used for plaster, unless it is thoroughly washed to get rid of the saline particles, which absorb damp. Sand, coal ashes, iron scales, and quicklime may form the bed for the asphalt. This becomes thoroughly water-proof, and the odor of the coal-tar is disinfectant. The whole cellar wall should be coated with asphalt, as well as every brick or stone in contact with the ground. Brick, stone, or concrete draws up moisture from the foundation, and the asphalt prevents this wall-damp. It is useless to coat the outside walls with water-proof cement, or build hollow walls, while they can draw up the damp constantly from the foundation, though water-proofing the inside avails. Hollow walls become ruined at the core by moisture taken through bricks or "binders" laid crosswise to hold the outer and inner walls together. Their spaces also store up dead air, which finds its way by minute cracks into sleeping-rooms, where it breeds mysterious disease. No preventive of damp is better than a lining of paper-board laid on with asphalt. Painting with four coats of lead, linseed-oil, and litharge is a more expensive mode of water-proofing, but not more effectual. If water appears on the surface of a cellar from springs that crop out after it is finished, a drain a foot deep should be laid around the cellar next the wall, and lined with tiles, through which the water may run from the centre.

Brick and stone houses soon become penetrated in exposed positions by driving rain, while shaded walls, even in clear weather, absorb and retain the insensible moisture of the air. Brick will absorb one-fifth its weight of water. If the inside of a house is furred off, still the outer wall must meet the action of water, which sooner or later crumbles the brick at the heart of the wall. Sea-side villas or bathing-houses may be finished with slates, like a Mansard-roof. The soft, porous kinds of stone, Dorchester, Portland lime, brown-stone, and freestone, in a few years show the action of the weather. They should be coated with the solution of silicate of potassa, the so-called water-glass, which is applied like paint, and hardens quickly into a glossy surface impervious to moisture; it is less expensive than paint or stucco, which last one would only wish to see on inferior kinds of stone.

Finally, in marshy or sea-side regions fires should be lit the year round at least morning and evening. When stoves are down, fires may be made in a charcoal brazier, and taken from room to room as desired; the place to set these is under an open window, that all fumes may escape. Chloride of lime mixed with wood ashes will absorb dampness from closets, but should be changed once a week at least, and burned to get rid of the bad and perhaps infectious matter it absorbs.

THE STRANGER IN THE GATES.

THERE are few of us who give a great deal of thought to the condition of our maid-servants, in relation to their happiness or unhappiness—so occupied are we with relation to the plague and burden that they are apt to be—and they remain almost literally the stranger within our gates.

But certainly in the families where only one servant is employed, the state of that servant is capable of being something quite as deplorable as the state of her mistress. Take the case of any young girl but lately off the sea on the voyage from her native land, and introduced to her lonely and laborious lot in an alien family. Accustomed to her out-door work at home, her harvesting and gleaning and milking and marketing and merry-making, she suddenly finds herself bent over a hot cooking-stove, doing her utmost to understand the strange rites and mysteries and the unknown implements connected with it, and pretty generally failing to do so; bent over dish-pans and wash-tubs, and dusters and brooms; bent over back-aching ironing-boards and terrible scrubbing-brushes; her whole life enlisted for a continual warfare with dirt and discomfort, glad at night to creep away to the dark and dismal little room assigned her—we must acknowledge that if she were a daughter of our own we should feel her lot to be a fearful thing.

She belongs to a glad, gay race, fond of talking and laughing, fond of their quips and jokes, eager for pleasure; and she is bound down to nearly day-long solitude, with no pleasure of any kind till after nightfall, if then. She is at that time of life when friends and home are of the most importance to her, but she is almost utterly deprived of both; for certainly we do not feel ourselves her friends, and it would be a piece of hardihood in us to call our kitchen by such a name as home. If we live in the city, that kitchen is a little dark room, half under-ground, and half of its light dependent on a sky-light, and with its sole window looking into a black area. If we live in the country, it is a larger and lighter room, with the cold pouring in at countless cracks, and the windows commanding lively views of the barn-yard. In such a place she spends the greater part of her time; she has little or no conversation with any one; should she jest with her mistress, it would be an unpardonable liberty, overthrowing all discipline; she keeps her aches and her ails and her joys and her hopes to herself in good measure, and it is no wonder that one day her heart fails her, and she ceases to care whether her work is done well or ill.

It may be that the worst thing, so far as the physical and material part of her situation is concerned, is her sleeping-room. We have known it to be placed in a little black-hole off the area kitchen, where, till she had gotten used to it, the occupant could lie and quake with fear, knowing all the family to be at least two flights of stairs away; but oftenest it is a garret at the top of the house, uncarpeted, half furnished, any bed, any bedclothes; nothing wholesome or happy in it; nothing calculated to make a girl feel that she has a retreat and a spot where she can hang her Palm-Sunday branch and her picture of the blessed Virgin, and make a little home to herself. We say to ourselves that, bad as it is, it is infinitely better than any thing she ever had before; but she has already seen the difference between our own rooms and that. And can we picture to ourselves any thing more lonesome and desolate than a girl might feel who wakes from an unhappy dream in the middle of her first night in a strange house, and in such a room as that?

After all the certainty that we may have as to a good foundation for the complaints that are the staple of our daily walk and conversation, may we not question if some slight reform in the matter of our bad household service could not be reached by striking at one of the roots of the thing here? If we begin by taking no interest in the affairs of the new girl, by leaving her to become sensible of her loneliness and estrangement; if we go on by manifesting no concern with her pleasure, no desire to increase her enjoyments; if we simply show a determination to get our money's worth out of the machine—can we marvel if we are presently regarded in the light of task-masters, and our machine ranges herself with the enemy?

In the course of our observation—and we have given the subject some serious attention—we have been compelled to admit that those families who, if they do not quite make their servant a part of themselves, at any rate look out carefully for her comfort; who make her kitchen pleasant, and her bedchamber pleasanter far; who give her a good rocking-chair to rest her weary bones, and a bed that does not on its face declare that she who does the hardest work shall have the hardest sleep; who see that now and then a concert ticket, or one to the panorama or the traveling minstrels, is provided for the servant and her friend; who take an interest in the cut and fit of her dress and the color of her hat ribbons; who always give her a due proportion of the table dainties; who hang up a stocking for her at Christmas, and stuff it well; who feel her welfare to be a thing intrusted to their hands, and who, while teaching her to do her duty, do not fail in theirs—we have noticed that from such people there is heard the least complaint of trouble in the kitchen.

For we have, indeed, no right to expect perfection from rude and imperfect materials, unless they should be combined by the loving and artistic hand. The artist models his clay, and makes it what he will. The young Irish girl comes to us as plastic as any clay in all the world. She is fresh, emotional, strong, willing, full of the energy that sent her three thousand miles across the water, and so totally ignorant of any other civilized ways than ours that she is completely ready to be moulded to our wish. It is true that stupidity and superstition work against us, but they are foes that reason and patience and the loving heart easily baffle. And if we do not model our clay to the thing we want—if after years of life with us the girl is not the desirable handmaiden of our house, fit to become a helpful and economical wife to the poor workman who marries her—can it be that she herself is more responsible for the fact than we who had such power to shape her ends?

THE month of July is considered the worst of the year for the carnivorously inclined, while the most fastidious vegetarians find all therein that they could wish. Beef is and will be inferior until October, and game is scarce, as will be seen in the list below.

FISH.

Sea-bass, black and blue fish, butter-fish, cusk, gar, kingfish, mackerel, Spanish mackerel, black and blue perch, porgy, salmon, scup, sheep's-head, sturgeon, sword-fish, spotted turbot, trout, weak-fish, frogs.

SHELL-FISH.

Crabs (hard and soft shell), lobsters, periwinkles, prawns, green turtles.

MEAT.

Beef, veal, mutton, spring lamb.

POULTRY.

Chickens, capons, spring chickens, ducklings, young turkeys.

GAME.

Lapwing, plover, snipe, woodcock.

VEGETABLES.

Artichokes, asparagus, beets, cabbages, carrots, cauliflower, chervil, chives, corn, cucumbers, egg-plant, Wohl-rabi, Limas, nasturtium, onions, pease, potatoes, white and yellow radishes, string-beans, squash, tomatoes, turnips, water-melons, water-cress.

FRUITS.

Apples, apricots, bananas, blackberries, blueberries, cherries, cocoa-nuts, currants, fresh figs, gooseberries, huckleberries, peaches, pears, plums, pine-apples, raspberries, strawberries.

There is generally a pretty good supply of woodcock after the 4th of July. Plover are in their prime, and lovers of game appreciate a well-roasted plover. Our readers will remember the directions we have given in preceding numbers about roasting birds. Cooks can not be too careful in roasting plover; like canvas-back ducks and many other birds, they must be served rather underdone. The taste of the bird is improved by chopping very fine or pounding in a mortar the liver and heart with about the same bulk of fat salt pork, one-fourth of a bay leaf, a pinch of thyme, a sprig of sweet-basil, two of parsley, salt, pepper, and putting the mixture inside of the bird before tying the slice of salt pork on its breast. Plovers may be served, thus roasted, with water-cress around, and lemon juice spread all over.

Some amateurs do not draw woodcock, for fear of taking away some of their flavor; this being a matter of individual taste, we shall not recommend or blame the practice; there is nothing like gratifying one's own fancy. A woodcock is better flavored by being kept a few days than when cooked too fresh.

The artichokes mentioned in our list are not the potato-like or Jerusalem artichokes, but the thistle-like ones, the head of which is the only edible part after the outer leaves and the choke found inside of it have been removed. They are eaten raw, or boiled with a sauce composed of vinegar, oil, salt, pepper, chopped chives, and a little mustard. If more convenient, a green onion may be used instead of chives. They may also be stewed; when boiled, they are cut in four or six pieces, according to size, placed in a pan, covered with broth, and simmered for about twelve minutes, seasoned with butter, salt, chopped parsley, pepper, and as many mushrooms in slices as there are artichokes. When dished, the mushrooms are placed around, and the sauce poured over the whole through a strainer.

Red radishes are becoming strong and hollow in July, but good white and yellow ones take their place on the tables.

Water-melons from the South are found in the markets at the end of the month, and although they are called cholera bombs down East, physicians prescribe them in some cases, as their diuretic properties act on the kidneys. They should not be eaten as a dessert, their cooling properties chilling the stomach just at a time when it requires heat. If eaten at a meal, they should come immediately after the soup, or the first thing of all if no soup is served.

Carrots.—Scrape and wash them, put them in cold water and salt, and boil until cooked; then they may be served with a milk (Béchamel) or cream sauce, or au jus (with gravy).

Carrots fines-herbes.—The carrots are boiled as above; about two ounces of butter are melted in a saucepan, and a middling-sized onion, sliced, is fried in it; when turning yellow, add about a pint of water; boil from eight to ten minutes; put the carrots in after having sliced them, boil two minutes longer, turn over the dish, spread chopped parsley and lemon juice all over, and an excellent dish is ready to serve.

Another way is to boil the carrots as above, but take them off when not quite done; slice them, and put them in a pan with a little butter, and stir over a good fire for two minutes; add about a table-spoonful of cold water, salt, pepper, a pinch of grated nutmeg; simmer till the whole is thoroughly heated, and serve. A table-spoonful of sugar may be added, if liked.

Cabbage stuffed.—A stuffed cabbage makes a good dish, but many who like cabbage do not cook any on account of the smell which it evaporates while cooking. This is easily prevented by putting in the pot or pan with the cabbage a piece of charcoal wrapped up in a rag, and by simmering the cabbage instead of boiling it. Clean and blanch the cabbage in boiling water and salt for about ten minutes; take off, and drop it into cold water, and drain; remove a few of the centre leaves, and fill their place with sausage meat, to which you may add a few yolks of eggs. Be careful not to break the leaves; then tie it with twine, giving it its original form as nearly as possible. Put on the bottom of a pan a few pieces of salt pork, the same of veal, if handy, and also of ham, two or three onions sliced, same of carrots, a bay leaf, and two or three cloves; place the cabbage, or cabbages, on the whole, cover with broth or water (broth is better), add salt and pepper to taste, simmer for an hour and a half; take the cabbage off carefully, and dish it, remove the twine, skim off the fat from the sauce, turn it over the cabbage through a strainer, and serve warm.

Cucumbers stuffed.—Proportions: Four good-sized cucumbers, one middling-sized onion, four ounces of bread, six sprigs of parsley, half a bay leaf, a few stalks of chives, two cloves, two ounces of butter, a pinch of nutmeg, and a gill of broth. Soak the bread (soft part) in water, and when thoroughly soaked press the water out of it; split each cucumber in two lengthwise, peel them, cut off a piece, about a quarter of an inch, at each end, remove the seed from the inside with a small spoon; slice the onion, and fry it with the butter, then add to it the seeds removed from the cucumbers, the bread, parsley, bay leaf, chives, cloves, nutmeg, and broth; the cloves and piece of bay leaf should be wrapped up in a rag; stir now and then, and simmer for about five minutes. Have water with a little salt boiling in another pan, and drop the cucumbers in for two minutes; take them off, drop them in cold water, and drain; then fill each half with the mixture of bread, onion, etc., put a few slices of fat salt pork in a pan, place the cucumbers on them, dust with bread-crumbs, put on the top of each, and apart, three pieces of butter the size of a bean, put the pan in a hot oven until the cucumbers are well baked, and serve. A little meat gravy may be poured over each just before serving.

Cauliflowers.—When cleaned and washed drop them in boiling water, into which you have put salt and a tea-spoonful of flour, or a slice of bread; boil till tender; take off, drain, and dish them; serve with a sauce spread over, and made with melted butter, salt, pepper, grated nutmeg, chopped parsley, and vinegar.

Another way is to make a white sauce, as we have directed in a preceding number, and when they are cooked and dished as above, turn the white sauce over, and serve warm. They may also be served in the same way with a milk, cream, or tomato sauce, or with brown butter.

Cauliflowers au gratin.—Boil them as directed above, and then dish them on a crockery dish; spread a white sauce all over, dust with grated cheese (Swiss cheese is the best), after which you spread melted butter all over, and then dust with bread-crumbs; put the dish in a quick oven for about ten minutes, and serve. As they must be served in the crockery dish, the latter may be placed inside of another dish to serve.

Fried.—Boil the cauliflowers till about half done. Mix two table-spoonfuls of flour with two yolks of eggs, then add water enough to make a rather thin paste; add salt to taste; the two whites are beaten till stiff, and then mixed with the yolks, flour, and water. Dip each branch of the cauliflowers in the mixture, and fry them in hot fat. When done, take them off with a skimmer, turn into a colander, dust salt all over, and serve warm.

Stewed.—Clean and blanch the cauliflowers for about three minutes; take them off and put them in a pan with two table-spoonfuls of fat, and a few slices of salt pork at the bottom; set the pan on a slow fire, simmer for five minutes, add two or three table-spoonfuls of broth and one of gravy, stir now and then, simmer till done, when dish the cauliflowers, add to the sauce salt and pepper to taste, turn it over the cauliflowers through a strainer, and serve.

For breakfast.—Boil the cauliflowers as directed above until done; take them off, drop them in cold water, and then drain them. Put one or two yolks of hard-boiled eggs in a bowl or salad dish, and mix them well with four table-spoonfuls of oil, making a paste; then mix again with two tablespoonfuls of vinegar, salt, pepper, chopped parsley, and a little mustard. Stir the cauliflowers in the mixture, and serve cold.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

BATHING SUITS.

THE bathing season is late this summer, but extensive preparations are making for it at the furnishing houses. An effort is being made to popularize the short-sleeved, low-throated suits in favor at European bathing-places, and which have been illustrated in the Bazar. It is thought best, however, to provide an extra pair of long sleeves that may be buttoned on or basted in the short puffs that are sewed in the armholes. Sometimes a small cape fastening closely about the throat is also added. Many other fancy designs, with redingote and polonaise over dresses, are shown for bathing suits, but the favorite model remains the old-fashioned yoke blouse, plain about the shoulders, flowing and full below. The yoke is square and quite deep. The waist and skirt are in one piece of three or four widths, long enough to reach half-way between the knee and ankle. The waist is attached to the yoke by broad box-pleats. These pleats may be sewed flatly as far as the belt; but as this outlines the bust very plainly, most ladies prefer loose pleats. The belt may be of the material, or else of tarpaulin. Sometimes a sash of the goods or of bright India colors is loosely knotted about the waist or lower down on the hips. Sleeves are plain coat shape, or else shirt sleeves with deep cuffs. The neck is usually finished with a broad marine collar, but this season the inevitable ruff is even added to bathing dresses. The trowsers reach to the ankle, and are made like closed drawers, fastening on the side. A drawing-string is usually put in the back of the belt to tighten or loosen the garment at pleasure.

Another design in favor for young ladies' bathing dresses is a sailor suit, made with the full sailor blouse falling loosely over the hips, with no belt, but merely a hem at the bottom, in which a rubber band is run. The skirt is plain, with gored front, and full back gathered to a band. This is especially pretty made in navy blue flannel, with white Hercules braid for trimming.

The materials for these aquatic suits are twilled flannels, wiry serges, and moreen. White flannel suits are more admired than all others, but require care in drying to keep them from showing soiled streaks. Gay scarlet or blue worsted braid is set on in straight bands, or else the garments are scalloped and ornamented with narrow serpentine braid. Some pretty white flannel suits have the middle back pleats hanging loosely in Watteau fashion, while the front and sides are belted; others have two rows of large buttons down the front, and are worn flowing like the loose double-breasted redingotes. The buttons are large wooden moulds covered with red or blue merino. Handsome white flannel suits cost $14. One of the most tasteful suits shown is made of two shades of dark blue twilled flannel. The foundation of the garment is dark blue, while a very light blue shade is used for the collar, cuffs, pocket, sash, and the bias bands with which the skirt is trimmed. Price $14. A brown serge suit is made with a yoke blouse, provided with long and short sleeves, and trimmed with crimson braid. This costs $10. Many cheaper suits made of remnants of gray flannel not twilled, or of striped moreen, cost from $5 to $8. New bathing mantles, for putting on when crossing the beach, are long cardinal cloaks made of white corduroy, flannel, or water-proof, braided in bright colors. The slippers for walking in the sand are "mules," or merely toes and soles made of flannel, braided to match the cloak, and sewed to cork soles. The best bathing cap is an oiled silk bag-crown cap large enough to hold the hair loosely; the frill around the edge is bound with colored braid: price $1. Many ladies prefer instead to let the hair hang, and wear an old broad-brimmed straw hat tied down at the sides; sometimes both cap and hat are used. Bathing shoes are of white duck or sail canvas, with manilla soles: price 50 cents.

WATERING-PLACE DRESSES.

Among the most tasteful dresses prepared for afternoon and evening at the watering-places are those of silk skirts and thin polonaises of grenadine, black or écru guipure, or else white organdy. A very handsome costume has a plain waist, with demi-trained skirt of blue-gray silk, with lengthwise graduated puffs covering the entire front and first side breadths, while in the back are merely two gathered flounces. The polonaise is white grenadine in stripes of square canvas meshes alternating with moiré stripes. The garment is loose, and worn with a belt and side sash. The trimming is a bias band of grenadine two inches wide, piped on the upper edge, and finished below with heavy crimped fringe. Another suit has a plain silk dress of peach color, an exquisite pinkish-mauve challie, simply trimmed with two bias ruffles around the skirt, headed with a full pinked ruche. This dress is almost covered with a polonaise of thinnest white organdy in which many lengthwise bands of Valenciennes are set, and the seams concealed by an edge of narrow lace on each side. The insertion is two inches wide; there are three rows down the back and four down the front, and the pattern is fern leaves thickly wrought, that show beautifully over the silk beneath. Around the skirt is a band of insertion, to which is attached scalloped lace of the same design, which is also let in the muslin, and a similar lace edges the garment. A wide lace frill is around the neck and sleeves.

A very lovely white Swiss muslin dress with needle-worked flounces is worn over white silk, and is suitable for full evening dress. The white silk skirt has a deep Spanish flounce. Over this is the muslin skirt, with three embroidered flounces edged with Valenciennes in the front breadths, and six such flounces on the back. With this is a demi-polonaise, long, flat, and square in front, with a short square basque behind. This is one of the newest Parisian designs for muslin dresses. Another imported white dress is of sheer organdy throughout, and will be worn over a white muslin skirt and underwaist. The loose Marguerite polonaise has two bands of Valenciennes insertion set in down the fronts and around the skirt, separated by a band of box-pleated organdy two inches broad, with inch-wide box-pleats; a scant ruffle edged with lace is on the bottom of the polonaise. A wide lace fraise inside a flaring band of double muslin trims the neck, and there are double ruffles around the sleeves. Around the skirt, to make the bottom sit out gracefully, is a twelve-inch flounce in box-pleats, covered by a gathered flounce of the same muslin with insertion set in, and wide lace on the edge. Above this are three rows of insertion, with the lengthwise box-pleated bands between; this extends to the knees, and is headed by a standing lace frill.

These muslin dresses are exquisitely made by hand; the seams are never left with raw edges, but are first run together on the right side, then the garment is turned and sewed substantially inside, making a close, neat seam.

PINE-APPLE DRESSES.

Pretty dresses for midsummer are also made of the transparent pine-apple silk mounted on colored Chambéry muslin. A model is of blue pine-apple, with white lines made over solid blue muslin. The waist is a tight jockey basque of the blue lawn, plainly covered with the pine-apple fabric, and edged with a piping cord and very narrow Italian Valenciennes; a fraise is around the neck, and graduated down the front in vest shape; coat sleeves, with two bias ruffles. The skirt of solid blue lawn is concealed by bias striped flounces edged with Valenciennes. The two lower ruffles extend around the skirt, while five narrower ones are curved on the front breadths. A full round over-skirt is ruffled and draped on the sides. Such dresses cost $75. Four dozen yards of lace are used in trimming the flounces. This design is prettily made up in black and white lawns or grenadines.

LISLE-THREAD AND SILK GLOVES.

Ladies whose hands perspire freely consult comfort and economy by wearing during the warm months lisle-thread gloves. These are now made like kid gloves, with long wrists, fastened by two or three buttons, and are stitched on the back in lines of self-colored silk. Pale gray, pearl, drab, and brownish-buff are the best colors for summer wear. White thread gloves are not as popular as they formerly were. English thread gloves are fashioned with four sewed seams in the fingers, precisely as kid gloves are, and cost 80 cents for those with three buttons, 70 cents for two-button gloves, while those with an elastic tirette and only one button are bought for 60 cents. French lisle-thread gloves fit admirably, and have but one seam woven in each finger. They are shown in dark colors, black, and white, fastened by three buttons for $1 10, with two buttons for $1, and with one button for 90 cents. These black thread gloves are suitable for mourning, and a grateful relief from the warmth of black kid. The Neapolitan gloves, of mixed silk and linen, are in grisaille colors, appropriate for half-mourning. They are cool, and so soft that they do not have the disagreeable creeping effect produced by more wiry fabric gloves. With double buttons at the wrist, they cost 70 cents.

Silk gloves of English manufacture are commended in gray, brown, and buff shades. Those with a band at the wrist fastened by two buttons cost $1 30; long wrists, with an elastic band in black, white, and colors, are $1 25; extra heavy silk gloves of substantial fabric, that will outwear three pairs of ordinary gloves, are the most economical purchase, although costing $2 a pair.

For driving basket phaetons, riding, and traveling are buckskin gauntlets, made with a gore on the side; the hand is easily slipped into these, and there is no after trouble of buttoning: they cost $1 50 or $2. Round-topped buttoned gauntlets are the same price. A still more dainty glove, of its kind, is the soft castor glove with flowing cuff, lined with white kid, and nicely finished: price $3 a pair.

Lace mittens are sold in quantities for country use. They are made with half fingers, are heavily wrought on the back of the hand and sometimes inside, and have deep flowing cuffs. The choice designs have lengthwise stripes on the back, making the hand look slender. From $3 50 to $4 is the range of prices.

VARIETIES.

Kid shoes, with straps buttoned across the instep, leaving spaces between the bars for displaying the stockings, were worn at the Jerome Park races, and are occasionally seen on the promenade, but are too prononcé for any thing but carriage wear. The colored silk stockings worn abroad have already appeared here, in blue, mauve, and violet shades. White stockings striped around with a color are worn with low shoes in the house.

The châtelaine dress, with close plain waist buttoned below the hips, is among summer importations, and is more novel than pretty. The skirt is smooth and without gathers in front, and in some cases has lead in the bottom to make it hang clinging to the figure. The back is draped slightly over a sash.

Short fichus, scarcely more than collars, lapped on the breast, are made of lace and sheer muslin, and finished with a high lace fraise around the neck.

Black silk fraises lined with pale blue, buff, white, or rose-colored silk are used to vary the monotony of black silk and grenadine dresses. Colored China crape and muslin fraises are also shown in the shops. The sash of twilled silk deeply fringed must match in color. These are used with black and with white muslin dresses.

PERSONAL.

ACCORDING to Mr. WILLIAM HOWARD RUSSELL, in his interesting letter to the New York Times, the jewels of the Shah of Persia, as seen when he was on view in Berlin, have quite surpassed the reports of their size and value which preceded their owner's arrival. The treasury of Persia, we all knew, was rich to an incredible richness with accumulated wealth of the sort, but no one was prepared to see, mortalibus oculis, a diamond nearly twice the size of the Koh-i-noor, or "Mountain of Light" (now in the possession of the Queen of England, once RUNJEET SINGH, the Lion of Lahore's greatest glory), stuck in front of a man's sword-belt, and five diamonds, each larger than that jewel of jewels, en échelon up his coat from waist to shoulder. These stones are scarcely cut, and do not show as they ought, but they are of surpassing purity. The Shah's sword-belt is a treasure-house in itself. The sheath is studded with rubies, emeralds, and diamonds, which shame their setting of purest gold. The front of his coat is garnished with rows of brilliants instead of lace. The collar and sleeves are crusted with them, and his orders are of the most precious jewels. His spurs flash like sunbeams. All this on the person of a man who has nothing noble in mien or face, although he is above the average height of the Indian Mussulman noblesse.

—Mr. GEORGE W. CHILDS has been made the recipient of an exquisite present from London's courtliest publisher, Mr. JOHN MURRAY. It consists of an exquisite set of Lord BYRON'S works, superb in binding, style, and every thing else. On the fly-leaf inside was inscribed, "To GEORGE W. CHILDS, Esq., Philadelphia. In testimony of kind remembrances from JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, London." Immediately following this was a piece of the poet's original manuscript, ordering a correction in the Bride of Abydos. It reads:

"The couplet in the errata page must be altered to as follows:

'The deepest murmur of this life shall be,
No sigh for safety but a prayer for thee.'

"Let this be done immediately and at all events, even if the other be printed. B."

Several erasures, misplaced capitals, etc., occur in this interesting little memento of his lordship.

—Mrs. FITZGERALD, who bears the charming name of the charming editor of the Philadelphia All Day City Item, has been a-traveling in the wilds of Pennsylvania, and witnessed the following funny scene on the Lehigh Valley cars: "The newsboy that carries the illustrated papers through the cars, and lays them so nicely on your lap, unfortunately overlooked a fat old lady, with a large nose, long teeth, and green goggles. He had nearly reached the door, when the much-excited lady arose to her full height, and flirting herself and her green umbrella to some extent, screamed, 'You boy, I want one of them ere Harper's Illustriated Bombazines.' It went like a bomb-shell through the car, and such roars of laughter you never heard. Even the babies clapped their tiny hands and kicked and laughed. The old lady got her Harper, and the ludicrous way she undertook to look at it, upside down, and every way but the right way, created another roar. I don't know how it is, colonel, but I always feel pleased when I see the folks preferring Harper's to any of the other illustrated papers. I suppose it is because they have always been such loyal good fellows. God bless the HARPERS!"

—Sir JAMES EYRE, in his well-known little book, mentions three curious cases of idiosyncrasy—the case of a gentleman who could not eat a single strawberry, of another whose head would become swollen if he touched the smallest particle of hare, of a third who would inevitably have an attack of gout a few hours after eating fish. We may add the instance of a clergyman who always fainted when he heard a certain verse of Jeremiah!

—Mrs. QUINCY SHAW, daughter of Professor AGASSIZ, has given $100,000 to the Museum of Comparative Zoology, in which her father is so deeply interested. It needs but a few more Mrs. SHAWS and Mr. JOHN ANDERSONS to make that museum in every respect, what it now is in many, the most extensive and perfect in the world.

—Mrs. RUDD, widow of the late Commodore RUDD, of the navy, and daughter of DAVID PAUL BROWN, of Philadelphia, one of the ablest lawyers this country has produced, is now one of the ladies employed by the government in the Patent-office at Washington.

—Mr. HENRY PROBASCO, who gave to Cincinnati her magnificent fountain, now proposes to erect and give to that city a colossal art hall, filled with his pictures, gems, antiquities, and such. He is now in Europe perfecting his plans.

—Mr. LEWIS TAPPAN, who died in Brooklyn on the 21st ult., at the advanced age of eighty-five, was among the earliest and most prominent abolitionists in the country. After retiring from business many years ago he founded the system of mercantile agencies, which has since reached such gigantic proportions, and become a daily necessity to every large merchant in the leading cities and towns of the country.

—Colonel J. C. CARMONY has been exploiting a lecture in San Francisco on the Apaches, in which he described the courting ceremonies of that much-derided pack of braves. Thus: Every young girl is at liberty to refuse a suitor for her hand. The father, mother, and brother are prohibited from interfering in her choice. Her person is at her own disposal. After a brief courtship the lover makes a formal proposal by offering so many horses. Horses are a standard of value among Indians. As the squaw does all the work, horses are accepted as an equivalent for her labor. When a young warrior becomes enamored, he fastens the horse near the wigwam of the squaw whose hand he seeks, where he is left for four days. If she fails to feed and water the horse during that time, the master is rejected; but if she accepts his offer, she grooms and kindly cares for the horse, and then ties him to the wigwam of her lover, as much as to say, "I am willing to be your slave and do your work." At the marriage the sages and sachems meet together, and the bride is not unfrequently loaded with forty to fifty pounds of silver and copper trinkets.

—AUGUST SIMON, of this city, recently married a pretty Jewess of seventeen, named BERTHA DOBOZINSKI, whose papa, not liking SIMON, locked her up after the ceremony, and refused to let her go with her husband unless he became an Israelite. SIMON said he wouldn't, and went for a lawyer, habeas corpus, and Judge INGRAHAM. Bride in court. Judge inquired, "Which of the two will you go with?" She replied, "Husband." Papa then said, "All right; go with him, but send me back the silk dress I gave you." Not agreed to. SIMON put his thumb to the prominent cartilage of his face, made a peculiar motion, and said, "Wig-wag."

—There is not now living a single descendant in the male line of CHAUCER, SHAKSPEARE, SPENSER, MILTON, COWLEY, BUTLER, DRYDEN, POPE, COWPER, GOLDSMITH, SCOTT, BYRON, MOORE, Sir PHILIP SIDNEY, or Sir WALTER RALEIGH; not one of DRAKE, CROMWELL, HAMPDEN, MONK, MARLBOROUGH, PETERBOROUGH, or NELSON; not one of STRAFFORD, ORMOND, or CLARENDON; not one of ADDISON, SWIFT, or JOHNSON; not one of WALPOLE, BOLINGBROKE, CHATHAM, PITT, FOX, BURKE, GRATTAN, or CANNING; not one of BACON, LOCKE, NEWTON, or DAVY; not one of HUME, GIBBON, or MACAULAY; not one of HOGARTH or Sir JOSHUA REYNOLDS; not one of DAVID GARRICK, JOHN KEMBLE, or EDMUND KEAN.

—Lady readers of the Bazar may perhaps be amused at the dresses worn by a bride and groom at their wedding in the last century, both parties having fortunes. "On Tuesday we were married at Gray's Inn Chapel. Her dress a white silk, with gold facings and robins, shoes ditto, and a laced mob. Mine a white cloth coat and breeches, with gold buttons and button-holes; a red cloth waistcoat laced with gold, and a bob-wig....Sunday last was appointed for our appearance at church, where we were attended by the two Misses MALYN (each £20,000 fortune). My wife's dress a white and silver gown and petticoat of three guineas a yard; a lappit head of £100; a solitaire and ear-rings, £500; an enamel watch and tweeze, £200. My dress a brown coat and breeches, the former lined with silk of the same color, a white satin waistcoat with a gold shape, a bag sword, and silk stockings. In the afternoon we sat in those dresses to receive the company, among whom we had the honor of the Earl of Tylney, Lord CASTLEMAIN, and Lady DOROTHY CHILD. Next Sunday we appear in dresses to return the compliments—my wife in a rich flowered gown and petticoat, me in a cloth mixture, embroidered with silver, a blue satin chain, silk broad hose, with silver and velvet breeches." Talk of WORTH and POOLE, what were their triumphs in draping compared with the wonderful things worn by Mr. and Mrs. BURGES, of East Ham, Essex?

—Pretty custom this, in France: Mlle. NIQUET, seamstress, of Surèsnes, near Paris, having been announced from the pulpit by Father BRICE as duly chosen the Rosière, was crowned on Whitsunday with a white wreath by the Baroness de Chauvenet. The Rosière receives 300 francs, with the easy condition that the first girl born of the marriage shall be named CAMILLE.

—Lady BURDETT-COUTTS still retains her interest in the banking house, and her valuables are stored in the strong-boxes built by her eccentric grandfather. Some ten years ago it was estimated that her wealth, in the form of sovereigns, would weigh thirteen tons, and fill a hundred and seven flour sacks.

—Some years ago JOHN STUART MILL carried on a curious correspondence in French with AUGUSTE COMTE respecting women. The exalted opinion which MILL held of women was controverted by COMTE, who maintained that "the intelligence of women amounted at best to only a small instantaneous sagacity."

—Here is a fine type of young woman pervading Michigan: LIZZIE and LYDIA TAYLOR have been setting type in the office of the Battle Creek Journal for five years, earning from $8 to $20 a week. From their earnings they support their mother, have lived well as housekeepers, bought a piano, taken music lessons, given $100 toward the building of the Baptist church, and saved $1200. They are unmarried! Are the young men of Battle Creek idiots?

—On the 21st June, Mr. EMERSON, having recovered from the fatigues of his homeward voyage, held a general reception of such of his neighbors at Concord as desired to call. Large numbers attended. Mr. EMERSON is very grateful to his friends for the work of love in repairing and improving his beloved home, and congratulates himself that he lost but a single book from his library, but that, being manuscript, is irreparable.

—The University of Vermont has found a benefactor in Mr. T. W. PARK, of North Bennington, who has furnished the money to build a third story to the library building, to be used for an art gallery, and to be open to the public, without charge, at all reasonable times.

—The editor of a new organ of public opinion in Texas announces in his initial number that "In religion we are conservative, and mean to adhere to the cash system." The cash system of religion is perhaps not new, but open devotion to it is at least unusual.

—The Persian potentate who is now the very large lion of London is a very well educated man. He speaks and writes French fluently. All the ministers converse in French, and the Grand Vizier is an accomplished French scholar, that language being constantly spoken at the Persian court. There is not perhaps among the royalties of Europe a more accomplished or graceful gentleman than the Shah, and the same may be said of the officials who accompany him.

Gilt Wood Waste Basket, Figs. 1–3.

THE frame of this basket is made of gilt wood. The basket is fourteen inches and seven-eighths high, not including the feet. The sides of the frame are twenty-one inches and a quarter wide at the top, and seventeen inches and a quarter at the bottom, and the ends are twelve inches and seven-eighths wide at the top and eight inches and seven-eighths at the bottom. The upper edge of the frame is trimmed with lambrequins cut of maroon satin, net interlining, and lining from Fig. 26, Supplement. On the middle of each scallop of the lambrequin is sewed a tab, which is worked on canvas in cross stitch embroidery with worsted and silk in the design shown by Fig. 2. Bind the outer edge of these tabs narrow with maroon satin, and border the under edge with fringe. Trim the free outer edge of each lambrequin scallop with maroon silk gimp as shown by the illustration; between the curves of the gimp set on small covered buttons. Border the upper edge of the lambrequin, as shown by the illustration, with coarse maroon cord, the ends of which project from the lambrequin fourteen inches and seven-eighths long each, and are finished with tassels. Tie these ends in a bow, after fastening the lambrequins on the frame with small pins. The case, which is fastened in the frame, is of wood, covered on the outside with Russia leather, and on the inside with white glazed paper. Both halves of the lid are ornamented with embroidery, which is worked in cross stitch on canvas with worsted and silk. Fig. 3 shows a section of the design with description of symbols.

Tapestry Border for Portières, Furniture, etc.

THIS border is suitable for trimming portières, furniture, sofa-pillows, etc. It is worked on canvas with worsted and silk in the colors given in the description of symbols.

Mignardise and Crochet Tidy.

See illustration on page 453.

THIS tidy, which may also be used for the cover of sofa-cushions, etc., is made of mignardise and twisted crochet cotton, No. 30. First form six loops of the mignardise, each of which counts 143 small loops on the outer edge. Sew the ends of the mignardise together carefully. Arrange these loops in two circles, observing the illustration; the larger circle is designed to form the foundation of a medallion, and counts 121 loops on the edges, while the smaller circle, in the shape of a loop, forms one corner of the star in the centre of the tidy. Crochet, first, the inside of the medallion, consisting of 5 rounds, as follows: 1st round.—Fasten together the first and last of the 121 loops of the mignardise inside of this circle with 1 sl. (slip stitch), 1 sl. on the next loop, 2 ch. (chain stitch), 1 sl. on the next loop, * 13 ch., fasten to the next loop (to do this drop the stitch from the needle, pass the needle through the loop from the upper to the under side, and draw through the dropped stitch), 4 ch., fasten to the ninth of the 13 ch., × 4 ch., fasten to the second following loop, 4 ch., fasten to the same ch. as before, in doing this always insert the needle in the upper vein of this ch.; repeat four times from ×, 2 ch., fasten to the sixth of the 13 ch.; this forms one figure of six leaflets and one scallop of the mignardise. Work 6 ch., 1 sl. on the next loop, 2 ch. and 1 sl. on the next loop; repeat 8 times from *, going forward, but in the third and fifth repetition, instead of the 12 ch. which join one scallop with another above the leaf figure, work only 10 ch., and in the fourth repetition only 8 ch. at this point; finally, 1 sl. on the first st. (stitch) of this round. 2d round.—3 ch., which count as first dc. (double crochet), 1 dc. on the second following st. of the preceding round, then always alternately 1 ch., 1 dc. on the second following st.; this round should thus count 71 dc., including the 3 ch. counting as first dc.; at the end of the round crochet 1 sl. on the third of the 3 ch. counting as first dc. 3d round.—7 sl. on the first 7 st. of the preceding round, 4 ch., which count as first stc. (short treble crochet), 1 stc. on the next st., 8 times alternately 4 ch., pass over 5 st. of the preceding round, 2 stc. on the next 2 st., then pass over 11 st. of the preceding round, 2 stc. on the next 2 st., 8 times alternately 4 ch., pass over 5 st. of the preceding round, 2 stc. on the next 2 st.; finally, 1 sl. on the fourth of the 4 ch. counting as first stc. in this round. 4th round.—3 sl. on the first 3 st. of the preceding round, 3 ch., which count as first dc., 1 dc. on the second following st., 20 times alternately 1 ch., 1 dc. on the second following st., then pass over 8 st. of the preceding round, 1 dc. on the next st., 21 times alternately 1 ch., 1 dc. on the second following st.; finally, 1 sl. on the third of the 3 ch. counting as first dc. in this round. 5th round.—3 sl. on the first 3 st. of the preceding round, 8 times alternately 3 sc. on the next 4 st. of the preceding round, 1 p. (picot—that is,

5 ch. and 1 sl. on the first of these); then 3 sc. (single crochet) on the next 3 st., pass over 6 st., + 3 sc. on the next 4 st., twice alternately 1 p., 3 sc. on the next 4 st.; then 3 ch., 1 p., fasten to the middle ch. of the opposite p., 1 p., fasten to the third of the 3 ch. previously crocheted, 2 ch., fasten to the first of the 3 ch.; repeat once more from +, then 3 sc. on the next 4 st., twice alternately 1 p., 3 sc. on the next 4 st.; finally, 1 sl. on the first sc. of this round. Cut off the thread and fasten it. Having in this manner worked the middle part of all the medallions of the tidy, baste together the 5 loops in each hollow between 2 scallops on the outer edge of the medallions with several stitches. The scallops thus count 8 free standing loops. Then crochet on the outer edge of the medallions one round more, which at the same time connects the medallions, in the following manner: * 1 sl. on the fifth of the 8 free loops of the mignardise on the fourth scallop of a medallion (see + in the illustration), three times alternately 5 ch., 1 sl. on the next loop, × 2 ch., 1 sl. on the first free loop of the next scallop, 7 times alternately 5 ch., 1 sl. on the next loop; repeat three times from ×, then 2 ch., 1 sl. on the first free loop of the last scallop in the medallion, twice alternately 5 ch., 1 sl. on the next loop, 3 times alternately 3 ch., 1 sl. on the next loop, twice alternately 5 ch., 1 sl. on the next loop, then 4 ch., 1 sl. on the third loop on the outer edge of the smaller loop above the medallion (see illustration), 15 ch., 1 sl. on the fourth following loop on the same loop of the mignardise, 2 ch., 1 p., with 1 stc. fasten together the first and the last loop of 2 loops of the mignardise (see illustration). Now work in the opposite direction 2 ch., 1 sl. on the second standing loop on the outer edge of the loop of the mignardise above the next medallion, 3 ch., 1 p., fasten the st. of the p. to the eleventh of the 15 ch., 7 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the sixth of the 15 ch., 3 ch., 1 p., fasten the middle st. of the p. to the middle st. of the ch. scallop before the last on the last scallop in the first medallion, 6 ch., fasten to the fifth of the 7 ch. worked before the last 2 p., 5 ch., 1 sl. on the third following loop on the loop of the mignardise above the second medallion, 4 ch., 1 sl. on the first of the 8 free loops on the first scallop in the second medallion, twice alternately 5 ch., 1 sl. on the next loop, but fasten the middle st. of the last 5 ch. to the third of the 6 ch. after the last p., 3 times alternately 3 ch., fasten the middle ch. to the middle st. of the opposite corresponding ch. scallop on the last scallop in the first medallion, 1 sl. on the next loop of the first scallop in the second medallion, then twice alternately 5 ch., 1 sl. on the next loop, then 2 ch., 1 sl. on the first loop of the next scallop in the second medallion, 5 ch., fasten the middle ch. to the middle st. of the last ch. scallop on the preceding mignardise scallop, 1 sl. on the next loop, 5 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the middle st. of the first ch. scallop on the last scallop in the first medallion, 4 ch., fasten to the middle st. of the preceding ch. scallop before the last on the mignardise scallop before the last in the first medallion, 5 ch., fasten to the third of the 5 ch. worked before the p., 2 ch., 1 sl. on the next loop of the second scallop in the second medallion, twice alternately 5 ch., fasten the middle ch. to the middle st. of the opposite corresponding ch. scallop of the mignardise scallop before the last in the first medallion, then 7 ch., fasten to the middle st. of the third ch. scallop of the mignardise scallop before the last in the first medallion, 10 ch., fasten to the third of the last 7 ch., 2 ch., 1 sl. on the next loop of the second scallop in the second medallion, twice alternately 5 ch., 1 sl. on the next loop, then 2 ch., 1 sl. on the first loop of the third scallop in the second medallion, 5 ch., fasten the middle ch. to the middle st. of the last ch. scallop on the second mignardise scallop in the second medallion, 1 sl. on the next loop, 11 ch., fasten to the seventh of the last 10 ch., 2 ch., 1 p. downward (to do this crochet 5 ch., drop the last st. from the needle, insert the needle

(short double crochet), 2 dc., + 1 ch., 1 p. downward, 7 ch., fasten to the next seventh st. of the row of bars separated each by 2 ch. (see illustration), going back on six of the last 7 ch., work 1 point like that before described; repeat five times from +, then fasten to the middle st. of the fifth ch. scallop on the sixth mignardise scallop in the first medallion, 2 ch., fasten to the middle st. of the fourth ch. scallop on the same mignardise scallop; going back on the row of points, work 2 p., 1 ch., fasten to the same ch. on which the second dc. of the point crocheted last was worked (see illustration), + 1 ch., 1 p., 1 ch., fasten to the horizontal upper vein of the last dc. in the next point, which now appears vertical, 1 ch., 3 p., 1 ch., fasten on the same st. on which the last dc. of this point was worked; repeat five times from +, but in the last repetition, instead of the third p. crochet 3 ch.; then 2 ch., 1 sl. on the fourth loop of the fourth scallop in the second medallion, 2 ch., fasten to the first of the 3 ch. crocheted instead of the last p., 2 ch.; repeat five times from the last *, going forward. Having so far finished the work, crochet in the centre of the tidy a small star of leaflets as follows: 5 ch., fasten to the middle loop of two loops of the mignardise (see illustration), 4 ch., fasten to the first of the 5 ch., five times alternately 4 ch., fasten to the next middle loop of two loops of the mignardise; 4 ch., fasten to the same ch. to which the 4 ch. of the first leaflet were fastened. Finally, cut off the thread and fasten it.

Memorandum-Book with Loose Leaves.

See illustration on page 453.

THIS memorandum-book is made of card-board, covered with Russia leather. The upper lid is ornamented on the inside with a medallion of gray silk, on which the monogram is worked with gold thread and maroon silk, and the flowers in shaded gray silk. On the side edge of the lower lid fasten a band, which is designed to hold the lead-pencil. The leaves of the memorandum-book are only fastened together slightly on one end, and may be taken out separately.

Case for Turkish Tobacco and Cigarette Paper, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 453.

THIS case is made of brown silk, ornamented in point Russe embroidery with brown silk, and lined with oiled silk. To make the case cut of silk and net one piece from Fig. 29, Supplement, work button-hole stitches along the dotted line and through the middle of this piece with brown silk, and ornament this part with point Russe embroidery of the same silk as shown by the illustration. Work the monogram in satin and half-polka stitch; then cut of oiled silk one piece from Fig. 29 and two pieces from Fig. 31. The latter are bordered on the outer edge with long button-hole stitches of brown silk, and are fastened on the lining a quarter of an inch from the middle with similar stitches. Baste the embroidered silk on the lining, fold Fig. 29 on the inside along the dotted line, and border it all around with button-hole stitches. In working the button-hole stitches fasten on the soufflets cut of oiled silk from Fig. 30 according to the corresponding signs, which form the pockets seen in the illustration. One of these pockets serves to hold cigarette paper, and the other to contain Turkish tobacco. For this latter pocket cut of oiled silk a straight piece four inches and three-quarters long and three inches and a quarter wide, which is rounded off on one end. Border this part all along the outer edge with button-hole stitches of brown silk, at the same time fastening on each side a soufflet an inch and seven-eighths long, three-quarters of an inch wide, and rounded off on the under end. The projecting rounded end forms the flap of this pocket. An elastic band serves to close the case.

OLD MARGARET'S BOY.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

THERE are certain feminine instincts that assume in many eyes the character rather of virtues than of instincts, and the manifestation of which in any individual seems to touch all other women nearly.

Among these instincts, so to call them, is that maternal one which causes the year-old baby to hold her mother's needle-book or roll of work on her little breast and hush it off to sleep, which causes her half a dozen years afterward to wake up in the night and see if her doll is warm enough, and which, a score of years later yet, knits a tie between herself and every tender little child she sees. A strange tie, without the immense joy of a mother's love—that joy which compensates all suffering, which overflows the inner cells of the most desolate heart with vital warmth, which is fulfilled with satisfaction and with that ineffable yearning where earth touches close on heaven—a barren tie beside that divinely complete thing, and with more pain than pleasure in it. It is as if the bitter lot of women in this world caused them to feel the pathos of the fate of every child born into it, and gave them a pity that is all but love. "Little butterfly in the sunshine and among the flowers," it seems to say, "by-and-by night is coming, darkness and heavy dew and the night-hawk. If only I could protect you!"

Whenever I used to see a little bent old woman go by my window with a child in her arms, these and kindred thoughts would follow her. I did not know her name, and I could not see her face; but she interested me far more than the bright-cheeked and golden-haired young creatures that tripped by on their way from the finishing school. Her clean but utterly faded calico was so short that it showed the clumsy village ties and drab stockings of her knobby and rheumatic feet; her shawl was a threadbare black blanket; her bonnet was a rusty poke; an alpaca apron was her only vanity; her poor old hands were bare and bony and misshapen, but they seemed to me fairer than any idle lady's in the land when I saw the way in which they clasped the child she held, the way in which as she walked she used to pause and lift the child higher, and lay the little face against her own, and step off again as if she were young and happy. Day by day I saw her pass. As the child grew, and sat up in her arms and looked about, she would straighten her bent form to bear him more erectly. Often she would kiss him rapturously as she went along, and she was always crooning some low tune to him, or talking a loving gibberish that he seemed to understand. Evidently the child had no mother, perhaps no father either, for he was clothed in odds and ends: a great sacque and hood wrapped him for a long time, and when the spring came, his head emerged with the short yellow curls crowned by a hat that seemed to delight him, so often he tore it off with his little hands to look at it, and set it on again awry, but which she must have rescued from an ash-barrel, and have scoured, and trimmed with scraps of cambric from her rag bag. I longed to ask them in while they were slowly going by; but I have an uncomfortable reverence for reserves, and I fancied she was one of those who had rather suffer than be seen to suffer. But when the baby grew so heavy that she had to rest every little while, she sat down one day on my garden step, and then I opened the door to go out, and stopped and made friends with the child, and gave him a cup of milk and a cake, and began with her an acquaintance which if I do not in another life resume, it will be because I am not fit.

Years and years ago old Margaret Ewins had been young: it seems as though no one could guess the fact were it not plainly stated, so gray and wrinkled and seamed was the face with which she looked up at you. "Years and years ago," she said once. "It's hard to believe it now when you see me, child; but every wrinkle is a care, and every furrow is a tear! There were no wrinkles nor furrows, no cares nor tears—it was all fresh and blooming—when I married Stephen."

When she married Stephen! That was full forty years ago. And thirty years he had been under the sod. Doubtless his image had grown dimmer than once, but he was still to her the fine and noble fellow that won her heart. She forgot that she was a withered crone, that he was a handful of dust; she set her love beside his immortal youth, and looked forward to the end.

Stephen had left her with an only child, born on the day he died. Other children had come and been laid away before; but this girl was the last and the dearest of all. In her the father seemed to live and breathe again; for her the mother lived, indeed. She was a pretty thing as she grew into womanhood. Perhaps her mind was not altogether of the strongest; but one would have to be fastidious who paused to think of that in gazing at the red and white of her face, the clear blue of her great eyes, the gilding of her chestnut hair, her sweet and innocent mouth. Of course she had lovers, and of course there was a favored one—the least deserving of the whole, but the son of a family of vastly superior circumstances to her own.

For poor Bessie's circumstances were those which belong to the children of poverty and labor the world over. Her mother owned the little house in which they lived, and the larger part of which they rented to others; and for the rest they did sewing, nursing, clear-starching, whatever came to hand. But needy as they were, Bessy always had on a clean print dress, though she had to rise before day to wash and iron it; she always had a bright ribbon for her throat; she always looked as perfect as a rose.

And old Margaret's pride and joy lay in seeing her so. She wore her own brown gingham till it fell apart, so that Bessy might have a bishop's-lawn for summer Sundays. She pretended dire dyspepsias, and lived on crusts, so that Bessie might keep her blood sweet and rich with the little milk and meat there was. Long after Bessie had come home from her moon-lit stroll with the handsome and worthless James Falconer, Margaret sat over her needle or her Italian irons abridging the morrow's work, that Bessie's pretty shoulders might learn no stoop, or else turning an extra penny, that she might surprise Bessy with the bit of trimming for which she had heard the girl longing. Poor Margaret! she little knew the crop she sowed, nor recognized the fact that Bessy was becoming to herself as well as to her mother the chief person in the drama; she failed to see the springing and ripening selfishness in the girl, the willful spirit, the deadly love of finery, the lack of reason. She only saw her standing in the light and looking at her with her father's eyes—those burning blue eyes that seemed at once to revel in the brilliance of the world and scorn it too—and she felt that all she could have was not too much for her.

Still as she glanced from the window sometimes, and saw her by moonbeam or star-gleam leaning against the gate post, with James Falconer across the little wicket, as tall and dark and glittering as Lucifer, a misgiving would cross Margaret as to whether she was right in letting the thing go on; as to whether it was possible for young Falconer to stoop from his ancient degree and his father's place to marry this pretty clear-starcher. But then the child looked so bright and rosy and lovely as her mother gazed at her that she could but fold her hands above her beating heart and whisper to herself that all might be for the best, for stranger things had happened.

But the years went slowly wearing by, each one of them taking a degree of Bessy's bloom with it, and Bessy was old enough to know better, and still James Falconer followed her and did not marry her, and other lovers had fallen away, and the mother, through some hidden sense, was half aware that Bessy's name was spoken lightly. And one day Falconer had disappeared, leaving a defalcation behind him, and Bessy had gone too.

No search was made for the defaulter; a little of his father's wealth could repair the breach in the bank, and for his father's sake no suit was entered against him. Indeed, there were those who half excused him, and laid the blame on the shameless girl who had allured him, as they said, to his ruin. And certainly no search was made for Bessy. What could one feeble little old woman do? Nothing in the world, nothing but pray—pray over seam and stove, by day and night! "What am I crying for?" she would say, dashing away her tears. "God is on my side, and with Him on my side, am I going to lose? No; Bessy will come back to me!"

And so for five years she toiled and moiled—not for herself, but that when Bessy came home there might be something laid by to let rest and comfort greet her. And every night she swept the hearth and brightened the lamp for her, and every morning she made the place spotless, thinking it might hold Bessy before night. And her eyes longed and her heart ached and her hands trembled to see her. Her expectation was always at fever heat. She hardly knew that the tears wet her pillow at night, such comfort was there in the thought that Bessy might come home to-morrow.

Five long, lonesome years! If old Margaret were sick, there was no one to soothe her; if if she were cast down, there was no one to cheer her. But she clasped a sure faith; her hope brightened her days; and one night, as she had forefelt, Bessy came home. A weary woman got down from the stage, and tottered up the yard, and came in, and fell upon the floor, and in the night her boy was born, and in the morning consciousness seemed to come back an instant; for she looked up into her mother's face with those blue eyes, and half smiled—Margaret always said it was a smile—and died; and all without one word. Without a word! And if she could but have spoken—for there was no ring on her finger!

Five long, lonesome years—and just for this! Poor Margaret had no tears. A fierce, dry anger with her fate burned them away at their source. Now, indeed, she was wretched. In those five years she saw she had been happy—happy with her hope. She took the child, and cared for it mechanically; she laid it down between whiles as she went about her work, and suffered it to cry if it would. "Let it cry!" she said. "It is James Falconer's child. Crying is too good for it." But once, as the little thing was sobbing, she went to it, and saw the great tears shining in its blue eyes. "Ah, it is Bessy's child!" she cried. "I have been a cruel wretch!" And she caught it up and warmed it at her heart, and anger and grief went together; and thenceforth she was bound in the child. "I would have treated an outcast better," she sobbed at last. "Ah, my poor little lad, with such a life before him!"

And so she lived and strived, and had no other end in view than the well-being of little Steve, as she had named him. For him now she sat up at night, as she had sat up for his mother; for him she denied herself as of old. That came natural enough. It seemed to her, she said to herself, as if she were doing still for Bessy. All she had laid by during the five years went in Bessy's burial. Anxious to have something beforehand again, in case of her own illness, or in preparation for little Steve's future jacket and trowsers or schooling, she spared herself no pains. Her eyesight had failed so, what with years and what with tears, that she could no longer do fine sewing or starching. She was obliged to go out to the rougher labor of the tub, and another old woman from the other part of the house—too old, indeed, for any thing but to hinder the baby from rolling off the bed—used to come in and keep watch for her while her poor old arms were in the suds. But people hardly liked to employ her, not only because she could not see well, but because it seemed as if they had better be doing the work themselves than imposing it upon that gray-headed woman. Her proud, keen spirit felt that it was more in charity than any thing else that she was hired at all. And she hailed the fact as if a miracle had been wrought in her behalf when rents grew so dear in the town that she was at liberty to receive twenty-five dollars more a year on the other part of her little house, of which she now reserved but one room and a closet for herself; and so was allowed to leave the wash-tub.

Thus on one hundred dollars a year old Margaret lived and reared her child. It is that which seems the miracle to you; but her wants were very few, and she was not uncomfortable. She asked no aid of any for little Steve—least of all of the Falconers, who never knew from her that such a child existed. Her bread and milk was all he wanted as yet, and he wore, as I have said, almost any thing. The Old Ladies' Society of the town gave her a monthly allowance of good Oolong tea, and she accepted it as a public benefit of the same nature as the streets to walk on, or the use of the corner pump, or the ringing of the nine-o'clock bell, to none of which she contributed tax-money. And now, with nothing to do but to keep her two rooms and her two people clean, to teach little Steve his first steps and his first words, she abandoned herself to her first real bliss in years, and when I was pitying her most she was needing it least. Her first real bliss, for not a fear disturbed it. "God takes care of the sparrows," she would say. "And he will take care of little Steve."

"But when he is bigger," croaked the old grandam from the other part of the house, nearly as fond herself of the boy as Margaret was, though quite disapproving Margaret's devotion, "he will want different food from your bread and milk. He will need red meat, and where is he to get it?"

"Where the young lions get theirs," said Margaret, and went on joyously; and it was in these days that first I saw her, taking her morning and her afternoon walk with the child in her arms, talking gayly to him all the time, and kissing him at every other step.

What visions she had of little Steve's future, and how she used to confide them to the child as they went! And the boy would lift his little hand and pat her cheek approvingly, as if he understood them all, and give her now and then a great wet kiss of his rosy mouth in return—a kiss that knew no difference between her shriveled yellow cheek and the blushing velvet of youth.

How, after her hard experience of life, Margaret could have had such a thing as a vision, passes conjecture; but she was so light-hearted in her love that she believed in every thing that another might have seen to be impossible and unattainable. The clothes which little Steve was to wear when he went to school; the errands he was to run in order to get the money to buy the clothes; the school to which he was to go—no common school at all, but one where her care of the rooms was to balance his termbill; the prizes he was to win; the day he was to graduate and speak his piece, and be applauded by the people and be mentioned in the Morning Herald next day; the apprenticeship he was to serve in a lawyer's office; the cases he was some day to plead; the lives he was then to save; the good, the glory; and by-and-by President—what a dazzling structure it was that she built up on the foundation of her little span of life and strength! And meanwhile, as she waited for the time when all these things should be accomplishing, she took her pleasure in the boy.

Perhaps Bessy's babyhood had been as lovely, her tongue as apt, her feelings as quick, as little Steve's were now; but Margaret had had no time then to enjoy any of it all—now she had nothing else to do. It seemed to her that no cherub slumbering in beds of amaranth and asphodel inside the sculptured gates of heaven could be so beautiful as little Steve was with the dew of sleep upon him as he lay on the old patchwork quilt. The day that the boy laughed heartily and intelligently she felt that she had assisted at a fresh creation of the human soul; and to her mind nothing more remarkable in the record of the race had ever occurred than the first articulate sound that little Steve uttered. His recognition of herself was an ever-recurring miracle; she snatched him up each time and covered him with kisses, as if it needed a special act of gratitude; the detestable old cat from whose back he pulled a handful of hair became a sacred being—she wondered that the cat did not like it: he was welcome to as many handfuls of her own gray hair as he would take! "Do not talk about this earth's being a dark place!" she cried, to the old grandam of the other part of the house, "for it seems to me as bright as the sun itself! It must be bright when all the children that are born meet it with such a gay heart. I used to pity them all. But now—look at him! he smiles at every body, all the world are friends—it is beautiful! The angels must feel just so. Oh, you don't think, do you, that he is too bright and good to live? Oh, my darling!" she would cry, that single gleam of trouble bringing back the one dark thought of her life, "if I only knew that you had a right to the name you bear!"

And so the days passed on, each one a festival, each new one bringing a new feat of little Steve's to be shown and admired and praised. The child thrived and prospered, and more and more with each day the little old woman seemed to become a child with him. They used often now to come in and see me. I had the children's deserted toys for little Steve, that delighted him; and there were others which could not be taken away, such as the great music-box, and the aquarium, and the fernery, over which he hung spell-bound; and I had certain innocent dainties whose whereabouts he early learned to know; and when he twisted his little lips into coaxing kisses on the air between, his grandmother, proud as she was, could not resist the child's insistence to be brought across the street to me.

The sight of age is always a pathetic sight to the young and strong, especially of age forgetting its miseries and the near grave in the love of others; but there was something exquisitely pathetic in the sight of this little old creature lugging the heavy child about, none the less so for her unconsciousness of it. Once, when she saw a shadow of the thought on my face, "Don't you pity me!" she cried; "I am too happy for that! Keep your pity for the old women that are not grandmothers!"

"You set too much by the boy, Margaret," said the grandam, who had walked out with her that morning. "What if he should be taken from you?"

"What if he should be taken from me?" she repeated, opening her sunken eyes as if they had never seen the possibility before. "Well, then, I should go too! It couldn't be for long. But no, no; he is as stout and healthy as he is bright and handsome. I only pray not to be taken myself till he can spare me!"

Poor old Margaret! It was well for her that she enjoyed herself while the sun shone, for the darkness was coming soon enough.

One day, just as little Steve came out of his bath, and, running away from her, was toddling about the room, his little body shining with the water-drops, his curls dripping in wet, bright rings, there was heard a man's foot on the step and in the entry, a rap on the door, and the visitor had come in unbidden and stood before her.

It was James Falconer.

"I have come for my boy," said he.

Margaret, risen to fetch the child, staggered and fell back upon her seat, and caught little Steve and clutched him closely. She trembled from head to foot; but she glared back at her enemy like a lioness defending her whelp.

"I suppose you do not deny that he is my child?" said the visitor, no longer the dark and handsome youth, but a worn and haggard man.

"He is his mother's child," said Margaret, hoarsely; "and so mine. There was no ring on Bessy's finger!"

Falconer paused a moment and gazed at the boy; and the boy, full of roguish glee and kindliness, looked archly up at him, and kissed the air after the pretty fashion that he had. "Yes, he is Bessy's boy fast enough," said the man. "And he is mine too, you will have to understand. And I have come to get him!"

"Go away, James Falconer!" cried Margaret, "or I will set the law on you!"

"There is no law to set on me," he said. "There is no law for me, except the law that gives a man his child, born in honest wedlock."

Margaret blanched as she heard him. Her heart rose and sank, and sent a pulse over her in hot waves. To clear Bessy's name from stain! But at such a price! Was it, was it possible? She looked at the vanishing ambrotype that, framed in its wreath of dead roses, hung beneath the clock—the bright, beautiful face with the smile.

"Was he?" she whispered, presently—"was he born so? Was my Bessy a lawful wife?" He nodded. "Do you swear to it, James Falconer? Will you publish it in the Morning Herald?" She ran and brought her Bible, over which she had sat so many a night spelling out the big type that promised blessings to the widow and the fatherless. She held it out at arm's-length. "Kiss the book!" she exclaimed, "and swear it all." James Falconer bent his head and kissed the book. "Then you can take the boy," she said. "But take him quickly, before it breaks my heart!" And the man went his way with his own. "Oh, Bessy! Bessy!" she cried, as the door closed and left her all alone, "you bright and careless girl, what an awful price have I paid for your good name! I have sold my little Steve, his hopes, his future, his life and soul, to that man—to that man and to evil!"

That night the old grandam fumbled at Margaret's latch to come in, according to her custom, for a social gossip in the twilight. Margaret did not answer her. She opened the door, and saw her lying on the bed.

"I've had a stroke!" was all that Margaret said, as the other old woman bent over her—"I've had a stroke!"

"God bless me! The palsy! We'll have the doctor here—"

"Oh no, it's not that," murmured Margaret. "But just the heart is dead within me."

The next day the poor soul did not attempt to rise. She lay there, with the Morning Herald, in which, at last, was printed the day and date of Bessy's marriage, nearly seven years ago, spread out upon the pillow, as if in little Steve's place. To them that would have ministered to her she seemed in a stupor till she lifted her eyes, as wild and suffering as those of a dumb creature in mortal pain. She did not listen to what any body said; she did not speak herself; she tasted the nourishment that was brought, and turned away—the tide of life was ebbing out, and she was letting go her hold upon the earth that had grown worthless to her. She lay in that half-dream, and whether we came in or out she neither knew nor cared. Once only she spoke—sighed rather than spoke. "That is right," she said. "Punish me!—punish me well for ever having dared to doubt my Bessy!"

But, Sunday morning, just as the great first flush of the dawn came into the room, and all the air rippled with the tumultuous music of the birds, Margaret sat up in bed, and looked at the morning-star sinking back into the rose and golden glory. It cast the shadow of the window-sash in a long dark cross upon her bed. She glanced at the shadow, and faintly smiled—the brighter light would soon efface the shadow, soon she would lay her cross aside! And the cross paled, and faded, and was gone; and then, as a child's voice somewhere in the distance sweetly and shrilly joined the chorus of the birds, she shivered, and her head fell forward and dropped upon her breast—and the dawn came slowly and softly up and shed a silver splendor round the poor old head, and showed us that Margaret had passed into the fuller day.

THE CLEMATIS FAMILY.

THIS family of plants is one of the most desirable we have for the decoration of our gardens, and as light, airy, graceful climbers we have nothing that can be substituted for them. They are nearly all quite hardy, but the Chinese and Japanese species require to be sheltered from the northerly and westerly winds. As they are not very strong growers, it is a good plan to lay them down on the ground after the ground is frozen, and cover them with leaves to a thickness of two or three inches, or with cedar or other evergreen branches. North of the Highlands it might be advisable to do so with nearly all of them, but south of Philadelphia it is not necessary to cover them at all. A very pretty effect is produced with the Chinese and Japanese species by letting them remain on the ground, and pegging down their stems with little hooked pegs cut from small brush-wood; their large colored flowers show to great advantage in this way, and produce a brilliant effect. All the species will grow in a good rich garden soil.

The selections which we make are made from over a hundred and thirty species and varieties, and comprise the finest, most showy, and desirable.

Clematis flammula; flowers white, in large panicles, very fragrant; blooms in July and August. It is a rapid grower, attaining a height of eighteen or twenty feet. There is a variety of this species known as C. rubella, which has somewhat larger flowers, tinted on the outside with rose-color, and blooming in September and October. C. paniculata, a species from Japan, very much resembles this species in the size, form, color, and fragrance of the flowers. It blooms in July.

C. vitalba; flowers white, almond-scented; a strong-growing species, very suitable for planting in shrubberies, where it will run over the shrubs or low trees, completely enveloping them. Our native species, C. virginiana, so strongly resembles this that by some it is considered to be only a variety. C. catesbyana, another native species, also resembles it. They bloom in July and August.

C. viorna, a native species, with bell-shaped flowers about the size of large acorns; the points of the sepals are reflexed; of a reddish-lilac color on the outside, and pale green within. The stems of this species are generally sub-ligneous, and are thrown up annually from the root. It is a very pretty species for training on a light frame-work of wire or similar material. Flowers in August.

C. viticella; grows to the height of ten or fifteen feet; the flowers are large and spreading, with long footstalks, and vary in color from blue to purple and red. There is a double-flowered variety with double blue flowers; it is more robust and stronger growing than the single-flowered, but produces fewer shoots. This species and its varieties are quite ligneous, and, like C. viorna, should be planted so as to cover a frame or trellis work of light wire; such as is used for keeping out rabbits from plantations, and which has meshes from two and a half to four inches square, and can be bought at the wire-workers' by the yard, is well adapted for this class. Flowers from June to September.

C. florida, a species from Japan, with large white flowers, measuring from three to four inches across, and growing about fifteen feet high. It is not very ligneous, and when cut down to the ground annually will throw up strong shoots, and produce very fine flowers. There is also a double-flowered variety, and another known variously as C. florida sieboldii, C. sieboldii, and C. bicolor, in which the large, white, spreading sepals inclose a number of small petals of a purple or violet color. C. florida standishii is a splendid new variety, also from Japan, with flowers of a violet-blue color shaded with crimson; it is one of the very best. They bloom in June.

C. azurea, otherwise known as C. patens and C. cærulea, is from Japan; grows about ten feet high, producing azure-blue flowers about three inches in diameter. From this species several varieties and hybrids have been produced, the principal of which are C. azurea grandiflora, the flowers of which are much larger than those of the species, C. sophia, with large lilac and white flowers, and C. helene, with large creamy white flowers. There is also a double-flowered variety. They bloom in May and June.

C. lanuginosa is a very large-flowered species, the flower-buds being very woolly; hence the specific name. The flowers are of a grayish-blue color. It is a native of China, and grows about eight feet high. There is also a white-flowered variety. They bloom in June.

C. hendersonii is a strong-growing species, with pendent, bell-shaped flowers, growing in threes, of a fine violet-blue color. This is a very suitable species for training over verandas, pilasters, etc. It will attain a height of twenty feet, flowering in June.

C. montana, a Himalayan species of strong, robust growth; the flowers are white, slightly stained with pink, about two inches in diameter, and sweet-scented. It flowers in May.

Of late years a large number of hybrid varieties have been raised abroad, particularly in England. The species from which they have been mostly derived are C. lanuginosa, C. azurea, and C. hendersonii. Some of them are as yet scarce and high-priced. Among the best of them are the following:

C. jackmanii; the flowers are large, of a rich crimson-purple color. It is quite hardy, a profuse bloomer, and very desirable. C. Princess of Wales; flowers of a rich violet-purple color, with a red bar down the centre of each petal. C. rubroviolacea, similar to C. jackmanii, has reddish-violet flowers five inches in diameter, of a rich velvety appearance. C. rubella, with deep claret-colored flowers, which frequently have six petals. C. atropurpurea has large crimson-blue flowers. C. Lady Bovill, a free grower and bloomer; the flowers are of a lavender-blue color. C. Jeanne d'Arc is a vigorous grower; the flowers are large, white, with three pale blue stripes in each petal. C. I. G. Veitch is a double-flowered variety, with flowers four inches across, of a light blue color; it is a free bloomer. C. Fortunei is a Japanese variety, with double white, large, fragrant flowers.

In addition to the above climbing species there are also some herbaceous, upright-growing ones, the best of which are C. integrifolia, with large bell-shaped flowers of a fine blue color, growing about two feet high, and blooming in June and August. C. erecta, with small white flowers, in large panicles, blooming in May and June, and sometimes producing a second crop of flowers in August. The flowers of this species are very serviceable in making bouquets. There is a double-flowered variety, but it is very rare, C. tubulosa, growing about three feet high, with tubulate flowers resembling hyacinths; color violet-blue. The foliage of this species is very large and fine. It blooms in August and September.

DISAPPOINTED.

In the opera-house on the first of May,
While Patti's notes were ringing,
As cold and fair as a statue there
She sat amid the singing,
With a cross of care on her beauty rare
Its bitter shadow flinging.

There were jewels of light in her locks of gold,
Wet jewels on her lashes.
You could not tell, look ever so well,
Which gleamed in brighter flashes,
The gem to sell, or the tear that fell,
As grief on grandeur clashes.

For that single night in the sad, slow year
The weary heart had waited;
And she kept that night in her constant sight
On throne inviolated;
When her trusty knight his love could plight,
And prove it unabated.

Oh, trysting forgotten! Oh, watch all in vain!
While Patti's notes are swelling.
He has thrown away, in his careless play,
That love all love excelling;
And the first of May is a barren day,
Of Love's entombment telling.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

OVER twelve hundred boys and girls enjoyed a happy holiday on the occasion of the first picnic of the season arranged by the managers of the Children's Excursion Fund. This flock of little folks was gathered from seven industrial and mission schools under the charge of the Children's Aid Society. They were accompanied by their teachers and many ladies and gentlemen who were interested in the systematic efforts being made to give fresh air, recreation, and pleasure to the young children of the poor and unfortunate. On this occasion the trip was up the beautiful Hudson to Excelsior Park, opposite Yonkers; and while sailing in the barge and roaming through the grove, while eating and dancing and plucking flowers and leaves, the faces of these poor children showed an intensity of enjoyment rarely witnessed. They abandoned themselves to the present joy, unmindful of the toil, suffering, and weariness that a speedy future might bring. Ample provision was made for feeding the little multitude—bread, French rolls, ice-cream, fresh milk, sponge-cake, beef, ham, tongue, butter, ice, sugar, and lemons. Every child was well fed, and, what is more, well taken care of. Various articles were purchased for use on this occasion which will be equally available on future occasions. It was estimated that the actual expense for each child was less than fifty cents. The pleasure will be long remembered by all of them.

The new Post-office, in the City Hall Park, will be as nearly fire-proof as is possible. The only materials used in its construction are granite, iron, brick, and glass. The roof will be of copper; and as work is now rapidly progressing on the fourth story, it is expected that the building will be ready for roofing by next October. The land on which the Post-office stands being a triangle, the architectural labor has been greater than it would have been otherwise; and as every side of it is equally exposed, the decorations have every where been of equal importance. About an acre and a quarter of land is covered by the building, which, even in its present incomplete condition, conveys the impression of solid and massive strength. The building will doubtless be finished in the early part of 1874.

For more than twenty years an elephant has held an abiding-place in the Zoological Gardens of Marseilles. The municipal authorities have sold him several times, but whenever arrangements were about to be made for delivering the article to the purchaser, the article positively refused to move. Doubtless he has become attached to his long-time abode. But the affair is becoming awkward, and the authorities have lost all patience with their stubborn pensioner.

One of the latest invented remedies for the diseases to which this poor mortal frame is subject is the application of a bag of ice to the spinal column. An Englishman, one Dr. Chapman, made the discovery, and we understand that it is a specific for all pain. We doubt the popularity of this treatment in January, but amidst the oppressive heat of midsummer one might lie down to pleasant dreams on an ice-bag.

The Japanese language is not easily learned. The progress in knowledge is slow and imperceptible; but after a long time the student may find himself taking pleasure in Japanese poetry. The two following sonnets give some idea of the feelings of this people:

"Kari no yo wo
Kari no yo ja tote,
Ada ni suna;
Kari no yo bakari
Ono ga yo nareba."

"While you call this world by its fleeting name, do not think of it as a trifle. And why? Because this fleeting world is your only world."

"Yo no naka ni
Hana mo momiji mo
Kin-gin mo
Atayete aru zo;
Sei-dashite tore.

"In this world are endless gifts, from the beauties of nature even unto wealth. Putting forth your strength, grasp them."

One of the nicest little inventions of the time is a patent bath-tub for birds. Every one who has had any experience in taking care of cage birds knows how shy they are in performing their ablutions. Now they will be no longer obliged to wash themselves in public. The new bath-tub is open at one end only, being covered by a hood. The bird is secure from curious eyes, and does not spatter the cage.

A dweller upon Kansas prairie plains, who is evidently in a good condition of body, recounts, for the benefit of unfortunate residents in more eastern sections of the country, the delicacies upon which he and his wife—not to mention the baby—subsisted for a week, at a grand total expense of $1 92¾. At the risk of arousing envious feelings, we mention briefly the articles consumed each day: Monday—venison-steak, tomatoes, brown bread, coffee, milk, omelet, tea, white bread; Tuesday—rabbit, bread, coffee, quails, potatoes, onions: Wednesday—roasted beaver, coffee, prairie-chickens, potatoes, bread, tea; Thursday—rabbit, bread, coffee, quails, tea, potatoes, onions, eggs, pudding; Friday—venison, with grape jelly, bread, coffee, beaver-tail soup, etc.; Saturday—omelet, coffee, bread, prairie-chickens, apple-pie; Sunday—eggs, coffee, bread, tea, and toast. It should be mentioned that there was no lack of butter or milk on any day. Also, it should be stated that the cost of the game is reckoned by the expenditure of powder and shot necessary to obtain it, while eggs, butter, etc., are reckoned at "store" prices. We expect there will be a rush for Kansas immediately.

At Vienna there is a firm which advertises to supply "English refreshments" in "English style." The arrangement is not, however, so entirely English as it might be. For example, on a certain "dai" the bill of fare includes "Sir Loine of beef," "Chees and salade," "Sherries gobblers," and "Pastry aux fruits." The young women who do the waiting in this establishment are arrayed in an exaggerated style of dress, which can scarcely give intelligent foreigners a correct notion of the way things are done in England or America.

The average amount of nitro-glycerine employed in the improvements at Hurl Gate is one thousand pounds a month. The present rate of tunneling is about 250 feet monthly, involving the removal on an average of 950 cubic yards of rock.

Lady Palmerston must have been a woman of rare wisdom. It is said of her that no one ever knew from or through her what Lord Palmerston did not wish to be known. She always understood full well what she was telling, to whom she was telling it, when and where it would be repeated, and whether the repetition would do good or harm. She had wonderful tact, which was of immense service to the great statesman; and long experience had taught him that her intuitions were infallible in various matters. If some communication made to her particularly impressed itself upon her, she would say, "You must write that down, and I will show it to Lord Palmerston when he comes in; or stay, perhaps he has not gone out." A simple message, verbal or written, sent to him thus was always immediately answered. He had learned the value of her tact and penetration.

The Court Journal says: "The Japanese have decided to call six days of their new week Light, Moon, Fire, Water, Metal, and Earth. What do they mean to call the other day? Perhaps Heaven on the seventh would not be bad."

Scene in an Ohio smoking-car. Enter woman with poodle-dog. Deposits her companion on one seat, turns another seat, and sits facing the canine. Conductor soon appears, and advises her to find accommodations in another car which is not devoted to smokers. She prefers to remain, saying her presence would deter the occupants from the use of the weed. Gentleman in front of her presently produces his cigar, and commences puffing. The woman becomes aggravated. By a sudden strategic movement she wrests the cigar from his mouth and throws it out the window, exclaiming, "If there is any thing I do hate, it is tobacco-smoke!" Passengers are convulsed with laughter. Insulted gentleman is imperturbably grave. He calmly rises, reaches over the seat, takes the poodle by the neck, throws it out the window as far as possible, saying, "If there is any thing I do hate, it is a poodle-dog!"

Dr. Merle d'Aubigné, author of the History of the Reformation, received, when living, only a small salary as professor in the theological seminary at Geneva. He left but little property, and his widow and four children are without adequate means of support and education. An appeal in their behalf has been made in this country.

Why not settle the mooted question, "How to make tea," by allowing every lady to have it made or to make it her own way in her own house? One says tea must never be boiled, another thinks it must be slowly boiled five or ten minutes, and the subject is a constant matter of discussion. Let every one make her own tea as she likes it best.

The Charleston News makes some statements concerning cholera which are of general interest. When Asiatic cholera first made its appearance in this country, it did not extend to that city. In 1832 a vessel having cholera on board ran ashore on Light-house Island. The vessel was burned, and the crew sent to the Lazaretto. One of the crew, however, escaped, and went to Charleston, where he died of Asiatic cholera of the worst type. The body was visited and examined by hundreds of curious persons, but there was not a single new case of cholera. Cholera broke out some years later in the western part of the city, when the cholera epidemic was a thousand miles distant. The cases were easily controlled, and were believed to be due to the rotting of garbage. Various theories have been suggested to account for the freedom of Charleston from cholera epidemics. The most plausible hypothesis is that the general use of cistern water is unfavorable to the development of the disease. This view finds confirmation in the fact that while the cholera raged in Nashville, where limestone water was used, there was not a single case in a part of the street on the hill-side where cistern water only was drunk.

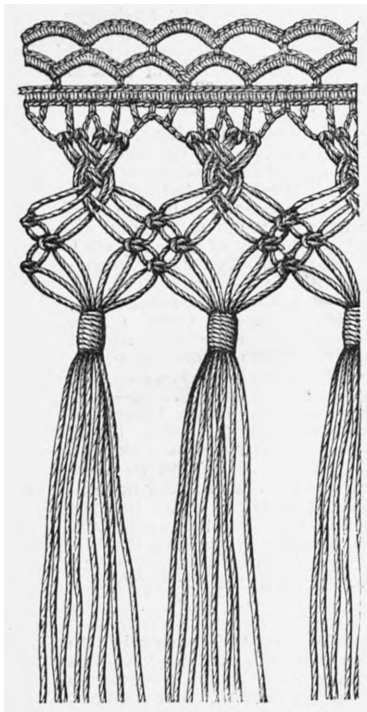

Fig. 1.—KNOTTED, PLAITED, AND CROCHET FRINGE FOR COVERS, ETC.

Knotted, Plaited, and Crochet Fringe for Covers, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE fringes may be made of worsted, silk, or twisted cotton. For the upper edge of the fringe Fig. 1 crochet, first, on a ch. (chain stitch) foundation of the requisite length one round of sc. (single crochet), then on the same side 4 rounds more in the following manner: 2d round.—Always alternately 8 ch., pass over 7 st. (stitch) of the preceding round, 1 sc. (single crochet) on the next st. 3d round.—On each ch. scallop of the preceding round work 11 sc. 4th and 5th rounds.—Like the 2d and 3d rounds, observing the illustration. Then crochet on the other side of the foundation one round more as follows: 1 sc. on the next st., ∗ 1 ch., 1 dc. (double crochet) on the third following st., 4 ch., 1 stc. (short treble crochet) on the third following st., 4 ch., 1 sc. on the third following st., 4 ch., 1 stc. on the third following st., 4 ch., 1 dc. on the third following st., 1 ch., 1 sc. on the third following st., and repeat from ∗. Into the last of the crochet rounds tie threads 12 inches long and laid double, as shown by the illustration; with these threads work, first, the plaiting and then the knotting, observing the illustration. Finally, knot together always four of the fringe strands, and cut the ends even after finishing the knotting.

Fig. 2.—To make this fringe use gimp like that shown by Figs. 2 and 3, page 293, Harper's Bazar, No. 19, Vol. VI. Crochet first on one side of the gimp two rounds for the upper edge as follows: 1st round.—4 sc. on the next loop of the gimp, then always alternately 10 ch., 4 sc. on the second following loop. 2d round.—On each ch. scallop of the preceding round work 13 sc. On the other side of the gimp tie fringe strands of the requisite length into each loop; divide these strands, loop them, and knot them together as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 3.—TULLE, LACE, AND RIBBON DRESS CAP. For the crown of this cap cut of double stiff lace one whole piece from Fig. 25, Supplement, wire it all around, and border the front edge with gathered lace two inches wide. Cut of figured white silk tulle a straight piece two inches and seven-eighths wide, and nine inches and three-quarters long. Trim this piece through the middle with insertion an inch wide, and along the outer edge, excepting the top, with lace two inches and seven-eighths wide. Sew the tulle trimmed in this manner on the back edge of the crown. The trimming for the cap, which is set on as shown by the illustration, consists of lace two inches wide, loops and ends of pink gros grain ribbon two inches and a half wide, and olive gros grain ribbon of the same width, and a bunch of pink roses and white flowers.

Border for Under-Sleeves, Covers, etc.—Venetian Embroidery.—[See illustration on page 456.]

THIS border is worked on fine linen to which the design has been transferred. First run the outlines of the design with cotton, then work the button-hole stitch bars as shown by the illustration, in doing which make a picot at each corresponding point. Border the design figures with button-hole stitches, and underlay the broader and more raised part of the button-hole stitch edge more thickly along the outlines. After finishing the embroidery, cut away the material underneath the button-hole stitch bars along the outlines, observing the illustration.

flap of the main piece is ornamented on the outside with a medallion, which is worked on a foundation of brown cloth in the design given by Fig. 32, Supplement, with soutache of the same color. The back of the main piece is furnished on the inside, as shown by Fig. 1, with pockets of different sizes. These pockets are furnished with a brass lock, and with buttons and button-holes, for closing. On the outside of the back of the main piece sew leather bands furnished with rings. Through these rings run a strap of the requisite length, which is slung across the shoulder in carrying the bag.

A CONFESSION.

I MET her on the cars to-day—
I've often met her there before.
She has an arch, enchanting way
Which women envy, men adore.

She is not young—no more am I!
Indeed, my beard is white as snow;
But Time has slyly passed her by,
Nor left a wrinkle on her brow.

Her eyes are blue as heaven's blue;
Her forehead with the lily vies;
Her cheeks have caught the roses' hue,
Her hair the sunsets' golden dyes.

We meet and chat, and when we part
Perhaps we kiss, but neither tells!
And then for hours within my heart
There's music sweet as chiming bells.

Our talk's not of indifferent things—
Of books and pictures, birds and flowers—
But things akin to wedding-rings,
Of boys and business, girls and dowers.

Indeed, it is most grave and staid,
As doth become our time of life;
For we are passing into shade,
And I'm her husband, she's my wife.

LADY ANNA.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE JOURNEY HOME.

IN absolute silence Lord Lovel and Lady Anna walked back to the inn. He had been dumfounded—nearly so by her first abrupt statement, and then altogether by the arguments with which she had defended herself. She had nothing further to say. She had, indeed, said all, and had marveled at her own eloquence while she was speaking. Nor was there absent from her a certain pride in that she had done the thing that was right, and had dared to defend herself. She was full of regrets—almost of remorse—but nevertheless she was proud. He knew it all now, and one of her great difficulties had been overcome.

And she was fully resolved that as she had dared to tell him, and to face his anger, his reproaches, his scorn, she would not falter before the scorn and the reproaches, or the anger, of the other Lovels—of any of the Lovels of Yoxham. Her mother's reproaches would be dreadful to her; her mother's anger would well-nigh kill her; her mother's scorn would scorch her very soul. But sufficient for the day was the evil thereof. At the present moment she could be strong with the strength she had assumed; so she walked in at the sitting-room window with a bold front, and the Earl followed her. The two aunts were there, and it was plain to them both that something was astray between the lovers. They had said among themselves that Lady Anna would accept the offer the moment that it was in form made to her. To their eyes the manner of their guest had been the manner of a girl eager to be wooed; but they had both imagined that their delicately nurtured and fastidious nephew might possibly be offended by some solecism in conduct, some falling away from feminine grace, such as might too probably be shown by one whose early life had been subjected to rough associates. Even now it occurred to each of them that it had been so. The Earl seated himself in a chair, and took up a book which they had brought with them. Lady Anna stood at the open window, looking across at the broad field and the river-bank beyond; but neither of them spoke a word. There had certainly been some quarrel. Then Aunt Julia, in the cause of wisdom, asked a question:

"Where is Minnie? Did not Minnie go with you?"

"No," said the Earl. "She went in some other direction at my bidding. Mr. Cross is with her, I suppose." It was evident from the tone of his voice that the displeasure of the head of all the Lovels was very great.

"We start soon, I suppose?" said Lady Anna.

"After lunch, my dear; it is hardly one yet."

"I will go up all the same, and see about my things."

"Shall I help you, my dear?" asked Mrs. Lovel.

"Oh no! I would sooner do it alone."

Then she hurried into her room, and burst into a flood of tears as soon as the door was closed behind her.

"Frederic, what ails her?" asked Aunt Julia.

"If any thing ails her she must tell you herself," said the lord.

"Something is amiss. You can not wonder that we should be anxious, knowing that we know how great is the importance of all this."

"I can not help your anxiety just at present, Aunt Julia; but you should always remember that there will be slips between the cup and the lip."

"Then there has been a slip? I knew it would be so. I always said so, and so did my brother."

"I wish you would all remember that about such an affair as this the less said the better." So saying, the lord walked out through the window and sauntered down to the river-side.

"It's all over," said Aunt Julia.

"I don't see why we should suppose that at present," said Aunt Jane.

"It's all over. I knew it as soon as I saw her face when she came in. She has said something, or done something, and it's all off. It will be a matter of over twenty thousand pounds a year!"

"He'll be sure to marry somebody with money," said Aunt Jane. "What with his title and his being so handsome, he is certain to do well, you know."

"There's nothing like that going. I heard Mr. Flick say that it was equal to half a million of money. And then it would have been at once. If he goes up to London, and about, just as he is, he'll be head over ears in debt before any body knows what he is doing. I wonder what it is. He likes pretty girls, and there's no denying that she's handsome."

"Perhaps she wouldn't have him."

"That's impossible, Jane. She came down here on purpose to have him. She went out with him this morning to be made love to. They were together three times longer yesterday, and he came home as sweet as sugar to her. I wonder whether she can have wanted to make some condition about the money."

"What condition?"

"That she and her mother should have it in their own keeping."

"She doesn't seem to be that sort of a young woman," said Aunt Jane.

"There's no knowing what that Mr. Goffe, Sergeant Bluestone, and her mother may have put her up to. Frederic wouldn't stand that kind of thing for a minute, and he would be quite right. Better any thing than that a man shouldn't be his own master. I think you'd better go up to her, Jane; she'll be more comfortable with you than with me." Then Aunt Jane, obedient as usual, went up to her young cousin's bedroom.

In the mean time the young lord was standing on the river's brink, thinking what he would do. He had, in truth, very much of which to think, and points of most vital importance, as to which he must resolve what should be his action. Must this announcement which he had heard from his cousin dissolve forever the prospect of his marriage with her; or was it open to him still, as a nobleman, a gentleman, and a man of honor, to make use of all those influences which he might command, with the view of getting rid of that impediment of a previous engagement? Being very ignorant of the world at large, and altogether ignorant of this man in particular, he did not doubt that the tailor might be bought off. Then he was sure that all who would have access to the Lady Anna would help him in such a cause, and that her own mother would be the most forward to do so. The girl would hardly hold to such a purpose if all the world, all her own world, were against her. She certainly would be beaten from it if a bribe sufficient were offered to the tailor. That this must be done for the sake of the Lovel family, so that the Lady Anna Lovel might not be known to have married a tailor, was beyond a doubt; but it was not so clear to him that he could take to himself as his countess her who with her own lips had told him that she intended to be the bride of a working artisan. As he thought of this, as his imagination went to work on all the abominable circumstances of such a betrothal, he threw from his hand into the stream with all the vehemence of passion a little twig which he held. It was too, too frightful, too disgusting; and then so absolutely unexpected, so unlike her personal demeanor, so contrary to the look of her eyes, to the tone of her voice, to every motion of her body! She had been sweet and gentle and gracious, till he had almost come to think that her natural feminine gifts of ladyship were more even than her wealth, of better savor than her rank, were equal even to her beauty, which he had sworn to himself during the past night to be unsurpassed. And this sweet one had told him—this one so soft and gracious—not that she was doomed by some hard fate to undergo the degrading thralldom, but that she herself had willingly given herself to a working tailor from love and gratitude and free selection! It was a marvel to him that a thing so delicate should have so little sense of her own delicacy! He did not think that he could condescend to take the tailor's place.

But if not—if he would not take it, or if, as might still be possible, the tailor's place could not be made vacant for him—what then? He had pledged his belief in the justice of his cousin's claim; and had told her that, believing his own claim to be unjust, in no case would he prosecute it. Was he now bound by that assurance—bound to it even to the making of the tailor's fortune; or might he absent himself from any further action in the matter, leaving it entirely in the hands of the lawyers? Might it not be best for her happiness that he should do so? He had been told that even though he should not succeed, there might arise almost interminable delay. The tailor would want his money before he married, and thus she might be rescued from her degradation until she should be old enough to understand it. And yet how could he claim that of which he had said, now a score of times, that he knew that it was not his own? Could he cease to call this girl by the name which all his people had acknowledged as her own, because she had refused to be his wife, and declare his conviction that she was base-born only because she had preferred to his own the addresses of a low-born man, reeking with the sweat of a tailor's board? No, he could not do that. Let her marry the sweeper of a crossing, and he must still call her the Lady Anna, if he called her any thing.

Something must be done, however. He had been told by the lawyers how the matter might be made to right itself, if he and the young lady could at once agree to be man and wife; but he had not been told what would follow should she decline to accept his offer. Mr. Flick and the Solicitor-General must know how to shape their course before November came round—and would no doubt want all the time to shape it that he could give them. What was he to say to Mr. Flick and to the Solicitor-General? Was he at liberty to tell to them the secret which the girl had told to him? That he was at liberty to say that she had rejected his offer must be a matter of course; but might he go beyond that, and tell them the whole story? It would be most expedient for many reasons that they should know it. On her behalf even it might be most salutary—with that view of liberating her from the grasp of her humiliating lover. But she had told it him, against her own interests, at her own peril, to her own infinite sorrow, in order that she might thus allay hopes in which he would otherwise have persevered. He knew enough of the little schemes and by-ways of love, of the generosity and self-sacrifice of lovers, to feel that he was bound to confidence. She had told him that if needs were he might repeat her tale; but she had told him at the same time that her tale was a secret. He could not go with her secret to a lawyer's chambers, and then divulge in the course of business that which had been extracted from her by the necessity to which she had submitted of setting him free. He could write to Mr. Flick—if that at last was his resolve—that a marriage was altogether out of the question, but he could not tell him why it was so.

But he wandered slowly on along the river, having decided only on this—only on this as a certainty—that he must tell her secret neither to the lawyers nor to his own people. Then, as he walked, a little hand touched his behind, and when he turned, Minnie Lovel took him by the arm. "Why are you all alone, Fred?"

"I am meditating how wicked the world is—and girls in particular."

"Where is Cousin Anna?"

"Up at the house, I suppose."

"Is she wicked?"

"Don't you know that every body is wicked, because Eve ate the apple?"

"Adam ate it too."

"Who bade him?"

"The devil," said the child, whispering.

"But he spoke by a woman's mouth. Why don't you go in and get ready to go?"

"So I will. Tell me one thing, Fred. May I be a bride-maid when you are married?"

"I don't think you can."

"I have set my heart upon it. Why not?"

"Because you'll be married first."

"That's nonsense, Fred; and you know it's nonsense. Isn't Cousin Anna to be your wife?"

"Look here, my darling; I'm awfully fond of you, and think you the prettiest little girl in the world. But if you ask impertinent questions, I'll never speak to you again. Do you understand?" She looked up into his face, and did understand that he was in earnest, and left him, walking slowly across the meadow back to the house alone. "Tell them not to wait lunch for me," he hallooed after her; and she told her aunt Julia that Cousin Frederic was very sulky down by the river, and that they were not to wait for him.
